The late efforts to create Lee Commander-in-Chief of all the rebel Armies have been successful. The necessary resolution passed both Houses, and a recommendation is made to reinstate Joe Johnston.

A great deal of picket firing took place on the 19th and 20th in front of Petersburg. Result not known.

Gen. Grant received the following despatch from General Terry:

"On the 16th, the enemy blew up Forts Caswell and Campbell, and abandoned them, as well as their works on Smith's Island and those at Smith's and Reeves' Point. Each place was occupied by the navy. The whole number of guns captured amounts to 162. A large number of small arms also fell into our hands, besides quantities of ordnance and commissary stores. Our casualties prove smaller than at first reported. They foot up twelve officers and one hundred and seven men killed; forty-five officers and four hundred and ninety men wounded."

The explosion of the magazine in Fort Fisher was caused by the carelessness of our men, who were indiscreet enough to go into it with lighted cigars and candles. 300 men lost their lives by this casualty. Our gunboats have gone up Cape Fear river, and are shelling the woods on both sides to dislodge the enemy.

The latest from Hood reports him on the way to Corinth. The superseding of Hood by Dick Taylor is announced.

The State Convention, (held in St. Louis,) in Committee of the Whole on the Bill of Rights, on the 20th, unanimously passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this State shall ever remain a member of the American Union, and that all attempts, from whatever source, upon whatever pretext, to dissolve the said Union, or sever the said nation, ought to be resisted with the whole power of the State; that every citizen of this State owes a paramount allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the United States, and no law or ordinance of this State in contravention thereof can have any binding force."

An ordinance has been introduced confiscating the property of rebels engaged in overt acts, and asking Congress to release the claim of the United States to the confiscated rebel property in Missouri to the State.

January 22.—On the night of the 18th, five blockade runners ran into the Old Inlet, North Carolina, and were captured by the Federal gunboats. Porter's fleet is in Cape Fear River.

Great suffering is reported among the rebel soldiers in the Shenandoah Valley. They are still near Newmarket and Staunton.

January 23.—The Herald's Washington special despatch has various rumors concerning Blair's visit to Richmond. One is that Blair brought autograph letters from Davis to Lincoln saying that he was ready to treat for peace, and that a communication from Lincoln has been taken back to Richmond, expressing a willingness to send or receive commissioners. Many well-informed people in Washington look for important results from Blair's second visit to the rebel capital. These, however, are mere rumors. In the absence of official information, we have to take the statements of the Associated Press reporters for what they are worth. There seems to be no good reason for believing that Blair's mission to Richmond was in any way authorized by the President or the Government. The Times' Washington correspondent says, "It is now generally understood that Blair did not go in any sense as a representative of Government to Richmond; that he is not authorized to encourage the hope that any overtures for peace will be made or accepted, which look, however remotely, towards a division of the Union; nor is it believed that the rebels are yet prepared to treat on any other terms. Popular sentiment has overruled the desire of the rebel government for peace."

The Richmond editors are beginning to write significantly of Peace. They think that if the South fail, their interest would incline them to submit to the United States rather than to England, France or Maximilian. Their united military forces would then sweep the continent and thus hide their shame, while America would become a colossal power of the world!

Senator Foote refused to be released, and insists upon a trial to show cause for arrest.

In Gen. Grierson's late raid in Mississippi, he marched 400 miles and captured 600 prisoners. He brought in 1,000 contrabands and 1,000 horses, and destroyed 100 miles of railroad. He estimates his loss at less than 100 men.

The Herald's Fort Fisher despatches say that the fleet and the land forces commenced on Monday (18th) to move towards Wilmington. On the day the movement commenced, explosions in that direction were heard. It was supposed the rebels were blowing up their fortifications, preparatory to evacuating the town. A large earthwork on the west side of Cape Fear river was occupied by the Union troops, who met with little opposition.

Rebel deserters are continually coming into the Union lines at Newbern.

Forrest is reported to be concentrating his forces at Houston, Miss., with the view of making a raid into Memphis.

January 24.—It is reported that a formidable expedition had left Forts Morgan and Gaines, and proceeded up the East Pascagoula river to take a position in the rear of Mobile. The river was found navigable; it is said that the occupation cannot fail to render the city an easy capture.

January 25.—At 2 o'clock on the morning of the 24th, a rebel fleet of five vessels came down the James to destroy the depots and works at City Point. Our batteries instantly opened fire upon them; one of the vessels was blown up, and two others were so badly damaged as to compel them to retire, accompanied by the other two which escaped damage. It is understood that Vice Admiral Farragut will assume the naval command on the James.

A small body of rebels made their appearance below Woodstock.

Great preparations are making by the Charlestonians to resist the onward march of Sherman.

The Richmond Despatch reports that Price had captured Fort Smith, Ark., with a garrison of 2,000 men. It is not official.

J. A. Seddon has resigned the portfolio of the rebel War Department.

The pirate Shenandoah is creating havoc among the American merchantmen on the coast of Brazil.

January 26.—Correspondence of the N. Y. Herald of the 18th says that the main body of Sherman's army is still at Savannah, but are busy refitting for another march.

The usual sensation Peace rumors come under this date; but there is nothing definite enough to embody them in our "record."

The Raleigh Progress of the 20th, states that the Union forces had arrived within 8 miles of Wilmington, and that Gen. Terry, after demanding the surrender of the place, gave Bragg until the 19th to answer. All is confusion in Wilmington. The Richmond papers, however, substantially confess the evacuation of Wilmington.

In relation to the rebel iron-clad demonstration, the Herald's City Point despatch says that there were four vessels. One was entirely destroyed, another disabled; the other two were aground and were being fired into directly by our batteries, each shot from Fort Parsons striking them fairly.

Gold fluctuated considerably during the week—varying from 195 to 200, and closed, to the date of the last despatch, at 206.

LOCAL ITEMS.

The San Francisco Hussars on Wednesday presented a magnificent Mexican saddle, with complete trappings, to Major C. H. Seymour, their late captain; the recipient is about to depart for Sinaloa, to superintend the operations of a mining company.

Our Chinese residents, having assisted in celebrating everybody else's big anniversary, were permitted to burn powder and paper, Thursday, in honor of their New Year and of Emperor Tong Gee, who commenced his fourth year's reign on that day. They seemed determined to feel happy, and if noise and smoke prove anything, they were.

The Fire Alarm Telegraph will be in operation by April 1st.

The Annual Ball of the Second Irish Regiment, given at Union Hall, Wednesday evening, was a brilliant affair. The Regimental Band furnished excellent music; every one was pleased, and it was conceded that the Second were second to none in entertaining their friends.

Proposals for building a wharf 475 feet in length, 80 feet in width, at the foot of Howard street, are asked for. Bids will be received until Feb. 4th.

Tuesday morning an attempt was made to burn the hay and feed warehouse of McEwen & Adams, on Stuart street.—the third effort of some enemy or some wretch who hopes to find his profit in the destruction of property in that locality.

The funeral of John J. Despeaux, master, and Robt. S. Owens, supercargo, of the wrecked ship Sir John Franklin, took place at Trinity Church, Tuesday. The bodies were placed in a vault at Lone Mountain Cemetery; they are to be sent East soon. Deceased were both from Baltimore.

Judge Sawyer rendered a decree, recently, in favor of the plaintiff in the suit of Henry Dreschfield vs. the City and County of San Francisco, quieting the title to 100-vara lot No. 293 on Eighth and Bryant streets.

The State Guard will give a reception at their Armory, No. 729 Market street, Monday evening, Jan. 30th. There will be literary exercises, farces, fencing, dancing, music by the Glee Club, etc.

Two more Homestead Associations (the "Jefferson Park" and the "City") have been incorporated. There is need of homesteads in this city, if anywhere on earth, as many who are living under the despotic sway of landlords and landladies can attest. From such a class as has grown into picayune wealth and cheap arrogance, Heaven save any family burdened with self-respect and not "on the muscle." No one will make a personal application of this paragraph unless it suits. The class referred to does not include all those who have tenements to rent; many are the acts of kindness and the displays of good breeding and consideration for less fortunate fellow-mortals; but, after all, "there's no place like home," and we have witnessed with pleasure the success of the various well-managed homestead associations of this city.

A meeting was held at the office of Dr. George F. Woodward, Wednesday evening, for the purpose of preparing to give General Sickles (who is to arrive on the steamer due Feb. 6th) a public reception. Jacob Deeth, Dr. Woodward, Harry Lynne, F. O. Wakeman and Dr. Rowell were appointed as a committee to prepare a programme and report to a meeting to be held at the same place Saturday evening, 28th inst.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

Mr. Moss was shot at while drawing ale from a cask in his saloon in Healdsburg, recently; a heavy charge of slugs passed his head in unpleasant proximity. The would-be murderer escaped.

Charles Smith, convicted of murder in the second degree, for killing one Madden in Gold Hill, Nevada, was sentenced, Jan. 23d, to twenty-one years in the Penitentiary.

Dayton M. Horner, a farmer, near San Lorenzo, Cal., was found dead, Jan. 23d, having evidently expired from heart disease. The wife of Francis Abel, of Petaluma, died suddenly from the same cause, a few days ago. Scarcely a week passes, of late, that similar cases are not recorded in California.

Daniel A. Hill, who came to California from Massachusetts in 1823, died at his ranch, "La Goleta y Potera," near Santa Barbara, on the 20th inst., in the 68th year of his age.

The Grass Valley Union says that twenty-one ledges have been taken up in Grass Valley District since Jan. 1st, many of which look extremely well.

Gov. Low, H. S. Brown, J. W. Winans, Fred. Billings, F. M. Pixley, J. McM. Shafter, J. B. Southard and A. A. Sargent are mentioned by the Sacramento Bee as candidates to succeed McDougall as Senator. A few more would give the list an air of variety.

The Santa Cruz Sentinel says of the weather in that locality: "It makes one feel as though Paradise was hovering somewhere near, and that the Garden of Eden would soon present itself with its delicious sweet."

SECOND LOVE.

"L'on n'aime bien qu'une seule fois : c'est la première. Les amours qui suivent sont moins involontaires!"—La Bruyère.

How shall he woo her?—Let him stand
Beside her as she sings;
And watch that fine and fairy hand
Flit o'er the quivering strings:
And let him tell her he has heard,
Though sweet the music flow,
A voice whose every whispered word
Was sweeter, long ago.

How shall he woo her?—Let him gaze
In sad and silent trance
On those blue eyes whose liquid rays
Look love in every glance;
And let him tell her, eyes more bright,
Though bright her own may beam,
Will fling a deeper spell to-night
Upon him in his dream.

How shall he woo her?—Let him try
The charms of olden time,
And swear by earth and sea and sky,
And rave in prose and rhyme:
And let him tell her, when he bent
His knee in other years,
He was not half so eloquent—
He could not speak for tears!

How shall he woo her?—Let him bow
Before the shrine in prayer;
And bid the priest pronounce the vow
That hallows passion there:
And let him tell her when she parts
From his unhidden kiss,
That memory to many hearts
Is dearer far than bliss.

Away, away! the chords are mute,
The bond is rent in twain;
You cannot wake that silent lute,
Nor clasp those links again;
Love's toil, I know, is little cost,
Love's perjury is light sin;
But souls that lose what his hath lost—
Oh, what have they to win?

[W. M. Præd.]

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

THOMAS GEDDELY'S CASE.

THOMAS GEDDELY lived as a waiter with Mrs. Hannah Williams, who kept a public-house at York. It being a house of much business, and the mistress very assiduous therein, she was deemed in wealthy circumstances. One morning her scutoire was found broken open and robbed, and Thomas Geddely disappearing at the same time, no doubt was entertained as to the robber. About a twelvemonth after a man calling himself James Crow came to York, and worked a few days for a precarious subsistence, in carrying goods as a porter. Many accosted him as Thomas Geddely. He declared he did not know them, that his name was James Crow, and that he never was at York before. But this was held as merely a trick to save himself from the consequences of the robbery committed in the house of Mrs. Williams, when he lived with her as waiter.

His mistress was sent for, and in the midst of many people instantly singled him out, called him by his name (Thomas Geddely,) and charged him with his unfaithfulness and ingratitude in robbing her. He was directly hurried before a justice of peace, but on his examination absolutely affirmed that he was not Thomas Geddely, that he knew no such person, that he never was at York before, and that his name was James Crow. Not, however, giving a good account of himself, but rather admitting that he was a vagabond and petty rogue, and Mrs. Williams and another woman swearing positively to his person, he was committed to York Castle for trial at the next assizes.

On arraignment, he pleaded not guilty, still denying that he was the person he was taken for: but Mrs. Williams and some others made oath that he was the identical Thomas Geddely who lived with her when she was robbed; and a servant girl deposed that she saw him, on the very morning of the robbery, in the room where the scutoire was broken open, with a poker in his hand. The prisoner, being unable to prove an alibi, was found guilty of the robbery. He was soon after executed, but persisted to his latest breath in affirming that he was not Thomas Geddely, and that his name was James Crow.

And so it proved! Some time after, the true Thomas Geddely, who on robbing his mistress had fled from York to Ireland, was taken up in Dublin for a crime of the same stamp, and then condemned and executed. Between his conviction and execution, and again at the fatal tree, he confessed himself to be the very Thomas Geddely who had committed the robbery at York, for which the unfortunate James Crow had been executed.

We must add, that a gentleman, an inhabitant of York, happening to be in Dublin at the time of Geddely's trial and execution, and who knew him when he lived with Mrs. Williams, declared that the resemblance between the two men was so exceedingly great, that it was next to impossible to distinguish their persons asunder.

THE RECUSANT JURYMAN.

Two men were seen fighting together in a field. One of them was found, soon after, lying dead in that field. Near him lay a pitchfork, which had apparently been the instrument of his death. This pitchfork was known to have belonged to the person who was seen fighting with the deceased, and he was known to have taken it with him only that morning. Being apprehended and brought to trial, and these circumstances appearing in evidence, and it being also found that there had been for some time an enmity between the parties, little doubt was entertained that the prisoner would be convicted, although he strongly persisted in asserting his innocence; but, to the great surprise of the court, the jury, instead of bringing in an immediate and unanimous verdict of guilty, withdrew, and after staying out a considerable time, returned, and informed the court that eleven out of the twelve had been from the first for finding the prisoner guilty, but that one man would not concur in the verdict. Upon this the judge pointed out to the dissentient person the great strength of the evidence, and asked him "How it was possible for him, all circumstances considered, to have any doubt as to the guilt of the accused?" But no argument that could be urged either by the judge or the rest of the jury, could persuade that juryman to find the prisoner guilty; so that the rest of the jury were at last obliged to agree to the verdict of acquittal.

This affair remained for some time mysterious; but at length it came out, either by the private acknowledgment of the obstinate juryman to the Judge who tried the cause, (and who is said to have had the curiosity to inquire into the motives of his extraordinary pertinacity,) or by his confession at the point of death, (for the case is related both ways,) that he himself had been the murderer! The accused, indeed, as sworn on the trial, had had a scuffle with the deceased, in which he had dropped his pitchfork, which had been soon after found by the juryman, between whom and the deceased an accidental quarrel arose in the same field, where the deceased continued to work after the departure of the person with whom he was seen to have the affray. In the heat of this quarrel the juryman, had unfortunately stabbed him with that pitchfork, and had then got away totally unsuspected; but finding soon after that the other person had been apprehended on suspicion of being the murderer, and fearing, as the circumstances appeared so strong against him, he had contrived to get upon the jury, as the only way of saving the innocent, without endangering himself.

THE LOST MONEY.

The following remarkable case was communicated to us by the party in whose personal experience it occurred. The narrator had gone from Edinburgh to London to see a son there settled in a respectable situation. Having a week or two of unoccupied time, he resolved, before returning to the north, to visit Paris, and, being ignorant of the French language, made some inquiries for a companion who might act as his interpreter. "It so happened (continues the narrator) that I was intimate in Edinburgh with a Mr. F., a native of France, who I understood, was going to Paris about the same period, but when I left Edinburgh I had no opportunity of making an arrangement with him. One Sunday afternoon, however, while walking in St. James' Park, I met a friend of his, who informed me that he had received a letter from Mr. F., stating that he was to have sailed from Leith on the previous day, and that he would probably be in London on Monday evening, and informed me where I should find him.

I now considered that I could not do better than avail myself of Mr. F.'s knowledge of France, and of the French language, and proceed with him to Paris. I accordingly went and found him at his lodgings on Tuesday. On that occasion, and at different times during the week, we conversed about the proposed jaunt to Paris, and it was finally resolved that on the next Sunday we should sail from London to Calais. It was also arranged, at my suggestion, that in order to prevent disappointment, Mr. F. should come to my inn on the Saturday afternoon, and that we should proceed together to the vessel on the following day.

My son, who had been occupying a bedroom, the entrance to which was through my own apartment, had left it the previous day to be nearer his place of business, and I suggested that Mr. F. should occupy this inner apartment, so that we might be near one another; and to this arrangement Mr. F. at once agreed.

In the course of the Saturday evening we had some conversation relative to the money each of us had in his possession; and Mr. F. showed me how he secured his cash in a concealed part of his dress, where it would not be suspected, in case we should fall in with any of the gentry disposed to peculation. Mr. F. had a parcel of Bank of England notes, to the amount of £95, besides a considerable quantity of gold and silver. The notes he replaced in the pocket, and we soon afterwards went to bed.

Mr. F., having chanced to awake early next morning (about four o'clock, I believe) commenced counting his gold and silver, but did not meddle with his notes, as he believed them to be quite safe in the pocket of his trousers. I was awake by the jingling of the coins, and on learning what he was about, I inquired if all was right, and he answered quite right, and in a short time he went to bed, and again we fell asleep. At six o'clock, a knock was heard at our outer bedroom door, and at last "Boots" entered, and inquired if we were in possession of all our money, and we both assured him we were, for we recollected that we had examined it on the previous evening, when all was right, and Mr. F. had ascertained still more recently that his gold and silver were undisturbed. "Boots," however, insisted that we were in error, and told us that he had that morning found a parcel of bank notes to the amount of £95 (lying in one of the outhouses, near to the place where he cleaned his boots,) which he had put into the possession of his master. On hearing the sum of £95 mentioned, Mr. F. immediately arose, much agitated, knowing that such was the very amount of his notes, but at the same time feeling almost certain that he had the money quite secure. The man, however, went and brought the money from his master, which Mr. F. immediately knew to be his own parcel of notes; but how it could have found its way to the coach-yard, was to us quite incomprehensible.

It soon occurred to me, however, how the circumstance had taken place. I recollected that just before going to bed, I had taken my own boots and Mr. F.'s, and put them outside the door, and it must have happened that Mr. F., in taking off his trousers, which were rather tight, and he being old and stiff, the parcel of notes during the exertion must have fallen out of his pocket, into one of the boots which were lying near him at the time.

This circumstance at the moment afforded me a good deal of amusement, but when I began to reflect upon what the consequences might have been, I was very seriously concerned.

If the circumstance had occurred in the way I have supposed, and I can conceive no other, the boots must have been taken away from the door, and thrown down with others, to the number perhaps of twenty or thirty pairs, in a small outhouse in the stable-yard, where the boots were taken to be cleaned, and as there were at all times of the day a number of hostlers, coachmen, and others, going about, the house being one of the greatest stage-coach establishments in London, the safe return of the money appears almost miraculous; for had the money fallen into the hands of a person less honest than "Boots" himself, it is not probable that the temptation would have overcome any scruples he might have had, the sum being large; and had the person kept it secret, no suspicion could possibly have attached to him.

Now, supposing, what is highly probable, that the money had not been returned, in what a situation should I have been placed! Take into consideration all the circumstances of the case. Knowing that Mr. F. was going to reside some months in France, I must have been presumed to calculate that he would have a considerable sum of money in his custody. Finding out his residence in London, arranging to go with him to France, getting him to come to my lodging and into my own bedroom, introducing the subject regarding the securing of the money, so as to ascertain where it was concealed, would all have appeared as certain proof that I had arisen during the night, and taken possession of the money. It could scarcely have availed me to deny all knowledge of the circumstance, or allege the improbability of my having committed a robbery where it could be so easily detected. Such circumstances have often occurred before, where the desire could not be resisted. Nor could Mr. F. have been blamed had he made application to the public authorities to investigate the matter. What a clear case of circumstantial evidence would any judge or jury have made out against me! At the very least, the loss of reputation for life would have been the ultimate consequence.

ORIGIN OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.—In the Gentleman's Monthly Magazine, of which a few numbers were published in London, in 1803, William Freud, one of the editors, gave a fable of the origin of the English language. He said that the poor English, who could do nothing but hiss, petitioned the Devil for a vocabulary. The infernal potentate picked up a variety of folios in all languages, together with swathings of mummies, etc., and boiled them in a caldron, collecting large quantities of the froth, which he sent to the petitioners, who thus got what they wanted. They did not quite get rid of the hissing; and when their benefactor, once in seven years, or thereabouts, pays them a visit, they still entertain him with the old sounds at borough and county elections. But just as the boiling process was nearly finished, the devil was lucky enough to pick up a large quantity of books and papers cheap, the Council of — having just broken up. These were thrown in, but the hard Greek words had not time to boil. The consequence is that when a preacher gets hold of them he might as well be talking Arabic. The language would have been an excellent language if it had not been for the Council alluded to, and the words had been well boiled.

BREWSTER & CO.'S Carriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA,
will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION
to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture
THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE,
and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade
WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES,
and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to
BREWSTER & CO.,
Of Broome street,
The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with
BREWSTER & CO.,
Of No. 372, Broome street,
NEW YORK.
de17-5m

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES
NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.
CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.
R. L. OGDEN, Agent,
Southeast corner of Montgomery and California street
San Francisco. de17-5m

CALIFORNIA Collegiate Institute, FOR YOUNG LADIES.

64 Silver street, between Second and Third streets.
PRINCIPAL—MISS M. LAMMOND.
ASSISTANTS—Miss M. P. Hastings, Miss De Torrey, Miss H. E. Martin, Mrs. S. A. Gregory.

FRENCH—Mme. Villimere.
SPANISH—Senor A. Vallejo.
MUSIC—Professor E. Hartman, Piano; Mrs. S. A. Gregory, Piano; Professor J. B. Boutler, Vocal.

OIL PAINTING AND DRAWING—Mr. Frederick A. Butman.
DANCING—Mons. Galavotti.

The friends and patrons of this Institution, and those interested in the cause of Education, are cordially invited to visit during the hours of Recitation, from half-past 9 o'clock, A. M. to 3 P. M.

ja14-1m M. LAMMOND, Principal.

TO CLOSE THEM OUT!

Tyler Brothers,
No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,
WILL SELL THEIR ENTIRE STOCK
OF PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS
AND HOLIDAY GOODS!

REGARDLESS OF COST!
UNTIL FURTHER NOTICE.
de31-1f

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
—in—
Fine Clothing
—AND—
GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

GOODWIN & CO.,
HAVING RECEIVED AT THE
LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,

—THE—
First Premium,
—ON—
FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES.

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such

Consisting of
Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,
DINING ROOM AND
OFFICE FURNITURE.

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,
No. 628 Washington street
no12

CATHOLIC GIFTS,
IN GREAT VARIETY!
Consisting of—
BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,
STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,
MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES!
And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.
For sale by
MICHAEL FLOOD,
Catholic Bookseller,
No. 423 Kearny street, San Francisco.
de17-4f

SOUTH PARK INSTITUTE!
FOR YOUNG LADIES.
PRINCIPAL, Prof. C. MIEL.
ASSISTANT PRINCIPALS, MME. MIEL and MISS FLORENCE JAMES.
This new French and English Educational Establishment OPENED for Boarding and Day Pupils,
On MONDAY, JANUARY 16, 1865.
Apply for prospectuses, admission, etc., at Prof. MIEL'S residence, No. 41 South Park. no26

THE REASON WHY
EVERYBODY USES
THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S
CONCENTRATED
ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,
OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.
Second—It is more effectual.
Third—It saves labor.
Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white and clear.
No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.
For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally. Manufactory, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco. ja7-3m

P. J. WHITE & CO.,
SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN—
BUTTER, LARD, HAMS, BACON, PORK,
SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,
And a general assortment of
GROCERIES,
Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,
Between Sansome and Battery, San Francisco.
Your trade is respectfully solicited. de10-1f

PHINEAS BANNING,
FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT
WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,
DEALER IN
LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,
And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

EDDY & FULLER'S
Dancing Academy,
No. 727 Market street, a few doors above Third,
PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF
elsewhere.
CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.
CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.
Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.
SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. ja7-1f

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!
CANTY & WAGNER,
(SUCCESSORS TO J. REGAN.)
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS.
113 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Between Bush and Sutter, San Francisco.

N. B.—All CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.
Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to. de3-3m

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS
—TO—
Red Bluff.
ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company
WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO
FOR RED BLUFF,
EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.
no5-1f J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S
PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.
THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.
ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Minturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,
And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit.
Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS
It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS
It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILLATION,
It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES
It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN,
No. 28 Third street, San Francisco, de17-3m
Who will give all information about them.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,
316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES,
adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSEN, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of
SUPERIOR CARRIAGES,
ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,
ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

ATKINS MASSEY,
UNDERTAKER,
(At the Old Stand.)
No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,
First house below Kearny street.
Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases. Office of the City
de3-1f and County Coroner.

NATHANIEL GRAY,
UNDERTAKER,
CITY AND COUNTY SEXTON,
641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,
Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC
BURIAL CASES and CASKETS.
de17-3m

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFFERED by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.
THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRETIEN PFISTER,
oc15-1f No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:40
FROM THE CITY
10:00	10:40	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.
Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.
my25 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

GREGORY YALE,
ATTORNEY AT LAW,
Office—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. y2

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
645 Washington st., San Francisco.

MR. CHRETIEN PEISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jovyn's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupit of Charriere of Paris, Surgical Mechanist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, aneurysms for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M.

RICKS RAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
'y30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
dec31-3m

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of FEBRUARY, 1865:

FEBRUARY 31	GOLDEN AGE
FEBRUARY 13	CONSTITUTION
FEBRUARY 23	SACRAMENTO

From Folson-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,
ja28 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

H. LUCKE, BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,
SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-4f

THE LAST

—OF THE—

SEWING MACHINE

CONTROVERSY!

THE LIE NAILED!

VENTILATION OF

The Gross Mis-statements

—OF THE—

Florence Sewing Machine

AGENT.

Trickery! Knavery!

DECEPTION! LIES!

ARE OF NO AVAIL!!

THE GROVER & BAKER

SEWING MACHINE

UNSCATHED!

AND THE MISERABLY IMBECILE AND GROSSLY FALSE STATEMENTS

—OF THE—

Agent of the Florence

SEWING MACHINE

EXPOSED!

Gross fraud upon the Public.

READ THE FOLLOWING:

A few weeks since we advertised the fact that the GROVER & BAKER MACHINE had received the Highest Premium at the Oregon State Fair, and the same result had attended our exhibitions at every State Fair held during the past four years, when in competition with others. This well-known fact was admitted virtually by all Sewing Machine Agents; but, two months afterward, the agent of the Florence machine—a disappointed aspirant to honors which never have and never will be awarded his complicated mass of unreliable and inferior mechanism—comes forward, and in the most audacious manner advertises that there was "A slight mistake about the Premium at the Oregon State Fair, that the Committee decided in favor of the Florence Machine," etc., followed by a card from Mrs. Howe, one of the Committee, to that effect, and apparently substantiated by two other ladies, but not by all of the committee, which was composed of FIVE ladies, and finally published and declares as a "Bogus Report," the genuine and only one, which gave the First Premium to GROVER & BAKER, and insinuates that the President of the Society (Judge Thornton) changed the report.

To all this we simply replied that the statement was FALSE, and that a reply would be given as soon as communication could be had with the proper parties in Oregon. We now propose to give the promised answer, in which it is not our purpose to discuss the means adopted to procure from Mrs. Howe her wonderfully incorrect card, nor in blinding the eyes of two others of the Committee in substantiating it, but simply to give through the President of the Society, and four of the five ladies who composed the Committee, the direct to the statement of the Florence machine Agent and his unscrupulous adherents, with a determination that this will be the last time that we shall be inveigled into noticing any emanations from such an unreliable and contemptible source, which seeks, by attacks upon our well-earned and world-wide reputation, to build up for himself and his heretofore unknown and unappreciated compound of complication an otherwise unheard-of fame.

Read the following Tissue of Falshoods published by the Agent of the Florence Sewing Machine.

Having heard to-day for the first time that the Grover & Baker Sewing machine Company claim the First Premium on Sewing Machines and Sewing machine work at the Oregon State Fair, held in Salem, September, 1864, and being one of the Committee on Sewing machines and Sewing machine work at said Fair, I feel it my duty to make, and take pleasure in making the following statement:

Three (if not all) of the Committee were selected by a Mr. Johnson, (an employee of the Grover & Baker company;) and after a careful examination of the sewing machines and machine work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was finally decided and agreed by the committee to award the First Premium to the FLORENCE Machine, as the best machine for doing all grades of work; and a Premium to the Grover & Baker machine, for Embroidery; and the committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the committee and their final decision.

Signed, MARY A. HOWE,
And indorsed by Mrs. Miller and Griffin, under misapprehension of its object and intent, as appears below.

Read the Further Comments of the Florence Agent.

Copy of the Bogus Report which was fraudulently substituted in the place of the Real Decision of the Committee, and which they signed without reading:

SEPTEMBER 29, 1864.

We, the undersigned, a Committee appointed at the Fourth Annual Fair of the Oregon State Agricultural Society, to examine and report upon the merits of different Sewing Machines on exhibition, have endeavored to perform the duty with care and impartiality. In view of all the facts, we have decided to award the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second to the Florence. The principal fact influencing our decision in awarding the First Premium to the former, was the circumstance that it embroidered, while the other does not. We have, however, no hesitancy in saying that both have great merits; and we recommend them both to the patronage of the Oregon public.

MARY S. SMITH,
MARY A. HOWE,
EMILY C. GRIFFIN,
MARY ANN S. KNOX,
Committee

AND READ OUR REFUTATION

—OF THIS—

Most Scandalous Outrage

—ON—

TRUTH AND SENSE!

Extracts from an Affidavit in our Possession, from JUDGE J. L. THORNTON, President Oregon S. A. Society:

"I have this day seen an advertisement of the Florence Machine Company, containing an affidavit from Mrs. Mary A. Howe, November 4, 1864. My sense of duty to the Committee on Sewing Machines, appointed at the last State Agricultural Fair, not less than what I owe to myself, constrains me to affirm that this affidavit contains little else than a series of the most shameful untruths. In the first place, it is not true 'that on the fourth' day of November she heard for the first time that the GROVER & BAKER Sewing Machine Company claimed the FIRST PREMIUM. She knew it on the twenty-ninth of September. In the second place, it is not true that three, if not all, of the Committee, were selected by a Mr. Johnson, in the employ of the GROVER & BAKER Company. I knew none of the parties personally, or by name, until they came before me as President of the Society. I selected the Committee without even a suggestion from any one connected with the GROVER & BAKER Company, as to whom I should appoint. I do not even know the Mr. Johnson referred to. Mrs. Howe then proceeds to say: 'It was finally decided, and agreed by the ladies present, to award the first premium to the Florence Machine, as the best for doing all kinds of work, and the second premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to Judge Thornton, the President of the Fair, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated.' I do not think it possible for even Mrs. Howe to make another statement more wickedly false. The Hon. Mrs. Delazon Smith, Mrs. Howe, Mrs. Griffin, Mrs. Knox and Miss Mary Miller, were the Special Committee on Sewing Machines. They came to me to make their report, and requested me to write it for them. They said verbally, (Mrs. Howe included,) that they had determined to award the first premium to the Grover & Baker, and the second premium to the Florence Machine, and assigned as a reason that the Grover & Baker embroidered, while the Florence did not; besides, the latter being more complicated and liable to get out of order, made them less desirable as a family machine. I wrote the Report which appears in their advertisement as a 'Bogus Report,' and after reading it, asked each lady present (including the veracious Mrs. Howe) if it contained an expression of their opinion, as the merits of the respective machines? Each for herself answering in the affirmative. It was then signed by them, and has never since been changed in a line or word. In short, all the material statements of Mrs. Howe are FALSE THROUGHOUT.

(Signed) J. L. THORNTON.
Attested, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk.

STATEMENT OF MRS. DELAZON SMITH,
Another of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the Oregon State Fair, Whose statement was not taken by the Florence, as it would not suit their purpose.

"The Committee, after a long consultation, instructed the President, Judge Thornton, to write out a Report, awarding to the Grover & Baker Machine the First Premium and the Second Premium to the Florence Machine. The Report advertised by the Florence Machine Company, as being bogus was the genuine Report, as made out, read, and then signed by the four ladies of the Committee then present. The Committee were appointed by Judge Thornton, President of the Society, and not by a Mr. Johnson, as advertised by the agent of the Florence Machine; and further, Mrs. Howe, the person signing the statement advertised as aforesaid, must have understood that the Grover & Baker Machine was to have the First Premium, as she herself told me that the Florence Machine men were quite angry about the award of the First Premium to Grover & Baker, and would not allow the Second Premium Ribbon to be tied to their machine (the Florence.) I was decidedly in favor of awarding the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and was influenced in my decision by the fact that I considered the Florence Machine more complicated, and more liable to get out of order, and I considered the Grover & Baker the most reliable and simple of the two. That it would do all the work the Florence would do, besides being the best for ornamental work. I was solicited by the other party for a statement of the facts in the case, which I offered to give, but was not accepted, as it was not agreeable to their wishes; and further state that the foregoing is true, anything to the contrary notwithstanding.

(Signed) MARY S. SMITH.
Sworn, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk, Linn county.

STATEMENT OF MRS. MARY ANN KNOX,
Another of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the Oregon State Fair,

Whose statement was not taken by the Florence because it would not agree with their misrepresentations.

"Said Committee signed the Report awarding the First Premium to the 'Grover & Baker' Machine, and the Report alleged by the Agent of the Florence as bogus, was the True Report which was written out by the President, and read by the Committee before signing. The President asked the four ladies of the Committee, then present, if the Report was made out agreeable to their wishes; to which they answered in the affirmative; and the contents of the Report were understood by the ladies, particularly by Mrs. Howe, as she subsequently spoke of the dissatisfaction expressed by the Agent of the Florence Machine; she also stated that though she liked the work of the Florence, still, if she was going to purchase a Machine, she would purchase a Grover & Baker, particularly on account of its ornamental work. Mrs. Griffin also expressed herself in the same manner. I also stated that under no consideration would I sign a Report in favor of giving the Premium to the Florence Machine. I consider it to be a complicated and delicate piece of Machinery, unfit for general use among the people in the country, while the Grover & Baker had proved itself to be perfect in every respect. Mr. Thornton, President of the Society, appointed the Committee. I signed the Report with a full and complete understanding of its contents, and believe the others of the four ladies understood it as well as myself.

(Signed) MRS. ANN S. KNOX.
Sworn, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk, Linn county.

STATEMENT OF MRS. EMILY C. GRIFFIN,
Another of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the Oregon State Fair,

Who was inveigled into signing the Florence Document by False Representations.

"On or about the 15th day of December, Rev. J. L. Parrish, (acting for the Florence Machine), called with a written statement, purporting to have been made by Mrs. Mary A. Howe: the printed statement shown me this day, as having been published in the San Francisco Alta, and signed by Mrs. Howe, is not such as was represented at the time, as it contains so many errors that I could not understandingly have signed it. The report which we made at the time, awarded the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second Premium to the Florence; the report which is advertised as being bogus is the genuine Report, which we four ladies signed at the time. My intention in making the previous affidavit was simply to state that one of the principal reasons for awarding the premium to GROVER & BAKER's Machine was on account of its embroidery.

(Signed) EMILY C. GRIFFIN.
Sworn, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk, Linn county.

STATEMENT OF MRS. MARY MILLER,
Another of the Ladies of the Committee, Who was inveigled, against her views, into signing the Florence document.

In order to place myself right in the controversy regarding the award of the First Premium on Sewing Machines, I would state that I was not present at the time the award was made, but thought the Florence Machine received the premium for sewing, and Grover & Baker's for embroidery, but am willing to state that the Report published as bogus is the genuine one. In making my affidavit I simply intended to state my impressions, without swearing to facts, as represented in Mrs. Howe's card.

(Signed) MARY MILLER.

The above is an effectual exhibit of a most clastardly attempt to ROB THE GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE of fairly earned honors, by the most contemptible series of falshoods, misrepresentations and innuendoes by the Agent of the Florence Machine, who has not dared advertise in Oregon, where the premium in question was obtained, any denial of it; but seeks at this distance, by establishing a controversy, to attract, by time and false impressions, attention to his wares. We drop the foul affair, leaving the public, who may have an interest in the Sewing Machine question, to form their own estimates of the merit of a Sewing Machine which requires bolstering up by such means, in comparison with the

"GROVER & BAKER,"

which, for fifteen years, by actual worth and honorable competition, has fairly earned the reputation of being

THE BEST IN USE.

R. G. BROWN,
Agent Grover & Baker S. M. Co.,
ja28-1t 329 Montgomery street

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;
JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;
STEAMBOAT GIN;
OLD TOM GIN;
IRISH WHISKY,
from Bond direct.
For sale by V. SQUARZA, ja28-1f 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

TWO HOUSEKEEPERS, HEADS OF FAMILIES, ETC., ETC

F. C. BELDEN,
Has just opened his New Store,
No. 612 SACRAMENTO STREET,
two doors west of Parrott's Banking House, with a carefully selected assortment of
PURE WINES, TEAS, BRANDIES, FAMILY PRESERVES, CORDIALS, ETC.,
Which have all been purchased for cash, and will be sold at a very slight advance over COST.
F. C. BELDEN'S long experience and constant attention to business justifies him in guaranteeing full satisfaction to all new customers as well as to his old patrons. A simple trial will be sufficient to prove the superior quality and very moderate prices of his stock. ja28-1m

THE CALIFORNIAN.A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.*Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA,

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, and JOHN COLLIER

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific.
Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL on the Continent.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"
Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
ja25-1f 401 Battery, cor. Clay,
San Francisco.

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE
MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S
Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT
IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other mal-practices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free. Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
ja25-1f 401 Battery, corner Clay,
San Francisco.

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL
SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGURY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
Agents for the Pacific Coast,
401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,
San Francisco.
Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-1f

ALLEN'S
LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.
au27

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.
au27

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION

FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND DRESSING
THE Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Fetridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
Agents, San Francisco.
ja25-1f

OPPOSITION STEAMER-DAY,
FEBRUARY 13th!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK!
VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE!!!

THROUGH IN 21 DAYS!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. H. BLETHEN, - - - - - Commander,

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON MONDAY, - - - - - FEBRUARY 13TH

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely, Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit of the Isthmus is a pleasant trip. Meals furnished free by the Company while crossing. A baggage-master will be sent through by each steamer. Insurance on Treasure at the lowest rates.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,

Up stairs, San Francisco. ja21

THESE PLASTERS have the compactness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove. They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly lump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms. For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.,
"Brandreth Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

San Francisco.

Sold by all Druggists. de17 3m

SPECIAL NOTICE.Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
GROCERIES AND PROVISIONS,
WINES AND LIQUORS,

Are prepared to offer great inducements to friends and patrons desiring goods in our line. Our stock consists in part as follows:

Old Government Java, Costa Rica and Rio Coffee.
Powdered, Crushed, Granulated, New Orleans and Coffee Sugars.
Imperial, Young

Hyson,
English Breakfast
And Comet Oolong Tea. Japan
Tea, the BEST ever Imported to the State,
Expressly for our Family Trade. Genuine New Orleans Molasses, Golden Syrup, Coal Oil, Choice Istbmus
Butter, Extra Family Flour, Corn Meal, etc., etc., together
with a great variety of

FANCY GROCERIES,

Not usually kept by Grocers. Quality always guaranteed as represented. Goods delivered at the Wharves and Railroad Depots Free of Charge. The finest WINES AND LIQUORS DIRECT FROM BOND.

ENGLISH ALE AND PORTER

For Family or Medicinal use.

BOWEN BROTHERS.

ja21-1f

THE CALIFORNIA ART UNION,

OVER THE STORE OF

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,
No. 312 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Is Now Open,

And will continue to receive Visitors DAILY from 10 A M
until 10 P M.

Terms of membership - - - - - Five Dollars
Single Admission - - - - - Twenty-five cents

Annual Subscriptions, Five Dollars, which entitles the subscriber to free admission to the Gallery; also, to an Engraving or Photograph of some Picture in the exhibition and a chance in the distribution of the property of the Association at the close of the season, according to the plan of the various Art Unions of Europe and the Atlantic States. ja28-1f

THE HOUSE OF DISASTER—A STORY.

IN one of the retired corners of Paris there is to be found a house with a very remarkable traditional name, "La Maison de Malheur des Flamands." For centuries the dwelling in question has been familiarly known by this strange appellation. It is now one of the meanest and ugliest structures in the whole of the crowded quarter where it is placed, though it was once one of the finest and richest. The beauties of its elaborately sculptured wood, and its oaken doors, have been defaced and removed by the influence of time, chance, and change. Still, the incidents which connected the mansion with the Flemish people, and gave to it the title of their "House of Disaster," are not yet consigned to oblivion, though they may be known, indeed, to few of those who have the traditional designation most commonly in their mouths.

Michel Watremetz, a native of Flanders, was the occupant of this mansion some centuries ago. Like many other Flemings, he had come to Paris to exercise his trade or profession, which was that of a transcriber or manufacturer of bibles, and he had risen in the course of time to be the most wealthy and famous artisan in that department in the French capital. He had fifteen apprentices or assistants, who labored continually in transcribing copies of the sacred writings, and also in painting them, for the majority of bibles in those days were illuminated, as it was called, or, in other words, illustrated by figures painted on the margins. The copies executed by these assistants were carefully revised by Michel himself, that the text might be preserved in perfect correctness. In this task Watremetz was always aided by his young and pretty daughter Odette, who, whilst her father had the new manuscript copy before him, read aloud from an old and standard transcription, that no forgotten words or mutilated passages might remain unnoticed. Yet Odette herself was often the source and origin of such errors, seeing that, when she was present, the young transcribers were apt not only to make ungainly spots upon the vellum, but also to copy incorrectly the words of the work before them. Though idolized by some of these youths, Odette, however, did not expend a thought on them. The cause was, that she had fixed her whole heart and affection on a stranger, a young German who had come to Paris, and requested work from her father as a transcriber of bibles. In making this request, he had stated one condition necessary to be conceded ere he could accept work from Michel Watremetz. This condition was, that Michel should allow him to work at home in his own lodgings. Michel, knowing the professional skill of the Germans, agreed to the terms of the stranger, who left in the other's hands a massive gold chain by way of security for the vellum which he of course received to work upon.

Gaspard Hautz, as the young German was named, in place of passing the whole of his daily time in toiling like the rest of Michel's operatives, seemed as if he had little else to do but to walk about and enjoy himself like a gentleman of fortune. With his handsome person elegantly attired, he strolled much about the city, viewing its curiosities and wonders. He even came often to the very workshop of Michel Watremetz, and there, seated on the corner of a table, he smiled upon Odette, and murmured in her ear words which were to her a lasting pleasure and a trouble. Every now and then, on making these visits, Gaspard Hautz would carry off some of the apprentices with him to supper, and entertain them gallantly. All this sort of work Master Michel Watremetz noticed, and internally felicitated himself on having in pledge the chain of Gaspard, as the vellum which the latter had got seemed to the Fleming to be decidedly lost. In this conclusion he was far wrong. Scarcely had one month passed away, when Gaspard Hautz arrived one morning with his bible finished. Never had the characters presented such regularity; never had there been fewer errors in any copy. As he counted out his golden crowns, Michel shook his head, and exclaimed, "This bible, young man, was surely never wrought by your hands. A whole year would scarce have sufficed for such a labor in the hands of the most experienced workman, and you bring it complete in a month!" "The work is so certainly mine," said Gaspard, "that I will produce you another ere fifteen days be over." Michel accepted the offer. In fifteen days the young German produced a second bible, not less perfect than the first.

Old Watremetz had found in the first bible but three errors, and in the second he found the very same. But this did not strike Michel with any great surprise, as he knew how apt the hand is to get into a habit of making fixed slips. At the end of a year Gaspard had furnished to Michel thirty bibles, being as much work as thirty other workmen could have executed. On account of this new and every way superior source of supply, Watremetz dismissed several of his ordinary assistants, who in consequence were discontented, and menaced Gaspard with their bitterest vengeance.

After their connection had subsisted for the time mentioned, Michel proposed that Gaspard Hautz should come and reside at his house. Gaspard yielded to this request the more willingly because he loved Odette tenderly and deeply, and because she had acknowledged an equal affection for him in return. The unsuspecting young German was not aware of the motives of the old Fleming for giving the invitation. Michel had become perfectly assured that Gaspard's bibles were not transcribed by him as they were done by others: he saw that there was a secret—a mystery—and it was to have it in his power to act as a spy on Gaspard, that he brought the latter to stay with him. When that step had been for some time effected, the old Fleming watched Gaspard by night and by day. The young German said always that he wrought while others slept, and, in reality, a lamp was kept continually burning in his chamber. But Watremetz soon discovered this to be a mere feint, by watching at the youth's chamber door. Gaspard was always motionless—in fact, asleep. Not being able to penetrate the mystery notwithstanding all these discoveries, Michel began openly to press the young man for an explanation, till at length Gaspard said: "Well! it is true that there is a secret; a secret which may make the fortune of any man, or perhaps of two men. Give me your daughter Odette's hand, and I will tell you my secret, and we may soon become rich enough to require to sell no more bibles."

Gaspard received the old man's promise, and then told him that a wonderful art had been invented in Germany, which enabled any one to produce bibles and other books with inconceivable rapidity, and that the mobility of the stamps or characters employed permitted the easy correction of any blunders. "I have yet thirty bibles thus made," said Gaspard, "in the keeping of a friend; I may have a hundred whenever I wish them, from the same friend who made the others. Not daring to sell the works myself, because they here punish, as magical, all that they do not comprehend, I applied to you, and became ostensibly a transcriber." Gaspard at the same time told Michel that the name of the fabricator of the bibles was Schœffer, and pointed out the means which had been established for carrying on a correspondence with him, and procuring as many bibles as might be required, at such a price as would leave the second vendors a princely profit.

Michel only consented to the immediate marriage of Gaspard and Odette, on receiving a load of bibles which had been sent for from Schœffer, who lived without the bounds of France. Thus satisfied, old Watremetz gave permission for the celebration of the wedding within eight days. But two or three mornings ere the day came, one of Michel's former apprentices entered his house magnificently dressed, and informed the old Fleming that he—the apprentice—had recently got a handsome fortune by the death of a relation, that his father had just been named "Master of the Merchants," and that he himself had come to place his wealth and hand at the disposal of Odette. The dark shade in Watremetz's composition was avarice. He grew pale at the thought of his being under the necessity of renouncing an alliance with so rich a family—with the son of the chief of the merchants. Almost audibly he cursed the cause of all this, poor Gaspard. "Gaspard!" cried the enriched apprentice, comprehending the truth at once; "what! have I a rival in Gaspard, the wretch who has sold himself to the Evil One, for the power of multiplying manuscripts? The hand of justice hangs over him, and will crush him soon! You, too, were accused of being his accomplice, Michel; happily, through my father's credit, I got the charge against you suppressed; but as for Gaspard, nothing can save him!"

All this, unhappily, proved but too real. Gaspard Hautz was seized and cast into prison, and the charge against him was supported by the workmen of Watremetz. In vain did the poor young German invoke the testimony of Michel: Michel kept an obstinate silence. In vain did Gaspard wish that his own explanation should be heard. The cry of his judge was, "The torture!—confess!" And when subjected to the horrors of the question, poor human nature sank under it, and to ensure a speedy death and the cessation of his agonies, Gaspard Hautz admitted his association with the devil. He was condemned to death, and also to make an amende honorable, before his execution, in front of the house of Michel Watremetz, whom he had endeavored, his judges said, to implicate in a matter where the Fleming was perfectly guiltless.

When the day of execution came, Gaspard Hautz was carried to the front of the house of Michel Watremetz, and there the cavalcade stopped. The doomed youth arose from his seat, pale and wasted, with the irons rattling still on his limbs. But in place of making the expected amende, which the solemnity of the ceremonial had compelled Michel to appear for the purpose of listening to, Gaspard exclaimed, "I am the victim of treachery and ingratitude, and this thou knowest well, Michel Watremetz, who art here to listen to me, and who strugglest to appear composed. Glad wouldst thou have been had my judges spared thee this last interview. But I am here to say farewell, and to give thee thanks! Woe upon that house," continued Gaspard, raising his hand and pointing to the dwelling of Michel, "woe upon it! I need not say woe upon thee, Michel Watremetz, for it is come already on thee and thine; but woe upon all of thy race who shall enter or dwell beneath that roof, for ever and ever! Now, lead on to the funeral pile!"

Three months afterwards, Michael Watremetz wept and tore his hair over the tomb of a broken-hearted girl, his daughter, his only daughter. Six months afterwards, a fire destroyed the dwelling and all the effects of Michel Watremetz. The growing insanity or fatuity of the old Fleming was the cause of the fire, and by the same agency he was soon brought to the streets, where he passed the remainder of his days, a beggar and an idiot. The prediction of Gaspard was certainly realized by this and other events that signalized the future history of the house of Michel Watremetz. Being a spot where Flemings loved to abide, in the same manner as we find localities taken up by Jews and by other particular races, the dwelling under notice was repeatedly inhabited by Flemings after the occurrence of the events related. Eloquent Flemings, says the tradition of the neighborhood, came successively to occupy the "Maison de Malheur des Flamands," and of all the eleven not one escaped a sudden and violent end. Some who have paid especial attention to the circumstances can enumerate the various modes in which the doom fell upon the inhabitants of this House of Woe. One perished by assassination, another by the waters of the Seine, a third was broken on the wheel, a fourth died within the walls, of starvation, and so on. One of the last of the unfortunate Flemings who tenanted the house of disaster, was Jean Paul Labadie, a man whose fate was particularly hard, and who lived so recently that his story could have been authenticated but a short time ago by living persons. He was a flourishing man. A large sum of money which he had brought with him from his native Flanders had been embarked by him in trade, which he carried on in "La Maison de Malheur." He married a most beautiful girl, who commonly received the title of the "belle" of the neighborhood. But, soon after his marriage, he was arrested, and thrown in the Bastille. There he lay for twenty years, totally ignorant of the crime for which he was thus punished. At length a great person who chanced to visit his cell was seized with pity, and got Jean Paul liberated, when he learned for the first time the cause of his confinement. A court marquis had seen and admired his wife, and had taken the way related of getting the husband disposed of. Subsequently, Jean Paul had merely lain in prison because the marquis had utterly forgot him.

These stories of misfortune befalling the occupants of the fated house, may be connected or not by our readers, just as they please, with the dying words of Gaspard Hautz. We have our own ideas about the matter, and, no doubt, they will also have theirs. Enough has been said, however, to explain satisfactorily the origin of the name of the Flemings' House of Disaster.

AN INTERVIEW WITH JASMIN.—"I returned by Agen, after an absence in the Pyrenees of some months, and renewed my acquaintance with Jasmin and his dark-eyed wife. I did not expect to be recognized, but the moment I entered the little shop I was hailed as an old friend. 'Ah!' cried Jasmin, 'enfin la voilà encore!' I could not but be flattered by this recollection, but soon found it was less on my own account than I was thus welcomed than because a circumstance had occurred to the poet which he thought I could, perhaps, explain. He produced several French newspapers in which he pointed out to me an article headed 'Jasmin à Londres,' being a translation of certain notices of himself which had appeared in a leading English literary journal. He had, he said, been informed of the honor done him by numerous friends, and assured me his fame had been much spread by these means, and he was so delighted on the occasion that he had resolved to learn English in order that he might judge of the translations from his work, which he had been told were well done. I enjoyed his surprise, while I informed him that I knew who was the reviewer and translator, and explained the reason for the verses giving pleasure in an English dress to be the superior simplicity of the English language over modern French, for which he has a great contempt, as unfitted for lyrical composition. He inquired respecting Burns, to whom he had been likened, and begged me to tell him something of Moore. The delight of himself and his wife was amusing at having discovered a secret which had puzzled them so long. He had a thousand things to tell me; in particular, that he had only the day before received a letter from the Duchess of Orleans informing him that she had ordered a medal of her late husband to be struck, the first of which would be sent to him; she also announced to him the agreeable news of the king having granted him a pension of a thousand francs. He smiled and wept by turns as he told all this, and declared, much as he was elated at the possession of a sum which made him a rich man for life, the kindness of the Duchess gratified him even more. He then made us sit down while he read us two new poems, both charming and full of grace and naïveté, and one very affecting, being an address to the king, alluding to the death of his son. As he read his wife stood by, and fearing we did not quite comprehend his language, she made a remark to that effect, to which he answered impatiently: 'Nonsense!—don't you see they are in tears?' This was unanswerable, and we were allowed to hear the poem to the end, and I certainly never listened to anything more feelingly and energetically delivered. We had much conversation, for he was anxious to detain us, and in the course of it he told me that he had been by some accused of vanity. 'Oh!' he rejoined, 'que voulez vous? I am a child of nature, and cannot conceal my feelings; the only difference between me and a man of refinement is, that he knows how to conceal his vanity and exultation at success, while I let everybody see.'"—Paris Correspondent of the "Publisher's Circular."

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York.

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY AND 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

CALIFORNIA

Home Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Dearing, A. B. McCreery, C. Dusenberry, C. J. Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heynemann, R. G. Sneath, C. P. MacDermot, J. C. Wimmerding, Levi Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, E. J. Thibault, S. Hemmaway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michiel.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.

B. F. LOWE, President.

JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary, no5-3m

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs. Talant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent. no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure BUILDINGS, MERCHANDISE, FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
no25-4f 206 Front street, corner of California.

LOCKE & MONTAGUE, IMPORTERS OF STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Jy2

DONOHOF, KELLY & CO.,
EUGENE KELLY & CO.,
Bankers.

NEW YORK. EXCHANGE ON BANK OF LONDON, London, Jy2
BANK OF IRELAND.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO., 517
CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.
Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern ny25BRANDRETH'S PILLS!
THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!
PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE.

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Constiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S

no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platina, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anæsthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. de10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL!

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. dc3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. jul8

CARPETS.

We have just received and are now opening
NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF WILTON

—AND—

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES.

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCADELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets. no12

RUPTURE.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club-feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street,
Between Montgomery and Kearny.
Manufactory, 232 Sutter street. dc3

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,
SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,

Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office.)

SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Carabines on the Pacific Coast, viz., Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballard's, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. ja8-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, ETC.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

WILSON & EVANS,
No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco,
And 122 J street, Sacramento. dc3-3m

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 17

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

ALTA MILLS,

STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, - - - SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., - - - Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large; Hominy, Small; Oatmeal, Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order. de17-3m

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago, I was courting a handsome young girl; Since then I went travelling up country, you know, And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet, Of course she must know very well; Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps— Been searching at every hotel; I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street, To search for another young girl; And every fine lady I chance for to meet, I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery, To look for my sweet little Belle; And who in the name you think I should see? A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last; Are you lying, or here in disguise?" And what do you think, my friends, it was? A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29-3m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms. ju25

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,
No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every description, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear.

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-order to a steam engine —a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOMMY, Plaintiff; vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant:—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons —if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By G. C. LETCHER, Deputy Clerk.

Chas. McC. Delany, Plaintiff's Attorney. de24-3m

WISTAR'S BALSAM

WILD CHERRY

HAS BEEN USED FOR
NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,
With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN
CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the medicinal gun of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "utmost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass. and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY

Is for sale by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,
San Francisco.

And by all Druggists.

ja28-1m

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, Etc.

Especially attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDS

ENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

ja28-1f

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of

GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

NEW YORK,

397 Broadway.

de31-3m

S. W. H. WARD & SON,
323 Montgomery street,
San Francisco, Cal.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP
HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere

ja25-1f

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATED

Salt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers, Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, FIFTY CENTS.
Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by

MRS. A. GRIDLEY,

Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,
AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.

TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,

Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

ja25-1f

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!

DE GRATH'S GENUINE

ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES.

Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,

416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

ja25

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and rosy hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,

416 and 418 Front street,
San Francisco.

ja25-1f

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

THE DRAMATIC TROUPE

In the Elegant Comedy of

THE FOLLIES OF A NIGHT!

Together with MISS JENNY KEMPTON, and

The Eureka Minstrel Troupe,

Who will also appear in the

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, January 28th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock

LAST PERFORMANCES

OF THE CELEBRATED ENGLISH ARTISTES,

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Kean!

Supported by Miss CHAPMAN, Mr. CATHCART, and Mr. EVERETT, previous to their final departure from California by the steamer on the 31 of February.

This Saturday Evening, January 28th, 1865,

These distinguished Artistes will appear in

LOUIS XI.!

MONDAY January 30th
GRAND SHAKSPEARIAN FESTIVAL
Selections from The Merchant of Venice, Romeo and Juliet
As You Like It, and the Comedy of Much Ado About Nothing.

Tuesday January 31st
FAREWELL BENEFIT of Mr. KEAN.

THE IRON CHEST.
Sir Edward Mortimer Mr. Kean

THE HONEYMOON.
The Duke Mr. Kean | Julian Mrs. Kean

Wednesday February 1st
POSITIVELY the last appearance those GREAT ARTISTES will ever make in California.

HENRY VIII.,

Cardinal Woolsey Mr. Kean | The Queen Mrs. Kean
THE JEALOUS WIFE.

Mr. and Mrs. Kean's party have taken their passage by the Golden Age.

MECHANICS' PAVILION.

Grand Roman Hippodrome,

—AND—

MAMMOTH CIRCUS!

GRAND COMPLIMENTARY BENEFIT

TENDERED TO THE

ST. ANDREW'S SOCIETY

OF SAN FRANCISCO,

Will take place

On Tuesday Evening, January 31st,

On which occasion will be presented the most entertaining Bill of the season, by the entire Troupe of Artists now performing at this immense institution.

ADMISSION:

Family Circle and Promenade 50 cents.
Parquet 25 cents.
Reserved Chairs One Dollar.

Tickets to be had at the Rooms of the Society, 522 Market street, or of any of the members.

ja28

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

FAREWELL BENEFIT

OF

FRANK MAYO!

On Thursday Evening, February 2d, 1865.

The Great Drama of

The Three Guardsmen!

With other Numerous and SELECT ENTERTAINMENTS.

RE-APPEARANCE AT THIS HOUSE OF

MR. HARRY COURTAINE.

For particulars, see Bills of the Day!

BOX BOOK NOW OPEN.

ja28-1f

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY!

MARY'S VALENTINE.

Bright flowers shall bloom wherever we rove,
A voice divine shall talk in each stream,
The stars shall look like worlds of love,
And this earth be all one beautiful dream,
In our eyes—if thou'lt be mine.

KATY'S VALENTINE.

Among the many fair and bright,
My fancy early singled thee;
Then bend on me thine eyes of light,
And all my love shall flow to thee.

MAGGIE'S VALENTINE.

Yes, I'm happy while fate leaves me
One kind heart to warmly prize,
While the light of pure affection
Beams within thy gentle eyes.

ALLIE'S VALENTINE.

May'st thou live in joy forever!
Naught from thee true pleasure sever;
From thy heart arise no sigh,
And no tear bedew thine eye;
Joys be many, cares be few,
Smooth the path thou shalt pursue;
And Heaven's richest blessings shine,
Ever on both thee and thine.

NETTIE'S VALENTINE.

Oh, speak not of daisies or rosebuds of Spring,
Or bright pearly dewdrops, or any such thing,
For thy worth and virtues much more do combine,
And gladly I'd take thee for my Valentine.

VALENTINES in extra fine French Boxes—also in solid Rosewood and Mahogany cases. Sold with or without Jewelry.

VALENTINES of every conceivable variety—Valentine Cards, Valentine Mottos.

SEVENTEEN new and original California Comics, ye Copperheads, etc.

NEW CALIFORNIA VALENTINE WRITER, and other kinds, comic and sentimental.

APPLETON'S VALENTINE EXPRESS—with Eight Horses, will deliver Valentines every hour on Valentine's Day in every part of the City.

D. E. APPLETON & CO.,

508 Montgomery street, and

620 Market street,

Opposite the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum.
Jan14-4t

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.

A. Roman & Co.,

TAKE PLEASURE in announcing the following list of NEW BOOKS just received from the East:

Enoch Arden. 1 vol. small quarto, elegantly illustrated. Blue and Gold edition.

Clover Stories of many Lands, by John G. Saxe. 1 vol. 4to, illustrated.

The Queens of Song. Being memoirs of the most celebrated female vocalists. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portraits. All lovers of the Opera will be delighted with this charming volume.

The Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, with a memoir. 2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, tinted paper.

Doran's Complete Works. 9 vols., cloth and half Turkey, with the "Annals of the Stago."

Arctic Researches and Life Among the Esquimaux, by Charles F. Hall. 1 vol. 8vo, illustrated. Ranks next to that of Dr. Kane.

Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. 1 vol. 12mo. The latest contribution to the great Theological Controversy in England.

John Godfrey's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor. 1 vol. 12mo. An absorbing story of American life.

Golden Leaves from the American Poets. 1 vol. 16mo., vellum and morocco. A tasteful selection from our most popular Poets.

The Gentle Life. 1 vol. 16mo. An elegant series of Essays on the Formation of Character.

Following the Flag, by "Carleton." A fascinating juvenile.

Elmton, by Charles Lamb. 1 vol. 12mo. Being the heretofore uncollected writings of "Elia."

Autumn Holidays in the Country, by the "Country Parson." 1 vol. 12mo.

The Queen of the Ormby, by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids. 1 vol. 12mo.

A New Atmosphere, by Gail Hamilton. 1 vol. 12mo.

Looking Towards Sunset, by L. M. Child. 1 vol. 4to.

Love and Duty. 1 vol. 12mo.

Lost Love. 1 vol. 12mo.

Margaret Denzil's History. 1 vol. paper.

Bohemians of London. 1 vol. 12mo.

Autobiography of Gen. Scott. 2 vols. 12mo.

Woodcliff, by Harriet B. McKeever. 1 vol. 12mo.

Hymns of the Ages. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

Old Merchants of New York. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

In addition to the above we have a large list of other NEW BOOKS, together with a complete stock in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

All are cordially invited to call and examine.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,
417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.
ja28-1m

The Californian

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II., No. 10.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 4, 1865.

TERMS $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE.
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

The Down Trip of the "Constitution"—By "Pulgers."
Not an "Intercepted Letter."
Hum, the Son of Buz.
"A Little Box for You, sir."
Adventure with a Boa Constrictor.

ONLY A CLOD—Miss Braddon's New Novel, Chapter XIV.

POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

"Brother Doc"—By Emilio Lawson.
Dreamland.
In the Porch.

EDITORIALS:

Copple and his Critics.
"A Complaint of Friends."
Paragraphs on Minor Topics.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS:

A Condensation of the Telegraphic War News of the Week.

CITY AND INTERIOR ITEMS:

The News at Home and Abroad in Brief.

NEW BOOKS:

Notices of New Publications.

DRAMATIC MENTION:

The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NOT AN "INTERCEPTED LETTER."

WHAT a dismal, dreary, miserable night is this which closes the twenty-fifth day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-five! The rain beats against the window pane in a manner well calculated to recall to one's mind that "little damp spell," which occurred, as we are credibly informed, during the life-time of Noah—an individual who rendered himself famous by the invention of sailing-vessels and wine-biters—and the wind howls through the deserted streets and whistles through each crack and crevice of door and window with that peculiarly mournful sound which never fails to give one the blues, and render those who are of a superstitious turn of mind somewhat nervous about looking over their shoulders.

I have been sitting here in my cosy little room, watching the bright flames dancing and sparkling up the chimney, and wondering what I should do by way of self-amusement. I had thrown by my sewing, leaving my work-basket, as usual, in a most inextricable state of confusion; I had taken up—and laid aside—Robert Browning's Sordello, (wish I had brains enough to understand it, but I haven't!) when, as if to keep me from utterly despairing—or was it another verification of the proverb, "Satan finds some mischief still," etc.?—I caught a glimpse of THE CALIFORNIAN, and "an idea struck me." I would write that blessed journal a letter!—not an "intercepted letter," but one which I would carefully deposit in THE CALIFORNIAN's contribution box; and by so doing add to the most valuable and interesting contents of that most interesting and valuable paper. Why shouldn't I, since all the Claras, Minnies, Matildas and Bella Donnas seem to have deserted it, of late? So here am I, "an' it please you," to make my best bow before a "Californian" audience.

Now, my dear friends, if there is a perceptible awkwardness in this my first prose contribution—though not, as INIGO might inform you, my first prosy one—you will please lay it to the fact of my being more addicted to rhyme than reason, my pen having been diverted from what it has always considered its legitimate channel, by the recently acquired knowledge that poetry, as a general thing, is only less appreciated than its writers, and not half so readily sold.

Could a sadder comment be made upon the degree of refinement and intellectuality existing in these dis-United States of ours than is contained in the statement of E. D. B. S., your New York correspondent; namely, that Artemus Ward was clearing his three hundred dollars a night by the "show business" in that remarkable city, and that Bryant had lost several hundred by the publication of his Thirty Poems? Yet "Such is life!" Genius starves to feast buffoonery; oratorical gems and scientific lectures may be delivered to half-priced and half-filled houses; but thousands will rush to hear a wordy mass of worn-out Joe-Millerisms, bad puns, and worse grammar, from the lips of some masculine humbug, whose chief recommendation is a certain metal of yellowish hue, which he carries, not in his pockets, but in his face.

What wonder that America produces so few good authors, when such is the encouragement and reward held out to them! I may be mistaken, but it seems to me that Europe is a better mother to her children of the lyre and quill—holding them closer to her heart; and though, judging from what is told us of her past method of feeding some of her song-birds, she would not make a very good stepmother, according to the generally accepted test of worthiness in that respected relative, still she is never chary of merited praise; she delights in their successes, and, in conferring honor upon them, remembers the honor reflected by them upon the land which gives them birth. Acting upon the principle that "charity begins at home," she gives from the abundance of her praise first to the bards of her own bosom; while we, I take it, are only too lavish of encomium upon the poets of other lands, and too backward in recognizing the merits of our own. Why is it so? Is America afraid of acknowledging her own intellect, lest it call forth the mocking laugh and jeer of some nation that in its trembling dotage is jealous of her fresh young bloom?

I do not imagine the home-fame of Bryant or Longfellow to be nearly so great as that of Alfred Tennyson. Perhaps you will say, "And justly so;" but I cannot agree with you. Certainly, if the laurel is to be given to that poet who can most dazzle, bewilder and delight by the very gorgeousness and splendor of his imagination and expression, then, indeed, does Alfred Tennyson, as supremely the master of the Beautiful, deserve to wear the crown; but if it is to rest with him who can touch with the rarest, subtlest skill the chords of the human heart, are there not poets in our own land who stand upon equal ground with the poet-laureate of Great Britain?

Yet it is not to be wondered at that our literature is a source of mockery and merriment, when we think with what trash, of the "broad-grin" style, our journals and periodicals are constantly filled, to suit the tawdry and vitiated taste of the public. So much is this the case that it has almost passed into a proverb that the proof of a good paper is its early decease; in which respect they may be said to resemble those good little boys and girls of whom we read in the Sabbath school stories for the improvement of the young—not one of whom ever reaches the age of maturity unless it be by having previously become hopelessly stupid and depraved.

Perhaps of all States in the Union our beautiful California is the most noted—not altogether justly—for its uncultivated taste, so far as literature is concerned. Yet, as in all new countries the rule is muscle before brain, it is to be hoped and believed that she will yet prove as prolific in "poetry and the fine arts" as she has been in tropical fruit and the golden ore. As yet but a pretty babe of some sixteen or eighteen summers, there is hope for her when she attains to her full growth; for if the "spirit of prophecy dwelleth in me," there is a greater and a grander destiny before our young Star of the West than has been attained by any or all of her elder sisters of the Union.

To return for a moment to Bryant's Thirty Poems—how few of our citizens, in the perusal of "Waiting at the Gate," but will think sadly and fondly of those death-mute, yet still eloquent lips, from which they first heard the silvery rhythm and flow of those beautiful verses; or who, in renewing their remembrance from the printed page, but will turn sorrowfully away—

"And miss the music of a voice Earth may not ever hear again."

Am I becoming wearisome? I did not think of giving so long a dissertation on the poeticals; but I am writing for self-amusement to-night, you know, and so jot down whatever is uppermost in my mind. Unfortunately, I seldom attend balls and merry-makings, being a very quiet, stay-at-home little body; in fact, one of those model wives, of which the newspapers are forever preaching, who pass their lives in a most exemplary devotion to the members of their own households; alternating between the bliss of mending husband's stockings, and feeding "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" to a teething baby. So, of course, I cannot give you any dashing description of Mrs. So-and-so's grand soirée, neither can I go into ecstasies over the adornment of the ladies, or embalm the brilliancy and wit of the gentlemen—or rather of their Habanas and champagne. Politics are the forbidden fruit to "us" females, therefore I dare not give expression to any outpourings of patriotism, lest I should be assailed by some of our wise and far-sighted journals as a strong-minded woman, or a Copperhead. Having written this letter at all, is bad enough. I don't know what Jones would say if he knew it, Heaven bless his innocent, unsuspecting soul! It was only the other day he lifted himself up by the hair, a la "Mathew Pocket," because I ventured an opinion concerning certain litterati of our coast; and very kindly advised me to be less literary and more domestic, puddings rather than poetry being the proper sphere of woman; whereat I meekly bowed my head, and stood abashed and silent in the presence of my lord and master. Perhaps THE CALIFORNIAN will be tempted to wish I had taken his advice; but if it doesn't choose to accept my sixty minutes' worth of ink and paper—why, we won't quarrel; nor will it be the first time that its Editor and myself have held contrary opinions concerning my contributions. I feel for the "typos," though, if they should have to "set up" this manuscript; knowing they will utter—"not loud but deep," on beholding the undecipherable chirography. My writing is not very ornamental, that's true—but talented people seldom do write well!

My fire is becoming extinguished, and it is time the lights followed suit. By the way, what a strange fascination there is about a fire! not only "in the eighth," but on the "hearth of home." I never see the sparkling, glowing embers of a real, old-fashioned, grate-ful fire, but I think of that beautiful little Scotch song "Castles in the Air." You like to republish pretty things, sometime—won't you permit me to close my letter by quoting it? Here it is:

CASTLES IN THE AIR.

The bonnie, bonnie, bairn, sits pokin' in the aae,
Glowerin' in the fire wi' his wee round face;
Laughin' at the fuffin' lowe—what sees he there?
Ha! the young dreamer's biggin' castles in the air!

His wee chubby face, an' his tonzy curly pow,
Are laughin' an' noddin' to the dancin' lowe,
He'll brown his rosy cheeks, and singe his sunny hair,
Glowrin' at the imps wi' their castles in the air.

He sees muckle castles towerin' to the moon,
He sees little sodgers pu'in' them a' down;
Warlds whomling up an' down, bleedin' wi' a flare,
Losh! how he lous, as they glimmer in the air.

For a' sae sage he looks, what can the laddie ken?
He's thinkin' upon naething, like many mighty men,
A wee thing mak' us think, a sma' thing mak' us stare—
There are mair folk than him biggin' castles in the air.

Sic a night in winter may weel mak him cauld;
His chin upon his buffy hand will soon mak him auld;
His brow is hrent sae braid, oh pray that Daddy Care
Wad let the wean alane wi' his castles in the air.

He'll glower at the fire, an' he'll keek at the light;
But mony sparkling stars are swallow'd up by Night;
Aulder een than his are glamor'd by a glare,
Hearts are broken, heads are turned, wi' castles in the air.

Is not that pretty? I think so; and so, I am sure, will many of your readers. Good-night. Remember me when you go to Press.

By the way, how does INIGO succeed in the Cod Liver Oil speculation?
MEG MERRILL.

A CLUB is being formed in Paris, called "The Club of Silence." The rules are that not a word is to be spoken in the club by members or attendants. Eating, drinking, smoking, and reading will be allowed, but nothing else. The attendants are to receive written orders only. It is curious that at the head of this brilliant idea is one of the greatest prattlers in France—namely, Senator Marquis de Boissy.

HUM, THE SON OF BUZ.

[THE following charming story of "Hum, the Son of Buz," we take from Our Young Folks—a magazine for the youth of both sexes, lately started by Ticknor & Fields. If the standard adopted in the first number be maintained to the end, the magazine seems destined to prove a certain and permanent success. Roman & Co. are the agents in this city.]

AT Rye Beach, during our summer's vacation, there came, as there always will to seaside visitors, two or three cold, chilly, rainy days—days when the skies that long had not rained a drop seemed suddenly to bethink themselves of their remissness, and to pour down water, not by drops, but by pailfuls. The chilly wind blew and whistled, the water dashed along the ground, and careered in foamy rills along the roadside, and the bushes bent beneath the constant flood. It was plain that there was to be no sea-bathing on such a day, no walks, no rides; and so shivering and drawing our blanket-shawls close about us, we sat down to the window to watch the storm outside. The rose-bushes under the window hung dripping under their load of moisture, each spray shedding a constant shower on the spray below it. On one of these lower sprays, under the perpetual drip, what should we see but a poor little humming-bird, drawn up into the tiniest shivering ball, and clinging with a desperate grasp to his uncomfortable perch. A humming-bird we knew him to be at once, though his feathers were so matted and glued down by the rain that he looked not bigger than a honey bee, and as different as possible from the smart, pert, airy little character that we had so often seen flirting with the flowers. He was evidently a humming-bird in adversity, and whether he ever would hum again looked to us exceedingly doubtful. Immediately, however, we sent out to have him taken in. When the friendly hand seized him, he gave a little, faint, watery squeak, evidently thinking that his last hour was come, and that grim Death was about to carry him off to the land of dead birds. What a time we had reviving him—holding the little wet thing in the warm hollow of our hands, and feeling him shiver and palpitate! His eyes were fast closed; his tiny claws which looked slender as cobwebs, were knotted close to his body, and it was long before one could feel the least motion in them. Finally, to our great joy, we felt a brisk little kick, and then a flutter of wings, and then a determined peck of the beak, which showed that there was some bird left in him yet, and that he meant at any rate to find out where he was.

Unclosing our hands a small space, out popped the little head with a pair of round brilliant eyes. Then we bethought ourselves of feeding him, and forthwith prepared him a stiff glass of sugar and water, a drop of which we held to his bill. After turning his head attentively, like a bird, who knew what he was about and didn't mean to be chaffed, he briskly put out a long, flexible tongue, slightly forked at the end, and licked off the comfortable beverage with great relish. Immediately he was pronounced out of danger by the small humane society which had taken charge of his restoration, and we began to cast about for getting him a settled establishment in our apartment. I gave up my work-box to him as a sleeping-room, and it was medically ordered that he should take a nap. So we filled the box with cotton, and he was formally put to bed with a folded cambric handkerchief round his neck, to keep him from beating his wings. Out of his white wrappings he broke forth green and grave as any judge with his bright round eyes. Like a bird of discretion, he seemed to understand what was being done to him, and resigned himself sensibly to go to sleep.

The box was covered with a sheet of paper perforated with holes for purposes of ventilation; for even humming-birds have a little pair of lungs, and need their own little portion of air to fill them, so that they may make bright scarlet little drops of blood to keep life's fire burning in their tiny bodies.

Our bird's lungs manufactured brilliant blood, as we found out by experience; for in his first nap he contrived to nestle himself into the cotton of which his bed was made, and to get more of it than he needed into his long bill. We pulled it out as carefully as we could, but there came out of his bill two round, bright, scarlet, little drops of blood. Our chief medical authority looked grave, pronounced a probable hemorrhage from the lungs, and gave him over at once. We, less scientific, declared that we had only ent his little tongue by drawing out the filaments of cotton, and that he would do well enough in time—as it afterward appeared he did—for from that time there was no more bleeding. In the course of the second day he began to take short flights about the room, though he seemed to prefer to return to us—perching on our fingers or heads or shoulders, and sometimes choosing to sit in this way for half an hour at a time. "These great giants," he seemed to say to himself, "are not bad people after all; they have a comfortable way with them; how nicely they dried and warmed me! Truly a bird might do worse than to live with them."

So he made up his mind to form a fourth in the little company of three that usually sat and read, worked and stitched, in that apartment, and we christened him, "Hum, the son of Buz." He became an individuality, a character, whose little doings formed a part of every letter, and some extracts from these will show what some of his little ways were.

"Hum has learned to sit upon my finger and eat his sugar and water out of a tea-spoon with most Christian-like decorum. He has but one weakness—he will occasionally jump into the spoon and sit in his sugar and water, and then appear to wonder where it goes to. His plumage is in rather a drabbed state, owing to these performances. I have sketched him as he sat to-day on a bit of Spiraea which I brought in for him. When absorbed in reflection, he sits with his bill straight up in the air, as I have drawn him. Mr. A—reads Macaulay to us, and you should see the wise air with which, perched on Jenny's thumb, he cocked his head now one side and then the other, apparently listening with most critical attention. His confidence in us seems unbounded; he lets us stroke his head, smooth his feathers, without a flutter; and is never better pleased than sitting, as he has been doing all this while, on my hand, turning up his bill and watching my face with great edification.

"I have just been having a sort of maternal struggle to make him go to bed in his box; but he evidently considers himself sufficiently convalescent to make a stand for his rights as a bird, and so scratched indignantly out of his wrappings, and set himself up to roost on the edge of his box, with an air worthy of a turkey, at the very least. Having brought in a lamp, he has opened his eyes round and wide, and sits cocking his little head at me reflectively."

When the weather cleared away, and the sun came out bright, Hum became entirely well, and seemed resolved to take the measure of his new life with us. Our windows were closed in the lower part of the sash by frames with mosquito gauze, so that the sun and air found free admission, and yet our little rover could not pass out. On the first sunny day he took an exact survey of our apartment from ceiling to floor, humming about, examining every point with his bill—all the crevices, mouldings, each little indentation in the bedposts, each window-pane, each chair and stand; and, as it was a very simply furnished seaside apartment, his scrutiny was soon finished. We wondered, at first, what this was all about; but, on watching him more closely, we found that he was actively engaged in getting his living, by darting out his long tongue hither and thither, and drawing in all the tiny flies and insects which in summer time are to be found in an apartment. In short, we found that, though the nectar of flowers was his dessert, yet he had his roast beef and mutton chop to look after, and that his bright, brilliant blood was not made out of a simple vegetarian diet. Very shrewd and keen he was, too, in measuring the size of insects before he attempted to swallow them. The smallest class were whisked off with lightning speed; but about larger ones he would sometimes wheel and hum for some minutes, darting hither and thither, and surveying them warily; and if satisfied that they could be carried, he would come down with a quick, central dart, which would finish the unfortunate at a snap. The larger flies seemed to irritate him—especially when they intimated to him that his plumage was sugary, by settling on his wings and tail, when he would lay about him spitefully, wielding his bill like a sword. A grasshopper that strayed in, and was sunning himself on the window seat, gave him great discomposure. Hum evidently considered him an intruder, and seemed to long to make a dive at him; but, with characteristic prudence, confined himself to threatening movements, which did not exactly hit. He saw evidently that he could not swallow him whole, and what might ensue from trying him piecemeal he wisely forebore to essay.

Hum had his own favorite places and perches. From the first day he chose for his nightly roost a towel-line which had been drawn across the corner over the wash-stand, where he every night established himself with one claw in the edge of the towel and the other clasping the line, and, ruffling up his feathers till he looked like a little chestnut-bar, he would resign himself to the soundest sleep. He did not tuck his head under his wing, but seemed to sink it down between his shoulders, with his bill almost straight up in the air. One evening, one of us, going to use the towel, jarred the line, and soon after found that Hum had been thrown from his perch, and was hanging head downward fast asleep, still clinging to the line. Another evening, being discomposed by somebody coming to the towel-line after he had settled himself, he fluttered off; but so sleepy that he had not discretion to poise himself again, and was found elinging, like a little bunch of green floss silk, to the mosquito netting of the window.

A day after this we brought in a large green bough, and put it over the looking-glass. Hum noticed it before it had been there five minutes, flew to it, and began a regular survey, perching now here, now there, till he seemed to find a twig that exactly suited him; and after that he roosted there every night. Who does not see in this change all the signs of reflection and reason that are shown by us in thinking over our circumstances, and trying to better them? It seemed to say in so many words: "That towel-line is an unsafe place for a bird; I got frightened, and wake from bad dreams to find myself head downward; so I will find a better roost on this twig."

When our little Jenny one day put on a clean white muslin gown, embellished with red sprigs, Hum flew towards her, and with his bill made instant examination of these new appearances; and one day, being very affectionately disposed, perched himself on her shoulder, and sat some time. On another occasion, while Mr. A—was reading, Hum established himself on the top of his head, just over the middle of his forehead, in the precise place where our young belles have lately worn stuffed humming-birds, making him look as if dressed out for a party. Hum's most favorite perch was the back of the great rocking-chair, which, being covered with a tidy, gave some hold into which he could catch his little claws. There he would sit, balancing himself cleverly if its occupant chose to swing to and fro, and seeming to be listening to the conversation or reading.

Hum had his different moods, like human beings. On cold, cloudy, gray days, he appeared to be somewhat depressed in spirits, hummed less about the room, and sat humped up with his feathers ruffled, looking as much like a bird in a great coat as possible. But on hot, sunny days, every feather sleeked itself down, and his little body looked natty and trim, his head alert, his eyes bright, and it was impossible to come near him, for his agility. Then let mosquitoes and little flies look about them! Hum snapped them up without mercy, and seemed to be all over the ceiling in a moment, and resisted all our efforts at any personal familiarity with a sane alacrity.

Hum had his established institutions in our room, the chief of which was a tumbler with a little sugar and water mixed in it, and a spoon laid across, out of which he helped himself whenever he felt in the mood—sitting on the edge of the tumbler, and dipping his long bill, and lapping with his little forked tongue like a kitten. When he found his spoon accidentally dry, he would stoop over and dip his bill in the water in the tumbler—which caused the prophecy on the part of some of his guardians, that he would fall in some day and be drowned. For which reason it was agreed to keep only an inch in depth of the fluid at the bottom of the tumbler. A wise precaution this proved; for the next morning I was awakened, not by the usual hum over my head, but by a sharp little flutter, and found Mr. Hum beating his wings in the tumbler—having actually tumbled in during his energetic efforts to get his morning coffee before I was awake.

Hum seemed perfectly happy and satisfied in his quarters—but one day, when the door was left open, made a dart out, and so into the open sunshine. Then, to be sure, we thought we had lost him. We took the mosquito netting out of all the windows, and, setting his tumbler of sugar and water in a conspicuous place, went about our usual occupations. We saw him joyous and brisk among the honeysuckles outside the window, and it was gravely predicted that he would return no more. But at dinner-time in came Hum, familiar as possible, and sat down to his spoon as if nothing had happened; instantly we closed our windows, and had him secure once more.

At another time I was going to ride to the Atlantic House, about a mile from my boarding-place. I left all secure, as I supposed, at home. While gathering moss on the walls there, I was surprised by a little green humming-bird flying familiarly right towards my face, and humming above my head. I called out, "Here is Hum's very brother." But, on returning home, I saw that the door of the room was open, and Hum was gone. Now certainly we gave him up for lost. I sat down to painting, and in a few minutes in flew Hum, and settled on the edge of my tumbler in a social, confidential way, which seemed to say, "Oh, you've got back, then." After taking his usual drink of sugar and water, he began to fly about the ceiling as usual, and we gladly shut him in.

When our five weeks at the seaside were up, and it was time to go home, we had great questionings what was to be done with Hum. To get him home with us was our desire—but whoever heard of a humming-bird travelling by railroad? Great were the consultations: a little basket of Indian work was filled up with cambric handkerchiefs, and a bottle of sugar and water provided, and we started with him on a day's journey. When we arrived at night, the first care was to see what had become of Hum, who had not been looked at since we fed him with sugar and water in Boston. We found him alive and well, but so dead asleep that we could not wake him to roost; so we put him to bed on a toilet cushion, and arranged his tumbler for morning. The next day found him alive and humming, exploring the room and pictures, perching now here and now there; but, as the weather was chilly, he sat for the most part of the time in a humped-up state on the tip of a pair of stag's horns. We moved him to a more sunny apartment; but, alas! the equinoctial storm came on, and there was no sun to be had for days. Hum was blue; the pleasant seaside days were over; his room was lonely, the pleasant three that had enlivened the apartment at Rye no longer came in and out; evidently he was lonesome, and gave way to depression. One chilly morning he managed again to fall into his tumbler, and wet himself through; and, notwithstanding warm bathtings and tender nursings, the poor little fellow seemed to get diphtheria, or something quite as bad for humming-birds.

We carried him to a neighboring sunny parlor, where ivy embowers all the walls, and the sun lies all day. There he revived a little, danced up and down, perched on a green spray that was wreathed across the breast of a Psyche, and looked then like a little flitting soul returning to its rest. Towards evening he drooped; and, having been nursed and warmed and cared for, he was put to sleep on a green twig laid on the piano. In that sleep the little head drooped—nodded—fell; and little Hum went where other bright dreams go—to the Land of the Hereafter.

THE LAST

—OF THE—

SEWING MACHINE

CONTROVERSY!

THE LIE NAILED!

VENTILATION OF

The Gross Mis-statements

—OF THE—

Florence Sewing Machine

AGENT.

Trickery! Knavery!

DECEPTION! LIES!

ARE OF NO AVAIL!!

THE GROVER & BAKER

SEWING MACHINE

UNSCATHED!

AND THE MISERABLY IMBECILE AND GROSSLY

FALSE STATEMENTS

—OF THE—

Agent of the Florence

SEWING MACHINE

EXPOSED!

Gross fraud upon the Public.

READ THE FOLLOWING:

A few weeks since we advertised the fact that the GROVER & BAKER MACHINE had received the Highest Premium at the Oregon State Fair, and the same result had attended our exhibitions at every State Fair held during the past four years, when in competition with others. This well-known fact was admitted virtually by all Sewing Machine Agents; but, two months afterward, the agent of the Florence machine—a disappointed aspirant to honors which never have and never will be awarded his complicated mass of unreliable and inferior mechanism—comes forward, and in the most audacious manner advertises that there was "A slight mistake about the Premium at the Oregon State Fair, that the Committee decided in favor of the Florence Machine," etc., followed by a card from a Mrs. Howe, one of the Committee, to that effect, and apparently substantiated by two other ladies, but not by all of the committee, which was composed of five ladies, and finally published and declares as a "Bogus Report," the genuine and only one, which gave the First Premium to GROVER & BAKER, and insinuates that the President of the Society (Judge Thornton) changed the report.

To all this we simply replied that the statement was FALSE, and that a reply would be given as soon as communication could be had with the proper parties in Oregon. We now propose to give the promised answer, in which it is not our purpose to discuss the means adopted to procure from Mrs. Howe her wonderfully incorrect card, nor in blinding the eyes of two others of the Committee in substantiating it, but simply to give through the President of the Society, and four of the five ladies who composed the Committee, the direct to the statement of the Florence machine Agent and his unscrupulous adherents, with a determination that this will be the last time that we shall be inveigled into noticing any emanations from such an unreliable and contemptible source, which seeks, by attacks upon our well-earned and world-wide reputation, to build up for himself and his heretofore unknown and unappreciated compound of complication an otherwise unheard-of fame.

Read the following Tissue of Falsehoods published by the Agent of the Florence Sewing Machine.

Having heard to-day for the first time that the Grover & Baker Sewing machine Company claim the First Premium on Sewing Machines and Sewing machine work at the Oregon State Fair, held in Salem, September, 1864, and being one of the Committee on Sewing machines and Sewing machine work at said Fair, I feel it my duty to make, and take pleasure in making the following statement:

Three (if not all) of the Committee were selected by a Mr. Johnson, (an employee of the Grover & Baker company,) and after a careful examination of the sewing machines and machine work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was finally decided and agreed by the committee to award the First Premium to the FLORENCE Machine, as the best machine for doing all grades of work; and a Premium to the Grover & Baker machine, for Embroidery; and the committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the committee and their final decision.

Signed, MARY A. HOWE, And indorsed by Mrs. Miller and Griffin, under misapprehension of its object and intent, as appears below.

Read the Further Comments of the Florence Agent.

Copy of the Bogus Report which was fraudulently substituted in the place of the Real Decision of the Committee, and which they signed without reading:

SEPTEMBER 29, 1864.

We the undersigned, a Committee appointed at the Fourth Annual Fair of the Oregon State Agricultural Society, to examine and report upon the merits of different Sewing Machines on exhibition, have endeavored to perform the duty with care and impartiality. In view of all the facts, we have decided to award the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second to the Florence. The principal fact influencing our decision in awarding the First Premium to the former, was the circumstance that it embroidered, while the other does not. We have, however, no hesitancy in saying that both have great merits; and we recommend them both to the patronage of the Oregon public.

MARY S. SMITH,
MARY A. HOWE,
EMILY C. GRIFFIN,
MARY ANN S. KNOX,
Committee

AND READ OUR REFUTATION

—OF THIS—

Most Scandalous Outrage

—ON—

TRUTH AND SENSE!

Extracts from an Affidavit in our Possession, from JUDGE J. L. THORNTON, President Oregon S. A. Society:

"I have this day seen an advertisement of the Florence Machine Company, containing an affidavit from Mrs. Mary A. Howe, November 4, 1864. My sense of duty to the Committee on Sewing Machines, appointed at the last State Agricultural Fair, not less than what I owe to myself, constrains me to affirm that this affidavit contains little else than a series of the most shameful untruths. In the first place, it is not true 'that on the fourth' day of November she heard for the first time that the GROVER & BAKER Sewing Machine Company claimed the FIRST PREMIUM. She knew it on the twenty-ninth of September. In the second place, it is not true that three, if not all, of the Committee, were selected by a Mr. Johnson, in the employ of the GROVER & BAKER Company. I knew none of the parties personally, or by name, until they came before me as President of the Society. I selected the Committee without even a suggestion from any one connected with the GROVER & BAKER Company, as to whom I should appoint. I do not even know the Mr. Johnson referred to. Mrs. Howe then proceeds to say: 'It was finally decided, and agreed by the ladies present, to award the first premium to the Florence Machine, as the best for doing all kinds of work; and the second premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to Judge Thornton, the President of the Fair, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated.' I do not think it possible for even Mrs. Howe to make another statement more wickedly false. The Hon. Mrs. Delazon Smith, Mrs. Howe, Mrs. Griffin, Mrs. Knox and Miss Mary Miller, were the Special Committee on Sewing Machines. * * * They came to me to make their report, and requested me to write it for them. They said verbally, (Mrs. Howe included,) that they had determined to award the first premium to the Grover & Baker, and the second premium to the Florence Machine, and assigned as a reason that the Grover & Baker embroidered, while the Florence did not; besides, the latter being more complicated and liable to get out of order, made them less desirable as a family machine. I wrote the Report which appears in their advertisement as a 'Bogus Report,' and after reading it, asked each lady present (including the veracious Mrs. Howe) if it contained an expression of their opinion, as the merits of the respective machines? Each for herself answered in the affirmative. It was then signed by them, and has never since been changed in a line or word. In short, all the material statements of Mrs. Howe are FALSE THROUGHOUT. * * *

(Signed) J. L. THORNTON."
Attested, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk.

STATEMENT OF MRS. DELAZON SMITH,
Another of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the Oregon State Fair, Whose statement was not taken by the Florence, as it would not suit their purpose.

* * * The Committee, after a long consultation, instructed the President, Judge Thornton, to write out a Report, awarding to the Grover & Baker Machine the First Premium and the Second Premium to the Florence Machine. The Report advertised by the Florence Machine Company, as being bogus was the genuine Report, as made out, read, and then signed by the four ladies of the Committee then present. The Committee were appointed by Judge Thornton, President of the Society, and not by a Mr. Johnson, as advertised by the agent of the Florence Machine; and further, Mrs. Howe, the person signing the statement advertised as aforesaid, must have understood that the Grover & Baker Machine was to have the First Premium, as she herself told me that the Florence Machine men were quite angry about the award of the First Premium to Grover & Baker, and would not allow the Second Premium Ribbon to be tied to their machine (the Florence.) I was decidedly in favor of awarding the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine * * * and was influenced in my decision by the fact that I considered the Florence Machine more complicated, and more liable to get out of order, * * * and I considered the Grover & Baker the most reliable and simple of the two. That it would do all the work the Florence would do, besides being the best for ornamental work. I was solicited by the other party for a statement of the facts in the case, which I offered to give, but was not accepted, as it was not agreeable to their wishes; and further state that the foregoing is true, anything to the contrary notwithstanding.

(Signed) MARY S. SMITH.
Sworn, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk, Linn county.

STATEMENT OF MRS. MARY ANN KNOX
Another of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the Oregon State Fair,

Whose statement was not taken by the Florence because it would not agree with their misrepresentations.

* * * Said Committee signed the Report awarding the First Premium to the "Grover & Baker" Machine, and the Report alleged by the Agent of the Florence as Bogus, was the True Report which was written out by the President, and read by the Committee before signing. The President asked the four ladies of the Committee, then present, if the Report was made out agreeable to their wishes; to which they answered in the affirmative; and the contents of the Report were understood by the ladies, particularly by Mrs. Howe, as she subsequently spoke of the dissatisfaction expressed by the Agent of the Florence Machine; she also stated that though she liked the work of the Florence, still, if she was going to purchase a Machine, she would purchase a Grover & Baker, particularly on account of its ornamental work. Mrs. Griffin also expressed herself in the same manner. * * * I also stated that under no consideration would I sign a Report in favor of giving the Premium to the Florence Machine. * * * I consider it to be a complicated and delicate piece of Machinery, unfit for general use among the people in the country, while the Grover & Baker had proved itself to be perfect in every respect. Mr. Thornton, President of the Society, appointed the Committee. I signed the Report with a full and complete understanding of its contents, and believe the others of the four ladies understood it as well as myself.

(Signed) MRS. ANN S. KNOX.
Sworn, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk, Linn county.

STATEMENT OF MRS. EMILY C. GRIFFIN,
Another of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the Oregon State Fair,
Who was inveigled into signing the Florence Document by False Representations.

* * * * On or about the 15th day of December, Rev. J. L. Parrish, (acting for the Florence Machine,) called with a written statement, purporting to have been made by Mrs. Mary A. Howe; the printed statement shown me this day, as having been published in the San Francisco Alta, and signed by Mrs. Howe, is not such as was represented at the time, as it contains many errors that I could not understandingly have signed it. The report which we made at the time, awarded the First Premium to the GROVER & BAKER Machine, and the Second Premium to the Florence; the report which is advertised as being bogus is the genuine Report, which we four ladies signed at the time. My intention in making the previous affidavit was simply to state that one of the principal reasons for awarding the premium to GROVER & BAKER'S Machine was on account of its embroidery.

(Signed) EMILY C. GRIFFIN.
Sworn, signed and sealed before James Elkins, County Clerk, Linn county.

STATEMENT OF MRS. MARY MILLER,
Another of the Ladies of the Committee,
Who was inveigled, against her views, into signing the Florence document.

In order to place myself right in the controversy regarding the award of the First Premium on Sewing Machines, I would state that I was not present at the time the award was made, but thought the Florence Machine received the premium for sewing, and GROVER & BAKER'S for embroidery, but am willing to state that the Report published as bogus is the genuine one. In making my affidavit I simply intended to state my impressions, without swearing to facts, as represented in Mrs. Howe's card.

(Signed) MARY MILLER.

The above is an effectual exhibit of a most dastardly attempt to ROB THE GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE of fairly earned honors, by the most contemptible series of falsehoods, misrepresentations and innuendoes by the Agent of the Florence Machine, who has not dared advertise in Oregon, where the premium in question was obtained, any denial of it; but seeks at this distance, by establishing a controversy, to attract, by time and false impressions, attention to his wares. We drop the foul affair, leaving the public, who may have an interest in the Sewing Machine question, to form their own estimates of the merit of a Sewing Machine which requires bolstering up by such means, in comparison with the

"GROVER & BAKER,"

which, for fifteen years, by actual worth and honorable competition, has fairly earned the reputation of being

THE BEST IN USE.

R. G. BROWN,
Agent Grover & Baker S. M. Co.,
ja28-11 329 Montgomery street

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere

ja25 tf

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATED

Salt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers,
Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, - - - - - FIFTY CENTS.
Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by

MRS. A. GRIDLEY,
Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,
AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.

TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,
Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!

DE GRATH'S GENUINE

ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES.

Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetters, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
ja25 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers vote with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN:

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blotches. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roseate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
San Francisco.

ja25 tf

MINOR EDITORIALS.

THE REASON WHY.—We are in receipt of a courteous communication from a correspondent over the signature of "Don Caesar," expressing surprise that THE CALIFORNIAN was so ungallant as to omit all mention of the youthful beauties at a late entertainment, and supplying the want by mentioning a number of names and dresses. In reply, thanking our correspondent for his kindness, we must first remind him that gallantry is scarcely a newspaper staple, though courtesy to ladies is not at all at variance with the profession. "Don Caesar" would scarcely think it necessary to go into a garden and single out each individual rose and rosebud for compliment, telling the color and fragrance of each, when one expression of admiration would answer for all. However, ladies' dress being a matter of general interest—for ladies constitute a very large proportion of the public and our readers—we shall always be happy to print what is worn at each entertainment in town, if any friend posted in that department of literature will furnish the items. In the present instance a great deal has already been written and said on the subject, and if the young ladies for once have been neglected at our hands, certainly they have no reason to complain of the conduct of our contemporaries. In any event, want of space in this issue compels the omission of "Don Caesar's" communication; so, expressing a hope to hear from him again, we rather regretfully lay it on the table—perhaps to find publication next week.

STILL ANOTHER NEW PAPER.—We imagined that the mania for starting new papers had abated, but it seems that it still rages. We have before us a prospectus for the California Rural Home Journal, "A Semi-monthly Publication to be devoted to the improvement of Agriculture, Horticulture, Viniculture, Arboriculture, Sheep Husbandry, Farm-Stock, Rural Architecture, Select Literature, Domestic Economy, the Practical Sciences, the Social Circle, Markets, News, etc.," to be published by T. Hart Hyatt & Co., the first number of which is expected to appear about the middle of the present month. We do not pretend to say that there is no room for such a paper among us, but we do mainly doubt whether its publication can be made profitable. Nothing is easier than to start a paper, but few things in life are more difficult than to carry one on, especially where the population is limited and the field already overrun. The rewards of journalism are slower and more uncertain than those which follow the investment of capital in any other business or profession, and the only wonder is that people so eagerly turn to it. Five new papers have been started within a month; that they may all succeed we hope, but money could have been saved had the proprietors bought out some of the papers already established instead. We are sorry to notice that the sprightly little Puck failed to put its girdle round our social world once a week, only aspiring now to belt us with fun monthly; but we very much fear that the publication will not prove profitable even then.

SAILED.—Among the many old and distinguished citizens that were whirled away from our shores by the rolling wheels of the outgoing Golden Age yesterday, went Col. Joseph Clark, one of the lucky gentlemen who struck the Comstock Ledge and Gold Hill when those famous claims went a-begging. "Joseph" is a name suggestive of pleasant and virtuous memories to biblical students, and, in manner somewhat like, recollections of its present possessor, the friend whose departure we now chronicle, will long remain fragrant in the memory of his many friends. A pleasant voyage and a safe return to Joseph, whether he bring up at an American port or stretch his steps to the confines of other continents. He is possessed of enough "feet" to carry him anywhere he chooses to go, and blessed are the feet-makers.

A RIGHT WORD AT THE RIGHT TIME.—The Bulletin has been the first and thus far the only loyal paper in the State which has dared raise a voice to check the insane howl that has been going up on all sides because Mrs. General McDowell chose to entertain her friends. It has spoken the right word in the right place and in a right graceful and manly fashion. We regret that our space will not permit us to copy the article in full, giving it the advantage of our larger circulation. Things are mixed, indeed, in this community, if a lady cannot give a party without its being made a theme of party comment. For once, good Bulletin, we can heartily say: Bully for you!

"A CONSTANT reader"—and a lady reader at that—will be glad to know that we receive her "hint" kindly relative to the devotion of "a corner to flowers and such like things," thinking with her that it will prove so admirable a feature and so much commend our paper to the ladies, that we are ready and willing to institute such a Department, give her the charge of it, and publish all the communications on that and similar subjects with which she may favor us—provided, always, that they come within the scope and plan of our paper.

(For the Californian.)

"BROTHER DOC."

HARK! I hear the faint retreat
Of old Ocean's ebbing feet,
And afar the breakers beat
The rugged rock;
Twilight falls, and with its dew
Fall sweet thoughts of home and you,
Soldier! in your coat of blue—
Brother Doc.

In this wreath that memory weaves
Rustle yet the dry corn-leaves
Of the shivering, rattling sheaves
You used to shock;
I shall never see again
Your quick fingers husk the grain,
While you whistle a wild refrain,
Brother Doc.

I can hear the lowing herds,
I can catch the broken words
Of the chattering passage-birds—
A shadowy flock;
Still the rabbit-snare you set,
And the curious pigeon net,
I can see them all, all yet—
Brother Doc.

I can hear the diving note
Trembling in the bullfrog's throat,
When the rushes gave our boat
A crazy shock—
That rickety old hatteau
Which we used to try to row—
But 't would never rightly go,
Brother Doc.

I can see the fire-place yet,
With its shining jambs of jet,
Where the good old neighbors met,
Until the clock
Counted nine, with faithful tongue,
Till the very rafters rung
With its strength of iron lung—
Brother Doc.

The old fire-place is there;
On each side there is a chair—
Back and forth, with thoughtful air,
Slow they rock;
His, a pleasant face and quaint,
Wearing still its youthful paint—
Hers, the pure face of a saint,
Brother Doc.

There, were little lives begun,
And the house was full of fun;
But they severed, one by one,
From the stock;

Now alone with her he sits,
While she prays, and sighs, and knits
One more pair of blue-yeen mitts,
Brother Doc.

They are now a scattered band:
One is where the river Grand
Bends, with breezes soft and bland,
The lily stalk;
Where the prairie's grassy bed
Trembles to the hison's tread,
Where a thousand herds are fed,
Brother Doc.

Where the ice-fields of Mount Hood
Spread in snowy solitude,
Where the giant hoary wood
Time doth mock,
Where the fair Columbia's breast
Glitters in the crimson west,
One has spread his tent to rest,
Brother Doc.

One has laid a weary form,
Safe from every earthly storm,
Where alone can thieving worm
Break the lock;
Safe beyond that shadowy brink,
That our coward spirits shrink,
Waits he for another link,
Brother Doc.

Now, farewell! and if the last—
If through thrilling trumpet-blast,
And the thick shot hailing fast,
Death shall knock,
May an angel pilot thee
Over the mysterious sea
To a heaven of Liberty!—
Brother Doc.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 4th, 1865.

EMILIE LAWSON.

A WISE old gentleman, who knew all about it, on retiring from business, gave the following sage advice to his son and successor: "Common sense, my son, is valuable, in all kinds of business—except love-making."

IN THE PORCH.

I.

WE sat in the porch together:
And, under the clasping vine,
Her floating locks were lifted
With every breath of mine.

Down through the verdurous spaces
Rippled the wandering air,
And the scintillant gold of summer
Trembled upon her hair.

Was it a visible blessing?
An aureole of grace?
Oh, foolish fancy, cheated
By the light on a lovely face?

Her eyes are blue as the midnight,
And false as the waveful sea!
And every azure lightning
Is a winged death for me!

II.

So thick in the porch the woodbine
Has spread its leafy roof,
Scarce can a dripping sunbeam
Ruin through its clinging woof.

We sit in its dewy darkness,
And watch, as the wind goes by,
Its leafy break and ripple
Against the far blue sky.

Vainly the sunlight struggles
To crown her shadowy hair;
Yet ever my fond thought fancies
Its golden glimmer there.

Her eyes are blue as the noontide,
And deep as the fathomless sea!
And all their heamy heaven
Is a visible prayer for me!

[Kate Putnam, in the Boston Gazette.]

A LEAF FROM "PODGERS" JOURNAL.

SCENES ON THE DOWN TRIP OF THE "CONSTITUTION."

ON BOARD P. M. S. S. "CONSTITUTION."

THE good ship bearing the above patriotic appellation cast off the ties that bound her to the wharf at San Francisco, and swung off into the stream at 10 A. M., January 4th. The tear-saturated handkerchiefs damp with grief waved to friends ashore, and the boom of the ship's gun, announced that she had commenced her long voyage. With her head pointed seaward she was soon "carrying a bone in her teeth," as the old salts have it, and the foam from the wheels went hissing behind her. As we rounded Telegraph Hill the little Shubrick fired a salute in honor of the distinguished political delegation on board, and two heavy guns from Alcatraz responded as a "good-by" to the departing Provost Marshal, Major Van Voast.

On passing Meiggs' wharf it was observed that quite a number of ladies were there, waving their handkerchiefs, and not less than six different gentlemen answered the salute, each supposing himself the fond object of such mute demonstrations of grief. I thought, however, that the Major seemed to wave his handkerchief understandingly, and, from his great eagerness to get on the extreme verge of the deck, concluded that he felt an irresistible desire to annihilate space and get as near as possible. I thought I observed a strong suspicion of a tear trembling on his eyelid, but it might have been the wind or the smoke from the cook's galley that produced the phenomenon. There are instances on record where soldiers have "shed" tears, and why not our friend? If he did not, appearances were "agin" him, for he was deeply, darkly and beautifully blue from that moment.

It struck me that San Francisco never looked so charmingly. The hills had just put on their coats of green, and the late rains had washed its face and made it look what it is not—clean. The truth must be told, that we left it with heavy hearts.

On passing Fort Point, Capt. Stewart saluted with two guns, and as the blue smoke from the parapet floated in a fleecy cloud above us we moralized upon its similarity to man's brief existence. He is touched off into the world, and, if he does not flash in the pan, makes a little noise according to his calibre, has his brief day, and floats off in smoke to mingle with the clouds beyond the moon, and be lost in the fog. Scarce had the echo of the two guns died away ere our noble ship made her first "salaam" to the gods and goddesses of the sea. She acknowledged the power of old Ocean by an inclination of her head, with majestic courtesy, and then, in all the pride of strength and beauty, tossed the spray from her bow and inflated her huge lungs for the coming struggle. From the furrowed brows and frowning crests of the waves, it was evident that the winds and waters had been in conflict, and the latter, maddened by their lashings, were foaming with fury. And as the huge wall of water came towering towards us it roared in its anger till the rocky coast took up the challenge, and sent back with defiant echoes a cloud of spray as high as our mast-head.

Old Neptune, evidently on a "bender," was making things howl; but skill and science set him at naught, and all his naughty efforts to put us under were fruitless. On we plunged, the rollers, as we neared the bar, increasing in height and volume. The Cliff House stood out in bold relief, and we turned our glasses towards Foster, sighing as we thought of his "glasses," and how many times we had looked seaward through them at the passing steamer; now, gazed at in turn through the same medium, I only hope that Foster's "dispensary" had not brought the vision of his friends to a state which made them see several steamers. We sighed, and envied the chap tooling along the beach at a three-minute gait behind one of Porter & Covey's nags. About this time several people had business below, and the upper deck was not at all crowded. Those left had plenty to do in "holding on," so heavily did our good craft begin to pitch.

A bank of fog to the seaward, lifting, we discovered several large craft tossing wildly about on the outer bar, and on closer examination with a glass observed one with topmast gone, and colors Union down in her rigging. At the same moment another ship in close proximity to the former one, set her signal of distress also; a pilot boat near them, tacked towards us, and a man sprang into the rigging with the Union jack in his hand, waving it and shouting. We now observed that both ships were at anchor, one a little astern of the other, but dangerously near. The latter vessel was seemingly a wreck, her yards broken, sails, ropes and rigging flying in every direction, boats gone, stern crushed and cut down, and, worse than all, her rudder carried away. As we approached, the crew were in the lower rigging waving their hats, and shouting, "For God's sake, save us; we are sinking!"

No passenger of the Constitution who was on deck will ever forget the scene at that moment. On all sides the ocean was a mass of foam; the huge breakers were rolling down upon us and those two devoted ships in terrific volume, their crests towering up to the topmast heads and tumbling forward in a cloud of spray with hoarse bellowings, each one higher than the preceding, and seemingly bent on engulfing the two maimed ships. With breathless anxiety we watched each successive wave as it came roaring towards us, expecting to see the vessels go down; the suspense was fearful, we saw the ships rise towards the summit, then plunge madly into the vortex, fairly buried in the seething waters which flew in clouds of spray and foam over their mastheads, sweeping decks, crushing and tearing everything before them, in their mad career. The sight was terribly grand, and I doubt if there was a man aboard that did not for once feel his insignificance. Even sundry senators, generals, governors and professors, were awed into silence. Very many faces blanched, and well they might, for such a sight does not fall to common mortals twice in a life time. On every side the deafening reverberations and deep roar of the heavy rollers sounded in our ears forebodingly, while those two ships freighted with human lives were tossed wildly to and fro and fairly buried in the angry waters, while we, although on a staunch ship, well manned with willing hands and hearts, could do nothing to save them. We ran as close as we dared and hailed them: "Ship ahoy! what condition are you in?" How every heart thrilled as the reply came borne upon the white spray: "Our decks are swept, our rudder gone; we are sinking!"

I stood near the Commodore and watched the expression of his face; a child could have read it. I saw his appreciation of their peril, his doubts of being able to do anything, the greatness of the danger to his own ship; and then came the recollection of his own great peril some years since, and the noble efforts of those big-hearted sailors that rescued him from the ill-starred San Francisco. Could he desert these poor fellows in their despair, and leave them to their fate? I saw by the sudden settling of his features to an expression of firm, rigid determination that he had made up his mind to do his best, regardless of all dictates of policy, and that he would take the responsibility.

"Ship ahoy! I will try to heave you a line! Stand by!"

A shout, half smothered in spray and sounding as if it came from the depths of the ocean, was borne upon the wind in reply, for at that moment we were looking down upon the ship as she plunged into what seemed a bottomless abyss, the caps of the rollers tumbling in upon her decks and bathing her in a sea of milky foam.

A long light line with a lead weight attached, the inner end made fast to a hawser, was prepared: all this while we had been drifting away from the ship. Steam was now put on, and we ran up as near as we dared to, and threw our line, but it fell short. Again and again the attempt was unsuccessfully repeated, for it was impossible to steer such a long heavy vessel as ours at slow speed in such a fearful sea, rollers striking us first on one bow and then on the other, throwing the huge ship back as if she were a cockle-shell. It was heavy work, but every man was at his post. The old Commodore stood on the paddle-box, giving orders, while relays of men were stationed along the deck to pass the word to the engineer to "go ahead," "back her," "slow her," etc. Again and again we tried to accomplish our object, first by running ahead and backing down, and then by running up. All this time it was necessary to watch our own ship closely, for if she fell off into the trough of the sea just once, and one of the huge rollers boarded her, as would have been the case, friends to-day might have been looking for relics of us on the beach, and our trunks—of both kinds—would have been dashing against the rocky foundations of the Cliff House. No ship that mortal man ever built could live for one moment in that boiling cauldron, if struck by one of those fearful rollers, in height and volume like so many Telegraph Hills, that came rushing forward at race-horse speed. As it was, we were boarded by the crests only of several, which deluged the main deck, tore up guards, washed cattle into the sea over the rails, and made the vessel tremble and quake like an aspen leaf. The day waned, and still the Commodore persevered, but the sea did not abate, and the officers were worn out with fatigue; the passengers were nearly all deathly sick, doors were slamming, the cabins creaked, groans and lamentations came up from below at every plunge, and from quiet corners floated whispered prayers from lips as white as the foam about us.

We looked for assistance from the city, and at last descried the Goliath coming. We hoped she might, from her less size and being easily handled, approach the endangered vessels nearer than we dared to, and get them out of the breakers. We watched the black smoke pouring from her smoke-stack; and when I remembered that she was commanded by that staunch old sea-dog, Gorham, as rough as the bar itself, I felt pretty certain that something would be done. I watched her with my glass as she came out past Fort Point, just where it began to get rough, and saw her take her first good plunge. Something told me that she wavered, but she seemed to gather courage and come on. Presently I saw her rise, and a gentle little "comber" pitch down upon her forward deck. Old Gorham was scared; he turned tail and fled. I thought the vessel turned once and took another look at the breakers, got an ague-fit, and cut for home. I could not but recall Derby's saying of that promising craft when she was in the San Diego trade, and never did what she advertised, "Goliath!" She did go in a hurry this time, and before she got far enough out to see anything; the breakers she met being mere buckets of water compared with what she might have seen had she come out to where we were.

At dark we were about to give it up, and backed down as close to the ships we had been trying to aid as we dared, to tell them so. The first officer hailed their deck, "Ship ahoy! We can do nothing for you; we can't get near you with safety, and no boat would live a moment. Try to hold on till daylight and you will get assistance."

I shall not soon forget the tones of despair in the voice that answered: "Do, for God's sake, try once more!"

The officer paused; I saw the struggle and the expression of his face in the moonlight—there was a plaintive tone, almost a wail of despair in the voice, that touched the sympathies of the big-hearted sailor. He essayed to speak and say it was impossible, but suddenly, with energy, his clear voice rang out: "Ay! ay! we will do what we can for you!"

The ships had during this time drifted closer to each other than at any time before; the officer springing for the line coiled up on the stern, sang out: "Stand by there!" and, seemingly nerved by the heroic desire to help them, whirled the lead around his head and sent it with unerring aim plump on to the deck of the wreck. Such a cheer as went up from both vessels! The line was hauled in and the two big hawsers hauled aboard and secured. The next thing was to get up their anchor; it was a long, heavy job, for the surges on it were fearful, and the long scope out to prevent foundering or dragging prolonged the effort to 9 o'clock before they announced, "All ready." Then came the critical moment; the Commodore's idea was to tow the ship inside Fort Point, where she could get assistance. Every care was taken as we started slowly ahead, to taunten the lines easily; slowly she wore around, rolling fearfully, and we were fairly under way when a tremendous roller came booming down upon us—"Look out!"—it was aboard, deluging the decks and ripping up the guards; as our stern rose, down plunged our neighbor, and the immense hawsers snapped like pack-thread.

Again came that plaintive cry: "The hawser has parted!" Every man knew that it was the last effort that could be made, and unwillingly, and with heavy hearts, we bade them "good cheer," and left. One great advantage had been gained for our suffering neighbor; where she lay at first was the very centre and worst place of the entire bar; but our moving her, and the tide setting in, carried her out of the roughest water and into better holding ground, where we trust she rode it out in safety until the sea became a mill-pond, when the Goliath would doubtless go to her rescue. We shall watch the papers for tidings of that ship, and trust she is safe. Her consort drifted away inside the worst rollers, and at dark appeared to be riding easily and in comparative safety.

The last sea that broke us from our poor friend played grand smash on our ship, and our battery of heavy guns broke adrift, but fortunately were secured before they had crashed through the bulwarks and overboard, taking everything in their course. It was time we were off and out of that, and it took two good hours to get out all right, for we had heavy seas and rough navigation.

Many incidents illustrative of the characteristics of individuals occurred during the day. One man, rejoicing in long hair and good clothes, would come on deck occasionally and declaim against the injustice done the passengers by the detention, etc. At last he struck Governor Nye, who had never left the deck a moment, and who was watching events with breathless interest, addressing him thus:

"This is an outrage, sir—a shame, sir—endangering valuable lives to stay around here trying to save those common fellows! What are they in comparison with us?"

The Governor turned upon him with the glare of a tiger: "Why, you infernal puppy, do you pretend to value your worthless life? Do you pretend to put it in the scale against that of any one of those unfortunate fellows? You want the Commodore to desert those poor devils—leave them to perish while we sit down to our comfortable dinner and brandy and water?" (The Governor quoted his greatest weakness, of course.) "You would, would you? I hope this ship may sink and all on board if necessary; it is the Commodore's duty to sink every soul of us in the effort, and I hope to God he never will let up until he has done one or the other. And, moreover, I tell you, sir, I see in his eye he is going to do it, too—you bet!"

The fellow stole away, and the Governor and myself, being fatigued and hungry, retired for a moment to our state-room and looked into the end of a suspicious looking bottle. The genial humor of the Governor was soon restored. He remarked: "I don't know but what I was a little severe on that chap, but how I do hate that breed of dogs!" Just before we left the wreck we saw a rocket and a blue-light sent up, apparently from the Cliff House, which we answered. The pilot-boat, by the by, had filled away, and must have gone inside, as we saw no more of her. How she ever lived in such a boiling cauldron was a mystery to all of us. At times, even when close to us, we could not see her for the foam and spray that engulfed her.

The Commodore says, in all his experience, he never saw the like of the sea we encountered that day, and a man might go to sea five hundred years and not get such another chance at it. As I do not expect to live that number of A. D.'s, I shall give up any hope of the kind. I can't say I "hanker arter" more such, although I would not for a farm have lost the grandeur of such a sight, now that it is over. It will last me the balance of my "natural."

Professor Silliman, being the biggest gun on board, should make a "report" on it, and I think he is busy with one now, as he has been scratching away for dear life every moment. He may be reporting upon the rocks upon which we might have split, along about Foster's back-yard, had our rudder gone adrift or machinery given away. Just fancy the Constitution going ashore and all on board perishing at the base of the Cliff House cabbage-garden! Silliman's report would have read: Base salt-ic grave-at-ic py-rat-ic Silli-cat-ic glob-ular hard on the knob-ular and decidedly flint-uloistic with an inclination of 45 easterly towards Foster's bar-room.

"Howsomever," we were not spilled, and bid fair to live to be a great deal of trouble yet to our friends. We passed the Bar—both bars, Foster's and the other—the Governor remarking that it was all right, as he generally stopped at every bar, especially when he travelled with the Nevada delegation, and consequently did not wish to slight this one; he only regretted that Foster's was not accessible.

PODGERS.

[Our readers will rejoice to learn that the two vessels which "Podgers" nearly wrecked himself and his "Constitution" in an attempt to aid, came safely into port; and we can only hope that equal good luck has attended the termination of our friend and correspondent's voyage.—ED. CALIFORNIAN.]

THE GIRLS.—A girl is not allowed to be a girl after she is ten years old. If you treat her as though she were one, she will ask you what you mean. If she starts to run across the street, she is brought back to the nursery to listen to a lecture on the propriety of womanhood. Now it seems to me that a girl should be nothing but a girl until she is seventeen. Of course there are proprieties belonging to her sex which it is fitting for her to observe, but it seems to me that, aside from these, she ought to have the utmost latitude. She ought to be encouraged to do much out of doors, to run and exercise in all those ways which are calculated to develop the muscular frame. What is true of boys, in the matter of bodily health, is eminently so of girls. It is all important that woman should be healthy, and well developed. Man votes, writes, does business, etc., but woman is the teacher and the mother of the world; and anything that deteriorates woman is a comprehensive plague on human life itself. Health among women is a thing that every man who is wise and considerate for his race should more earnestly seek and promote.—Ward Beecher.

DREAMLAND.

OUT of the sweet old legends
Beckons a fair white hand,
And silvery, bell-like voices
Tell of an unknown land;

Where magic roses blossom
In the evening's golden light,
And the air is laden with fragrance
From the lilies silver-white.

The trees, with their waving branches,
Murmur a fairy song,
And the brooklet merrily dances
As it ripples and gurgles along.

And tender, enchanting love-songs
Float on the balmy breeze,
And the heart's unspeakable longing
By their music is set at ease.

Would that my steps could reach it,
That happy, flowery strand!
For all my earthly afflictions
Would cease in that fairy land.

Oft in my dreams I see it,
In its glamor bright and fair,
But with daylight's earliest glimmer
It vanishes into air. [From the German.]

MISS. M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XIV.

VERY PRIVATE THEATRICALS.

THE river was gray and dim in the twilight by this time, for the first half of October was gone, and the dusky shadows gathered early on Mr. Hillary's lawn. Francis Tredethlyn found the gardens deserted when he left the terrace, and walked slowly towards the house, where lights were gleaming in innumerable windows. The young man had only ridden down to Twickenham that morning, and had no special engagement to dine at the Cedars.

"I'll go round to the stables at once," he thought, "and I can call in Moorgate street to-morrow, and tell Mr. Hillary that I think of going abroad. Why should I see her again? The sight of her will only make me foolish, and keep me here in spite of myself."

The lady thus vaguely alluded to was not Miss Desmond; but when Francis Tredethlyn entered Mr. Hillary's house by the first open window that he found on the upper terrace, he found himself in a little study much affected by the ladies of the household, and he came suddenly upon a female figure sitting alone in the dark.

Something like a guilty pang shot through him as he recognized that stately figure, even in the shadowy obscurity of the unlighted room. In the next moment there was a rustling of silk, and Miss Desmond had risen and was facing him in the twilight.

"Yes, it is Mr. Tredethlyn," she said presently. "What have you been doing with yourself all the afternoon? There has been a grand discussion about some amateur theatricals, concerning which Maude Hillary is absolutely bewitched, and we want you to act."

"I think you've got plenty of fellows who'll act better than I can, Miss Desmond, though I did try my hand at the business once in Van Diemen's Land, and I'd be glad to make myself useful in any way that would please Miss Hillary, if it was to dress myself as a footman and carry a tea-tray or a scuttle of coals; but I think I shall be leaving England before the theatricals come off; in point of fact, I think I shall be leaving England directly."

"Leaving England!"

The expression of those two words could scarcely have been more tragical than it was; and yet for once in a way Miss Desmond was not acting. All in a moment she saw the fair edifice which she had schemed to build for herself crumbling into ruin and chaos.

"Leaving England!" she repeated; "you think of leaving England, Mr. Tredethlyn?"

She put her hands to her forehead with a little tragic gesture, and Francis Tredethlyn wished that he had entered the house by any other door or window than that which he had chosen.

Julia's dismay was entirely real; for the disappointment was very bitter to this young lady, who had built up a fair future for herself on the foundation of Francis Tredethlyn's wealth. The grim walls of Castle Desmond, the silver waters of the Shannon, the green hill-sides and lonely valleys, made themselves into a picture that shut out the dusky room, and then melted into gray blankness. She had meant to do such great things with Francis Tredethlyn's thirty thousand a year!

The young man stood looking at her in as much embarrassment as if he had been guilty of some wilful deception. He was so entirely simple and true-hearted that no suspicion of Miss Desmond's mercenary views had any place in his mind.

There was a very brief pause, and then Julia murmured, in low, half-broken accents—

"You are really going away?—but why?"

"Oh, Miss Desmond, I scarcely like to tell you why; and yet it's not altogether on that account," answered Francis, vaguely. "There are other reasons. I am not in my right place amongst such people as I meet here. I'm a rough, uneducated fellow, and idleness doesn't suit me. I want to be of some use in the world. Why, I felt myself a better man out yonder, without sixpence in my pocket, than I am to-day, in spite of Oliver Tredethlyn's money. So I mean to buy a commission and go out to India, where there's some fighting to be done."

"You are not telling me the truth, Mr. Tredethlyn. This is not your real reason for running away from the Cedars, as if the house were infected."

"My dear Miss Desmond, I—you have been so kind to me—you have made me feel so much at home here, where, but for you, I must have felt myself so miserably out of place."

"Why should you be out of place amongst these people?" cried Julia, drawing up her head with a proud gesture, "unless," she murmured, in a thoughtful undertone—"unless because these people are so much beneath you."

Miss Desmond had entirely recovered herself by this time. All at once, after sitting a long time at the table, playing her cards with infinite tact and patience—all at once she found herself losing the game, and saw that only the boldest play could help her. But Julia was equal to the situation. The second of December had come upon her very suddenly; but she did not despair of triumphing by a coup d'état.

"Tell me the truth, Mr. Tredethlyn," she said, looking Francis full in the face, with her eyes and teeth gleaming in the twilight; "why are you going to leave this house? Why do you talk of hurrying away from England?"

"Because—because—I have done you a wrong in absorbing so much of your society, Miss Desmond, and the people here have begun to mix your name with mine. I cannot bear that you, who are so superior to me, should be humiliated by such an association; especially when there is no foundation for their talk," Francis Tredethlyn added, in considerable embarrassment.

"Oh, I understand it all now," answered Julia, with an unutterable bitterness in her tone; "you have been warned against me, Mr. Tredethlyn. I am only a fortune-huntress, and I have been spreading my toils about your innocent footsteps, and it is only by flight that you can save yourself. Oh yes!" she cried, with an ironical laugh, which seemed to express a keener anguish than another woman's wildest sob, "I know how these people talk!"

"Miss Desmond, on my honor—"

"Mr. Tredethlyn, on my honor, I know the world better than you do. If you had devoted yourself to any other woman in this house, to any daughter of that mercantile aristocracy in which Mr. Hillary rules supreme, no sneering comments would have greeted your ear. But what am I—the daughter of the Desmonds of Desmond—amongst these people? What am I but Maude Hillary's dependent and companion? I am poor, and I endure poverty in its most cruel bitterness; for I am poor amongst the vulgar rich. Who can give me credit for sincerity? who dare trust in my friendship? I am a well-bred pauper, a fortune-huntress, an adventuress, a creature whose smiles are to be dreaded, whose society is to be avoided. Oh, Francis Tredethlyn," cried Julia, with a sudden shiver of agony, which would have done credit to a Rachel, "I know so well what has been said to you. Go—go at once. You are wise to accept the warning conveyed in these people's insolent insinuations. Go—there is a gulf between you and me, for you are rich and I am poor. Beware of me even when I seem most sincere. Remember that I am a pauper, and the descendant of paupers—paupers who shed their blood and squandered their fortunes in a losing cause; paupers who died for the love of honor and loyalty, two words that would seem the emptiest sounds to merchants and tradesmen. Oh, Mr. Tredethlyn, have pity upon me, and go."

And then Miss Desmond broke down all at once into a burst of hysterical sobbing, and stretching out her hand towards the back of a prie-Dieu chair standing near her, tottered as if she would have fallen. She did not fall, however, for before her hand could reach the prie-Dieu, Francis Tredethlyn's strong arm was round her.

"Miss Desmond," he cried, "Julia! why do you talk like this? Do you think that any base thought about you ever entered my brain? Fortune-huntress, adventuress—did I ever wrong you in my inmost thoughts by such a name as that?"

"No," answered Julia, softly. "You are too noble; and yet you may have been influenced by others. Why should you think better of me than others think? Why should not you too despise me?"

Her voice was broken by sobs, and she was still supported by Mr. Tredethlyn's arm. He felt that she was trembling violently. He could just distinguish her handsome profile in the dusk, and the tears glistening upon her dark lashes.

"Despise you, Julia!—you who are so superior to me! Do you forget what I am? Have I not much greater reason to fear your contempt? And you talk of poverty as if that were so deep a suffering, while I am so rich, and care so little for my money. Share it with me, Julia. I'm only a poor waif and stray as it is; but with such a woman as you for my wife I might be of some good in the world. Heaven knows you are welcome to my fortune, Miss Desmond. If you were a man, and my comrade, I would say, Share it with me as my brother and my friend. But you are a woman, and I can only say, Be my wife."

Julia withdrew herself from the supporting arm.

"Ah, Mr. Tredethlyn," she said, in an icy kind of voice, "this is the bitterest insult of all. The Desmonds do not marry for money; they only marry where they are beloved and can love again."

"How can I expect that you can love me?" asked Francis. "Do you think I can forget that I am an ignorant boor, suddenly thrown amongst people whose habits of life, whose very thoughts, are strange to me?"

"And you would marry a woman without so much as asking for her love?"

"I would ask for her friendship and her fidelity. I shouldn't care to exact an uneven bargain, Miss Desmond, and I doubt if I could give much more myself," the young man answered, rather coldly; but at the sound of a stifled sob from Julia he changed his tone all at once. A thousand generous impulses were stirred in him by the aspect of her distress. He was nothing more than a child in the hands of this brilliant young Irish woman.

"Dear Miss Desmond," he cried, "I seem destined to offend and grieve you. If you will share my fortune, if you will accept my best friendship and fidelity, my whole life shall prove to you how much I admire and respect you. If you reject my offer, I can only say—"

But Julia did not allow him to finish the sentence, which she foresaw would be expressive of complete resignation to her adverse decision.

"Oh, Francis," she exclaimed, "you offer me your fortune!" There was something sublime in her contemptuous enunciation of this last word. "You ask me to accept your friendship, when I have been weak and mad enough to love you." She was not Rachel any longer; she was Madame Dorval, all melting tenderness and womanly pathos. She covered her face with her hands, and then, with something between a sob and a shudder, rushed suddenly from the room, and hurried along the dusky staircase and passages to her own apartment.

The candles were lighted on the dressing-table, but there was no intrusive handmaiden to annoy Miss Desmond by her watchful glances, her mute interrogation. Julia looked at her reflection in the glass, and saw herself flushed and triumphant, with traces of tears upon her cheeks.

"And my eyes are really wet," she thought; "but then the chance was such a good one, and so nearly lost. What a good, simple-hearted fellow he is! and how happy any reasonable woman might be with him—and thirty thousand a year! Ah, Maude Hillary! it was very pretty, and childish, and nice of you, coming to wake me out of my sleep on your last birthday, to show me the set of diamonds and opals papa had bribed your maid to slip under your pillow before you awoke; but I will show you diamonds before long that shall make you ashamed of that birthday trumpery."

Miss Desmond rolled her black hair into a great smooth knot at the back of her head; and she put on a dress of that fugitive golden yellow, in which there is an artful intermingling of silvery sheen, and which milliners call maize, a bewilderingly beautiful color when seen in conjunction with a handsome brunette. The loungers who dined at the Cedars that evening declared that Julia Desmond had never looked so splendid. Francis Tredethlyn sat by her at dinner, and was near her all the evening; and at night, when he found himself alone in the pretty chintz-curtained chamber that he had so often occupied of late, the young man seated himself by one of the windows, and, pushing open the sash, looked out at the quiet river rippling softly under the stars.

"And she is to be my wife," he thought; "she is very handsome, and I ought to be proud to think that she can care for such a fellow as I. And yet—" His head sank forward on his folded arms, and the image of a beautiful creature smiled before him in all the dazzling brightness of an opium-eater's dream. Francis Tredethlyn gave one long regretful sigh as he raised his head, and looked moodily out at the distant woodland on the other side of the river.

"What can it matter whom I marry?" he asked himself, bitterly; "would she ever think of me if I were to come to this house every day for ten years at a stretch? Why, her dogs are more to her and dearer to her twenty times than I am. And Julia Desmond loves me, and thinks me better than those fellows with the yellow whiskers, who are always talking of new books and new music. They please her, but Julia despises them. Am I such a wretch that I cannot be grateful for a sensible woman's affection? I am grateful to her. I am proud to think that she will be my wife. But I wish I was back in Van Diemen's Land, blacking the captain's boots and smoking shag tobacco with Surly Bill the Burglar."

After that dramatic little scene in the twilight study at the Cedars, everything went on velvet. Julia was triumphant; Maude was delighted and sympathetic. What could be more charming or proper than that Julia should marry a man with thirty thousand a year for his fortune? The only hindrance to universal happiness in a very delightful world was the fact that so many people had to do without thirty thousand a year, Miss Hillary thought, whenever she gave her mind to the study of political economy.

"And you will be so rich, dear Julia," Maude said, as she kissed her friend; "and if Harecourt and I are very poor—as we must be, unless papa gives his consent by-and-by—you'll take us for a drive in the Park sometimes, won't you? And if you give many parties in the season, I shan't be able to come to them, for you wouldn't like to see me always in the same dress, like those poor people at the union, and I shall be obliged to get a set of black lace flounces, like Reder—you never saw Reder, my last German governess but one—and put them on pink silk one day, and blue the next, and so on; it's very troublesome, and the flounces don't generally come straight, but then it looks as if one had so many dresses. Of course you'll have boxes at both houses, Julia, and on the grand tier? and you'll buy a place in the country—and oh, where do you mean to live in town?"

Miss Desmond answered all these eager queries very demurely. Francis would make all arrangements for their future life, she said; he had certainly promised her the two opera boxes, and he had made inquiries about the one house that was to be let in Park Lane, and he was anxious to discover her favorite county before taking any steps toward the purchase of an estate.

"But you know he is such a dear good fellow, and has such a knack of guessing all my fancies, that really I never like to suggest anything," Miss Desmond concluded, modestly; but somehow or other, without making any very direct suggestions, Julia had so contrived matters, that in a few weeks her affianced husband had gratified many of the desires that had been smouldering in her breast ever since the earliest dawn of girlhood.

Already the "family jools" of the Desmonds had been consigned to the oblivion of one of Julia's shabbiest trunks, and diamonds now twinkled on Miss Desmond's neck and arms, and gleamed here and there in her black hair when she came down to dinner in her maize silk dress. Her toilette-table was all of a glitter with the rings she drew off her slim fingers when she disrobed at night, before the looking-glass which had so often reflected a gloomy, discontented face, but which now only gave back triumphant smiles.

She was an adventuress, perhaps, and her triumph was an ignoble one; but she was not altogether base. She was prepared to be a good wife to the man whom she had brought to her feet by force of feminine strategy. She did not love Francis Tredethlyn, and, indeed, she seemed to be made of a sterner stuff than that out of which the women who can love are fashioned. She did not love her affianced husband, but she meant to be as faithful and devoted as the most loving wife in Christendom. If she intended to raise herself upon the platform of her husband's wealth, she meant that he should mount with her. Already she had lifted him several stages on the social ladder. From the very first her watchful care had saved him from a hundred small solecisms, and in the more intimate relationship of the last few weeks her refining influence had been almost magical in its effects. The good old blood of the Tredethlyns asserted itself, and Julia found her task an easy one.

"I don't want you to be like those Government clerks, and magazine writers, and embryo Q. C.'s," she said to him sometimes. "I like you to be big, and to be deep-voiced, and—just a little clumsy. The Knights-Templars, and Crusaders, and that sort of people must have been clumsy on account of their armor. I always fancy I hear the clank of spurs when you come into a room; and when you sit in Parliament you must be the soldier's friend, you know, and make great speeches about rations, and court-martial verdicts, and discipline—and all that sort of thing; and I shall come into the ladies' gallery, and strain my eyes by peering at you through that horrible grating. You will look so handsome, with your head thrown a little back, and your hand in your waistcoat."

Now, this kind of talk from a handsome woman, whom he knows to be infinitely his intellectual superior, can scarcely be displeasing to the most strong-minded of men; and, unluckily, Francis Tredethlyn was not very strong-minded. He looked down at his Julia with a sheepish smile, and acknowledged her pretty flatteries in the laziest possible manner; but when he came to the Cedars next morning, he brought with him the biggest emerald-headed serpent that he had been able to find among the jewellers of the West End, and coiled it about his Julia's wrist. He was grateful to her for all her tender smiles and pleasant speeches—all the more grateful, perhaps, because of that uncomfortable knowledge of the cold void in his own heart, where love for his promised wife should have been. So he brought her all manner of costly tribute in the way of rings and bracelets, and necklaces and head-gear; and he bought her a three-hundred-guinea hunter at Tattersall's, so that she should no longer ride Maude Hillary's horses in the Twickenham lanes. Sometimes, in spite of himself, even when Julia was most agreeable, the thought came upon him that he would only too gladly have given her the whole of his fortune if by such a gift he might have freed himself from the promise that bound him to her.

"But if I were free to-morrow, she would not care for me," he thought; "and what would be the use of liberty?"

(Continued in our next.)

ADVENTURE WITH A BOA CONSTRICTOR.

AT the earliest possible moment after our camp had been pitched a hunt was set afoot, and Capt. Grant, myself and some attendants were soon making our way to "the path." There were no animals there when we arrived, except a few hippopotami, and we were, therefore, obliged to wait the coming of some more palatable game. Our patience, however, was severely taxed; and after a long delay, we were about to "bag" a hippopotamus, when one of our attendants, perched in a tree about half a mile distant, began waving his blanket. This was a signal that game was approaching. We immediately drew into cover, and awaited the coming of the latter.

We were not delayed long, for presently a long column of animals, from the elephant to the hoo-doo, appeared in view, trotting at a good pace to the river. Their flanks were soon presented to us, and each selecting his object, fired. McColl shot a fine young buffalo cow, while Capt. Grant was equally successful with a hoo-doo, and several spears, east by our attendants, stopped the career of one or two different animals of the herd.

At this juncture, however, occurred an unexpected adventure that finished our sport, at least for that day. I had sprung forward, immediately after firing, in order to obtain a fair shot at a huge elephant that I wanted to bring down on account of his immense tusks. I got the desired aim and pulled the trigger of my second barrel. At the moment of doing so a wild cry of alarm, uttered by one of the blacks, called my attention. Glancing round, my eye chanced to range up into the foliage of the tree beneath which Capt. Grant and myself had lain for several hours previous.

My feelings may possibly be imagined, as I beheld an enormous boa constrictor, whose hideous head and neck projected some distance into view, showed that he was about to make a fatal spring. His direction was certainly towards me; and, as he flashed from his position like a thunderbolt, I gave myself up, for, ere aid could reach me, fold after fold of the monster would have crushed my strong frame into a quivering pulp. I fell, seemingly caught in a whirlwind of dust, and a strange indescribable scuffle ensued.

In the midst of this terrible strife, I suddenly became conscious of the presence of a second victim, and even after the time that has elapsed since then, I still recollect with what vividness the thought shot across my mind that this second victim was Capt. Grant, my noble companion. At last, after being thus whirled about for several seconds, each second seeming to be interminable, there ensued a lull, a stillness of death, and I opened my eyes, expecting to look upon those unexplored landscapes which are seen only in the country beyond the tomb. Instead of that, I saw Capt. Grant leveling his rifle towards me, while, standing beside and behind him, were the blacks, in every conceivable attitude of the most intense suspense.

In a moment I comprehended all. The huge serpent had struck a young buffalo cow, between which and him I had unluckily placed myself at the moment of firing upon the elephant. A most singular good fortune had attended me, however, for instead of being crushed into a mangled mass with the unfortunate cow, my left forearm had only been caught in between the buffalo's body and a single fold of the constrictor. The limb laid just in front of the shoulder at the root of the neck, and thus had a soft bed of flesh, into which it was jammed, as it were, by the immense pressure of the serpent's body, that was like iron in hardness. As I saw Grant about to shoot, a terror took possession of me, for, if he refrained, I might possibly escape after the boa released his hold from the dead cow; but should he fire and strike the reptile, it would, in its convulsions, crush or drag me to pieces.

Even as the idea came to me, I beheld Grant pause. He appeared to fully comprehend all. He could see how I was situated, that I was still living, and that my delivery depended on the will of the constrictor. We could see every line on each other's face, so close were we, and I could have shouted or spoken, or even whispered at him, had I dared. But the boa's head was reared within a few feet of mine, and the wink of an eyelid would perhaps settle my doom, so I stared, stared, stared like a dead man at Grant and at the blacks.

Presently the serpent began very gradually to relax his folds, and after retightening them several times as the crushed buffalo quivered, he unwound one fold entirely. Then he paused. The next iron-like band was the one which held me a prisoner; and as I felt it little by little, little by little, unclasping, my heart stood still with hope and fear. Perhaps, upon being freed, the benumbed arm, uncontrolled by my will, might fall from the cushion-like bed in which it lay. And such a mishap might bring the spare fold around my neck or chest, and then farewell to the sources of the Nile. Oh, how hardly; how desperately I struggled to command myself! I glanced at Grant and saw him handling his rifle anxiously. I glanced at the negroes and saw them still gazing, as though petrified with astonishment. I glanced at the serpent's loathsome head, and saw its bright, deadly eyes, watching for the least sign of life in its prey. Now, then, the reptile loosened its fold on my arm a hair's breadth, and now, a little more, until half an inch of space separated my arm and its mottled skin. I could have whipped out my hand, but dared not take the risk.

Atoms of time dragged themselves into ages, and a minute seemed eternity itself! The second fold was removed entirely, and the next one was easing. Should I dash away now, or wait a more favorable movement? I decided upon the former; and with lightning speed, I bounded away towards Grant, the crack of whose piece I heard at the same instant. For the first time in my life I was thoroughly overcome; and sinking down, I remained in a semi-unconscious state for several minutes.

When I fully recovered, Grant and the overjoyed negroes held me up, and pointed out the boa, who was still writhing in his death agonies. I shuddered as I looked upon the effects of his tremendous dying strength. For yards around where he lay, grass, and bushes, and saplings, and in fact everything except the more fully grown trees, were cut clean off, as though they had been trimmed by an immense scythe. This monster, when measured, was 51 feet 3 inches in extreme length, while round the thickest portion of his body the girth was nearly three feet, thus proving, I believe, to be the largest serpent that was ever authentically heard of.—Capt. Speke's Journal.

RED HAIR.—"Would you know the process by which jet black hair is transformed into golden hair? For our fair dames of Court and all our lorettes (they rather began it) sacrifice their beautiful black hair as freely as a red head with you sacrifices his earrot. You wish to hear how the metamorphose is obtained? At the appointed hour the candidate for golden honors enter the dressing-room, attired in a long white dressing gown. Her hair floats loosely over her shoulders, unsecured by comb or pin. The 'artist' is there. He begins by seeing that the hair is thoroughly separated; then he, by degrees, pours over the head a phial of some water, (which probably holds in solution corrosive sublimate, or something equally deadly poison,) and he takes hair by hair and saturates it with the water, from one end to the other. This takes two hours. He allows fifteen minutes to elapse, and then he soaks the whole hair in the water; next, he pours another phial of his 'water' upon the hair and kneads the hair with his hands. Another respite of a quarter of an hour is given, which is followed by soaking the head in ice-water, which is succeeded by a new phial of 'water.' These processes take two hours and fifteen minutes more. The 'artist' then takes two tailor's 'gooses,' heated to a high degree of temperature. The chambermaid holds the end of their mistress' hair, and the 'artist' moves backward and forward the 'gooses' within a few inches of the hair until the hair becomes red. This ends the operation, which has lasted five hours, and leaves the lady with red hair, an intolerable headache, jangled nerves, and $80 less in pocket. I say $80—not 80 francs, but 400 francs. Felix, the hair-dresser, who invented this operation, is making more money than ever, and before he resorted to this method he was literally coining money. So we go! The city is not changing its appearance and even its names, but the women themselves are undergoing metamorphose. You quit your brunette in the Rue de Cluny, in an old-fashioned house; be absent a few months; you find her living on the same spot, but the street is called the Rue Victor Cousin; the name has been changed, the house has been pulled down, and a vast caravansara erected on its site, and she has become red headed."—Paris Letter.

WHAT OUR PARLORS SHOULD BE.—A modern writer says: "Don't keep a solemn parlor, into which you go but once a month, with your parson or sewing society. Hang around your walls pictures which tell stories of mercy, hope, courage, faith, and charity. Make your living-room the largest and most cheerful in the house. Let the place be such that when your boy has gone to distant lands, or even when, perhaps, he clings to a single plank in the lone waters of the wide ocean, the thought of the still homesead may come across the desolation, bringing always light, hope, and love. Have no dungeons about your house, no room you never open, no blinds that are always shut."

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1865.

COPPIN AND HIS CRITICS.

ACCORDING to a very old saw, indeed, "there is no accounting for tastes;" consequently when a discussion arises respecting the merits of any person, place or thing in which others differ from us, we have only to believe that they do so honestly and acknowledge that they have a right to entertain any opinion they please, we, in the meanwhile, rigidly adhering to our own.

But a piece of taste was exhibited by Mr. Coppin—a comedian of whom we are relieved but whom the unfortunate billows are now compelled to bear—in a speech before the curtain on the occasion of his "last appearance" at Maguire's Opera House on Friday evening of last week, in regard to which we fancy there can be no dispute, and which is very easily "accounted" for. Speaking of his reception by the public and the press, he said that of the former he had nothing to complain, and that the latter had been eminently cordial to him with the exception of "two insignificant sheets." Very few will deny that this speech on the part of Mr. Coppin was in wretched, not to say vulgar, taste, since it by no means follows that because a critic fails to see an actor in a stellar light, or to be governed in the exercise of his vocation by either the social qualities of the man or the self-written and paid-for puffs which his diplomacy or "statesmanship" manages to secure—it by no means follows, we say, that the sheet to which that critic happens to be attached is an "insignificant" one.

As this journal found it necessary to differ from some of its cotemporaries as to the merits of the late departed "well-known Australian actor, manager, litterateur, and legislator," (we quote from the redundant English of a morning cotemporary)—as that gentleman when made the subject of a legitimate and honest criticism chose to take up the gauntlet by remarks which were too pointed to admit of misapplication, and as the cotemporary from whose copious vocabulary we have just quoted, saw fit to also put hand and foot in it, endorsing the pretensions of its protégé by reproducing those remarks in its next morning's issue, we propose to say a few words, which otherwise would have been left unsaid, for the benefit of Mr. Coppin and his critics.

To begin with the beginning: Mr. Coppin landed among us as agent of the Keans—nothing more was known of him. Certain it is that neither as "actor, manager, litterateur, or legislator" had the trump of fame wafted his name to the shores of the Atlantic or the Pacific oceans; perhaps because in his many vocations he illustrated the truth that a Jack-at-all-trades is seldom or never good at any particular one. The first knowledge that was had of either him or his merits was gathered from his own lips, for no reputation preceded him. Had we known in the first instance that the preliminary puffs which filled his sails in this locality were self-blown, he simply paying for the use of bellows, we would sooner have arrived at an appreciation of him. Seeing star notices, however, columns of anecdote and reminiscences of his life from his boyhood up, all loud in his praise, and finding him an apparently well-behaved though not very sprightly gentleman—certainly not one who would even for a moment be suspected of possessing "the knowledge of a Burton, the wit of a Sheridan, and the 'bonhommerie' of a Brougham,"—we were content in the outset to take him upon trust, pending an opportunity to form a judgment of our own as to his pretensions. This soon came. He was "persuaded to appear," and his "Paul Pry" was enough, without the infliction of the remaining programme of the first evening. To our surprise we found a man with a face as expressionless as a dead wall, no flexibility of either voice or feature, and an awkwardness of movement and gesture that was painful without being in the slightest degree comical. We discovered that his resemblance to Burton consisted solely in obesity, his breadth of body and beam being only equalled by the broadness of some of his jokes when he attempted to "make points." A cockney, he dropped his h's all over the stage with a charming disregard of time and place—in short, notwithstanding the most favorable prepossessions, we found nothing to commend in him. Still, we had almost determined to be silent; it was an affair that principally concerned the public, and so long as they chose to be satisfied we were scarcely called upon to growl. But when, in view of the fulsome praise of him and his performances, in which his "friends of the press"—for courtesy's sake we will say his "critics"—thought fit to indulge, a cry of disappointment and a complaint of being swindled began to go up from the public throat, we then thought it our duty to speak of his merits honestly, thus washing our hands of any complicity in the cheat. We did so, the result being that we encountered the distinguished disfavor of Mr. Coppin—for which we did not care one penny; and the unkind comment of his supporters among our cotemporaries—for which we care still less.

So much for Mr. Coppin. Now a word as to his "critics," and we have done. It is fair to suppose that, in our judgment of the gentleman, we were honest; the old cry of "not advertising with you" cannot very well be raised, since his performances, and those of the Keans, were always advertised in THE CALIFORNIAN. Personally we rather liked him; but in questions of art personal relations should not be suffered to dictate. Judging of a picture, we do not care whether the artist is a pleasant fellow or not; certainly, the fact that he has been congressman, litterateur or clergyman, should no more be taken into account and placed to the credit of anything from his case than should the fortuitous circumstances of his having been soap-boiler or cabbage-vender be scored to its demerit. With the social qualities or the moral character of author, artist, or actor, the critic has nothing to do—his province is to judge them by their books, their pictures, or their acting, alone. Certainly against Mr. Coppin we entertained no prejudice; and, though he did not approach us, after the appearance of our criticism, with that cordiality which characterized his manner before, we did not dream that he considered himself an "ill-used man," until he betrayed it by the tone of his remarks on the occasion of his last appearance—of this tone we judge from the meagre report of the morning cotemporary already referred to; had they not been there reported we should probably never have heard of them, not being present on the evening in question; though, if there were any performance of that comedian's which it were likely that we could be tempted to attend, it would certainly be his last one. Our motives in the criticism which inspired Mr. Coppin's remarks seem open to no misconstruction, for certainly they were kindly enough to the statesman and the gentleman, if not positively complimentary to the actor.

Now for the other "critics." The supposed author of the scree from which we have several times quoted in the course of this article—though it has been stated to us that it was written by Mr. Coppin's self—not very long since was accused by one of our managers in broad daylight, and in the open street, of venality—branded with having been in constant pay, and with having received amounts which showed upon the treasurer's books, for lending the aid of his pen in the interest of the theatre, which that manager represented—and he neither denied nor resented the charge. The like has never befallen any one connected in any capacity whatever with THE CALIFORNIAN—and we have a very distinct impression that it never will. Of an evening journal, which made rather favorable mention, the critic of which we are bound to believe, is honest in his opinions, and who is certainly above the reach of bribery, it is almost sufficient to say that he is a fellow-countryman of Mr. Coppin's, and once, like him, a resident of Australia. It is very possible that in the sparse crumbs of commendation which he threw out—meaning, however, as much as a meal from ordinary sources—he may have been moved by that fellow feeling which very often guides the tongue and pen even of men who aim at impartiality. The only commentary, perhaps, necessary to make upon this critic's printed opinion is simply to state that his intelligent face, on the evening of his favorite's "last appearance," was seen among the audience assembled at Platt's Hall in behalf of Miss Richardson's poem—he preferred to hear the Hon. J. H. Warwick read! A morning journal, active and wiry generally but compelled to brevity from its size and the pressure of advertisements upon its columns, sometimes in the hurry of the moment gets its "star" notices and its criticisms proper rather mixed up; but anyone who imagines that the editors really think Mr. Coppin an "excellent comedian" will find it very easy to provoke a bet. Our Sunday friend, that by the boldness of its assertions as regards the talent of the most inferior artists sometimes tempts the remark that it should be called the brazen era, is proverbially good natured and politic, the editor making a boast that his object in theatrical notices is not criticism but cultivation of the advertising interest. We have a weekly cotemporary that is noted for a sort of "sauce for soup, fish or gravy," which enters into its composition. Making a virtue and capital of pitching into every person and everything whenever a laugh can be raised or a point made, wholly irrespective of merit, and sometimes, we regret to add, of decency, it certainly is not to be expected that its criticism would count for much anyway, especially when it is generally known that the author was the writer or adapter of many of the plays in which Mr. Coppin performed. We do not venture to say that our lively if not immaculate cotemporary was ever paid for admitting anything in its columns, but if we say that it has been occasionally paid for keeping things out, we hazard an assertion which we fancy the well-known candor of the editor will scarcely permit him to either palliate or deny.

These are the facts of the case so far as Mr. Coppin and his critics are concerned. This article has grown to a length and breadth which was not contemplated in the beginning, but it spaced itself out by natural progression, and we deemed it best to make it thorough and complete. As for the subject—he has gone where he will be brought into competition with stock comic actors, and we apprehend he will hardly attempt to star it much. His critics remain behind, and that certainly is sufficient punishment for each and all of them.

* After a careful search in all dictionaries, being unable to find the word "bonhommerie," we have concluded, since learning the authorship of the article quoted from, that it is the Australian rendering of the French phrase, bonhomie.

"A COMPLAINT OF FRIENDS."

WE have before called attention to the habit in which Eastern journals indulge, of copying articles from these columns without giving the credit to either authors or THE CALIFORNIAN. By way of illustrating the wrong of which we complain, let us run over a few of the exchanges which the last steamer brought. In the Philadelphia Transcript we find "Clouds," a charming little poem, by Emilie Lawson, originally published in THE CALIFORNIAN of November 5th; this has been set floating, a waif upon the waves of newspaperdom—surely the name of the authoress might have been allowed to accompany it. A "Fragment from an Unpublished Poem," by "Ina," with "for the Californian" printed above it that no mistake could occur, appeared in these columns on the 19th of November. The New York Atlas of December 24th brings the lines back to us without a word of acknowledgment. And "Mists," by the same authoress, copied in the same paper, and in the Philadelphia Transcript as well, shared a similar fate, as revealed to us by the previous steamer. "Mark Twain's" comical story of "Lucretia Smith's Soldier," fares better at the hands of the Atlas, being copied into that paper of December 3d, with credit to both author and THE CALIFORNIAN. But other journals Eastward were not as honest, and thus it was that the Mercury the other week came to republish the article, under the impression that it was new to this coast, calling attention to it as particularly "funny." In manner somewhat similar we were betrayed into publishing a paragraph of which the Mercury claims the parentage, supposing that it originated beyond the mountains. These little contretemps only prove that we in San Francisco are all too busy to read each others' papers, a truth more fully established by the fact that the honest-faced Bulletin every now and then transfers a brilliant paragraph or sentence to its columns under the impression that it is paying tribute to the genius of the East, in blissful ignorance that it originally appeared in THE CALIFORNIAN months before. And it was but the other day that our vigilant and virtuous enemy, the News Letter, recried from the mouth of its "Town Crier" a few lines apropos of the departure of Major Van Voast, which our readers would be very apt to recognize. As before said, however, these inadvertent copyings only prove that we all have excellent taste in the way of selections, but very little time to look over the pages of city cotemporaries.

To return to our Eastern friends: the Home Journal of December 31st quotes a dramatic criticism from these columns with credit, but reproduces in another part of the paper as original, a paragraph relative to the Morning Call's system of publishing divorces in the same style it does marriages, births, and deaths, of which the merit, if merit it have, belongs to THE CALIFORNIAN. The New York Leader of December 31st is so honest that we feel inclined to forgive it for all former sins of omission—only hoping that it will never do so again." It copies "Northward," with the prefix of "From the Californian," and the affix of "Emilie Lawson" as authoress. But heretofore its sins have been so many that in reading in a late Dramatic Feuilleton by "Ariel" in that journal, "I believe that the Leader would succeed even if it were located in San Francisco. CALIFORNIAN please copy," we were tempted to copy with the added remark that it would succeed even in New York if it managed to nip all our contributions without acknowledgment of the source.

The fact of the matter is this: We are attempting to build up a distinctive literature for California. In the feature of contributions to THE CALIFORNIAN—poetry especially—we have aimed to publish nothing which would not undergo critical examination and be received in any periodical on this continent, however elevated its standard might be. That we have not altogether failed is proved by the extensive copying and circulation which contributions to THE CALIFORNIAN have met with at the East, though that an error of judgment may occasionally occur is possible enough. Our rule, however, is never to publish an article merely because it is original, believing that a good selection is at any time infinitely preferable to a bad original—the same rule holding good as regards “copies” in art galleries. But we insist on claiming recognition and credit for our song birds from every paper that thinks their melodies worthy of reproduction; and trusting that our Eastern cotemporaries will see the justice of this demand, and aid us in the effort to make Californian literature known and appreciated abroad—all this is “respectfully submitted.”

DRAMATIC MENTION.

ON Wednesday evening the Keans took their farewell, probably forever, of the Californian stage. A more successful engagement than theirs has rarely if ever been played in San Francisco. For the fifty-six nights, over which period it extended, their receipts averaged more than one thousand dollars on each occasion, the largest house of any evening bringing in seventeen hundred dollars. Thus these artists, by the terms of their agreement being entitled to one-half the gross receipts, have received a substantial tribute of admiration amounting, in gold, to a greater weight than either of them could conveniently shoulder. Under such circumstances they are naturally very little sensitive as to what newspapers may say about them; but of their reception by the press of this coast, as well as by the public, they cannot very well complain. The pieces selected for their last appearance were Henry VIII.—Mr. Kean playing “Cardinal Wolsey,” to Mrs. Kean’s “Queen Catharine”—and The Jealous Wife—the Keans appearing as Mr. and Mrs. Oakley. Seemingly inspired by the crowded audiences which assembled to witness their last effort, and determined to leave behind them an impression which time could not very well efface, they exerted themselves to the utmost, and the consequence was an interpretation of their respective parts, which almost puts criticism at fault. As the “Cardinal,” Mr. Kean gave full play to his expressive features, and his voice, less tremulous than usual, was at times sublime in its pathos. As the wronged Queen, Mrs. Kean towered up in the full dignity of womanhood, giving the bluff-browed King full warrant for swearing that she was indeed a royal Kate. But it was as the Jealous Wife that this lady reaped her full harvest of triumph; her brilliant eyes now glowing with suppressed passion, and anon sparkling with the wildest mirth. These artists wear their years easily, Mrs. Kean in particular retaining her vigor and life of action with a tenacity as surprising as it is rare. The occasion of Mr. Kean’s benefit on Tuesday evening was well attended, notwithstanding the pouring rain; the jam and crush of carriages at the theatre doors reminding old opera-goers of Irving Place on field nights. The Iron Chest, the piece d’occasion, was one of the elder Kean’s favorites, and the present one can also rank the character of “Sir Edward Mortimer” among his best impersonations. He held the house entranced as by a spell, and at times a stitch in knitting might almost have been heard to drop—let alone a pin. Mr. Kean’s most ardent admirer could scarcely call him handsome, but his face is eminently an expressive one, his play of feature at times is surprising, and he is possessed of eloquent speaking eyes. With proper management in New York, whither these artists go after a brief detour by the Island of Jamaica, success is almost certain for them. The reverence and love for Edmund Kean will draw an audience in the first place, and the undoubted genius of Charles will do the rest. Once accustomed to Mr. Kean’s peculiarities, the probabilities are that the couple will become the fashion, and gather greenbacks to their hearts’ content. With them go the members of their troupe, Miss Chapman, Mr. Cathcart, Mr. Everett, and Mr. Coppin. Of the lady, their niece, very little can be said, other than that she is pains-taking, and faithful to her part as far as lies within her capacity. Either Mr. Cathcart or Mr. Everett would be a good addition to almost any stock company. That the Keans choose them for support is quite equivalent to a paragraph in their praise. Of Mr. Coppin an opinion is expressed elsewhere. As “Dogberry” in Much Ado about Nothing, on Monday night, he was scarcely tolerable, and his “write me down an aw” was fairly execrable. Barry, of the regular company, would have done the part much better. His situation is the most enviable, perhaps, of any one’s attached to the company—he getting twenty per cent. of the gross receipts of his principals, and all that he can clear by his own hebdomadal appearances besides. The steamer of yesterday certainly carried away two better artists than will probably visit these shores again for many a long day. In bidding them good-by we can only regret that, feeling it necessary to give the poor of this city a benefit, they had not been moved to make it a benefit by vouchsafing the receipts of a theatrical performance instead of a Saturday afternoon’s reading.

The steamer which arrived on Sunday last brought Matilda Heron, California’s old-time favorite, back to these shores. Nearly a dozen years have sped since she bade adieu to this, the scene of her early triumphs—years which have brought fulness to her form as well as ripeness to her dramatic fame not omitting to trace an occasional line upon the brow which, a chaplet of Camellias now encircles. But she is the same warm-hearted, impulsive woman, whose magnetism of manner carried California captive in an earlier day, and the shadow of a domestic affliction in the loss of a favorite child, which still rests upon her soul, has toned down her rendition of her great character to a pathos which it never had before. Not only is her “Camille” the one par excellence of not only the American but also of any stage; but more than this, there are critics, and excellent ones, too, who write it down as the finest piece of acting which the American stage possesses at present. This may seem extravagant, but it must be remembered that her critics seldom stop half-way, almost invariably going the whole length of either unqualified praise or sweeping censure. In one respect, a resemblance may be traced between Miss Heron and Mr. Kean: neither are handsome, but the soul which looks out from every feature on the stage almost persuades one to believe them so. Miss Heron makes her appearance on the Opera House stage in Camille, on Monday evening next, and the piece will probably be run through the week, Mr. Mayo playing “Armand,” and Mrs. Saunders “Prudence.” The cast is a capital one, and a full house should welcome our early favorite back, for it was from these same boards that the Heron first plumed herself for the dramatic flight which has proven so eminently successful.

This evening will witness Mrs. Agnes Perry’s benefit at the Opera House, Miss Clarkson making her début on the occasion in the capital comedy of Masks and Faces—better known to the public, perhaps, by the title of Charles Reade’s novel from which it is a dramatization—Peg Woffington. Of Miss Clarkson’s dramatic ability we have never had an opportunity to judge, and consequently reserve our decision until the morrow, but she carries one essential recommendation to an audience in her face and figure, being both pretty and graceful. Rumor says that the débutante is a pupil of Mrs. Perry’s, and if so, we see no sufficient reason why she should not do credit to her training—for the beneficiary’s must be a very severe school. An excellent actress and a very general favorite, we have little doubt that Mrs. Perry’s benefit will merit the name.

Mr. Mayo had an excellent benefit on Thursday evening, the result, probably, of the entertaining programme which he offered, as well as of his personal popularity. As “D’Artagnan,” in the Three Guardsmen, he appeared to very good advantage, the character enabling him to show some of his best points, unmarred by the lachrymose tones in which he is too prone to indulge when he fancies that extraordinary pathos is demanded. He was seconded or “supported” by Mrs. Mayo, as “Constance”—in the technicalities of the stage to say that the husband is supported by the wife involves no reproach to either. As “Anne of Austria,” Mrs. Edwin won her usual plaudits. Miss Jeany Kempton, a most excellent and deserving artist, of whose contemplated departure upon the next steamer for the East we regret to learn, sang “Il Segreto” and “Come In and Shut the Door,” with great taste and effect. The performance concluded with The Widow’s Victim, the beneficiary, in the character of “Jerry Clip,” giving all his old imitations of well-known actors, with additional ones of Mr. and Mrs. Kean and Backus—these innovations were burlesques rather than imitations, of course exciting all the more merriment on that account. In conclusion, Mr. Mayo made a speech of acknowledgment, imparting the interesting intelligence that his departure is postponed, and that he remains to second Miss Heron during her engagement. His “Armand” is good.

The afternoon performance at the Opera House to-day offers Black-Eyed Susan—a drama which would probably draw better had not a black-eyed Susan been on free exhibition in the Police Court yesterday morning. The Eureka Minstrel Troupe will also appear, and Miss Jenny Kempton—the sweetest minstrel of them all—will sing. For to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music, a Sacred Concert is offered, in which Billy Birch, Backus, Wambold, Bernard, and all the balance of those sable and solemn singers will appear. Think of the effect! The three B’s singing “Old Hundred” or “Greenland’s Icy Mountains,” with Wambold ringing in with a too tonic chorus. But we are informed that the selections are principally from serious operas, with ballads of a pensive cast; even without that information we would almost hazard the assertion that Mr. Magnire is too politic a manager to offend the underlying religious sentiment of the community, by burlesquing sacred melodies. What Tommy Peel will do we do not know, but suppose he will confine himself to Shaker dances.

Miss Annette Ince, a pleasing actress, who is about to try her fortune at the East, takes a farewell benefit at Platt’s Hall this evening. That it will be well attended we sincerely hope, for the lady deserves at least one cordial recognition from our public. It may be truthfully written of her that she has never degraded her art for the sake of dollars, nor pandered to what seemed the popular taste for the sake of filling her houses, but, on the contrary, has always rigidly and conscientiously adhered to the legitimate and higher walks of her profession. During her management of the Metropolitan in conjunction with Mrs. Hayne, that standard was undeviatingly maintained; the public did not reward her then—let them do so now. The programme of the entertainment promises scenes from Macbeth and Ion, and readings and recitations of popular pieces, to conclude with the charming comedieta of The Morning Call, in the rendition of which we are not informed whether or not the editors of that sprightly sheet will assist, though the interest of the performance would be materially increased were the affirmative the case.

Still another benefit is advertised for Wednesday evening next—that of Signora Bianchi. Norma will be produced for the occasion, and Miss Jenny Kempton—announced as the “favorite contralto”—with Mrs. Cassie Mattison—announced as the “splendid contralto”—will then appear for the “last time in California.” What is the matter? Why this sudden migration of contraltos? What bodes it? Really we do not understand its tenor. Signora Bianchi as one of our oldest and most popular artists deserves a good house, and we hope she may get it. Particulars of the programme in another column.

Miss Richardson’s poem “The Northern Seer” was read at Platt’s Hall on Friday evening of last week. In compliance with an invitation we were present, but being unable to hear or distinguish a word of the poem except at rare and occasional intervals, and failing to find anyone who in this respect was more fortunate, we are manifestly unable to pronounce upon the poem. As to the merits of Mr. Warwick, however, no difficulty or dispute exists, as it is very generally conceded that his style or school combines the action of a saw-mill gate so beautifully with the rising and falling notes of a key-bugle in unpractised hands, that it is almost impossible to say which predominates.

In the absence of any other comedian combining the advantages of study which ripe experience as “actor, manager, litterateur and legislator” is supposed to afford, the Learned Pig is starring it at the Museum. Although sadly deficient in “bouhommie” this candidate for popular favor presents the very important claims to critical and æsthetical consideration of being able to spell; moreover, though he can read writing or printing, he never has even granted dissatisfaction because a journal in fair discussion of his merits expressed the opinion that though he might be capital pork it could not conscientiously praise him as a performer. It is pleasant to have one actor who can discriminate between the butcher’s knife and the pen when legitimately used. Perhaps it is not strange, however, that the Learned Pig takes kindly to the pen, and never grumbles at lying in the bed which he makes.

THE NEW MINISTER TO FRANCE.—Relative to the mission to France, “Castine,” the Washington correspondent of the Sacramento Union, writes that Henry J. Raymond, of the New York Times, has been most prominently before the public for the place, but that he himself states that he is too ambitious to accept a foreign mission, which, at this time of life, a member of Congress from New York, would be exile to him. The disqualifications of John P. Hale, Montgomery Blair, Bigelow and others, are enumerated, and finally the correspondent concludes by hazarding the conjecture that Seward may quietly take that place by way of gracefully retiring from the Cabinet. A good French scholar, and an accomplished gentleman, with a natural bent towards diplomacy, a better appointment than that of Henry J. Raymond, as American representative at the French Court, could not be made; and when we consider the misrepresentation abroad, to which our nation has for many years been subjected, we are tempted to wish that he may be prevailed upon to accept it.

GIVE HIM A CHANCE.—We notice that some of our cotemporaries are firing regretful guns over the appointment of one Felix O’Byrne as First Lieut. in the Eighth California Volunteers, and Quartermaster to the Regiment. It is true that the gentleman’s record is not very clear, but he came among us a stranger—so far as lay within his power he has done good service to the cause which is dear to all our hearts; he suffered under the pressure of poverty in the outset, and under such circumstances a man is very apt to drift into expedients which he would not adopt under more favorable conditions. He has a wife and family dependent upon his hands, and whatever the past may be the future is his own. Give him a chance; let Gov. Low’s appointment stand, and see if he do not redeem himself and justify the trust reposed in him. It is this persistent following up of poor fellows that makes criminals and fills prisons.

A PARAGRAPH is going the rounds of the Eastern press as follows: “The California papers propose that an internal revenue tax of one dollar an inch be levied on the tails of Chinamen. Consternation accordingly reigns in pig-taildom.” If that novel way of “raising the wind” do not cross the Atlantic to find extensive circulation in England and Europe, and be commented upon, perhaps by the London Times, as an instance of prospective rank “injustice to the foreigner,” we are very much mistaken in a conjecture.

"A LITTLE BOX FOR YOU, SIR"

PRACTICAL joking has gone out of fashion in these latter days, or rather, I may say, since the Crimean campaign taught us that soldiering was not—

"All gold lace and sash,
And a great deal of dash;"

but that he who wore the gold lace must carry beneath it a sterling heart, and learn, perhaps practically, how that same gaudy sash is long enough and wide enough, slight as it seems, to carry a six-foot man. Practical joking was, I say, knocked out of our fellows during those damp nights in the trenches, and burning dust blinding mid-days in those hitherto scarcely known regions, now, alas! marked in letters of blood, but, thank God, crowned too by wreaths of laurel.

During the years of what civilians and croakers were wont to designate as "inglorious peace," preceding the April of 1854, such of us as were on home service had really very little to do but to kick our heels about and scatter our parents' cash, in the manner most calculated to amuse ourselves or suited to our individual inclinations. It was very good fun being a soldier, if you had plenty of money, impudence, and pluck, with a good amount of self-respect—sometimes called conceit; better still if you had a handle to your name or a handsome face to justify your conceit, and by not any means despicable was a good fortune; though, if the other two advantages were possessed, the last was always obtainable, heiresses being then, as now, open to the seductive influence of the god of war. Yet, with all this, life in country quarters became often a somewhat dull affair, and these present days of parade, rifle practice, and all sorts of "hard work," would have been actually welcomed, if only for the sake of change, and the break they would make in the monotony of barrack life. Some quarters were all well enough, no doubt—such as lay in sporting districts, for instance. Then those fellows who had the money came out strong in pink or pointers (according to the season), and those who had no money came out still stronger, upon the chance of something turning up some day or other—some luck that would enable them to pay the shot, towards which the handsome allowance the British constitution considers her officers' lives and work worth, goes a very short way. But though a man might fish through the spring in Devonshire, shoot through the autumn in Yorkshire, and hunt through the winter in Northampton or Leicestershire, it didn't follow that he could always indulge in quarters so desirable: and when he was elsewhere, time had to be killed, and required a deal more killing, too. Thus it was that we fell into the way of what has since been much abused, and at last very justly put down—namely, practical joking.

Dozens of good stories are told and laughed over, some of them having become almost standard anecdotes, bearing upon names whose very sound sends a thrill of pride to a true Englishman's heart; and I've seen a certain grim old warrior, who shall be nameless here, laugh till the tears ran down his wrinkled cheeks, as some contemporary and brother of the laurel wreath reminded him of the days of old.

Well, all this is a long preamble to the real pith of my story—the history of a practical joke in which I was a party, and though a passive, a particularly interested one. It fell out thus. I had grown tired of the line, and persuaded my uncle to purchase my company in a crack cavalry corps, in place of the marching regiment wherein I had attained my existing rank of lieutenant. The regiment into which my exchange was effected was quartered in a well-known cathedral city, surrounded by a first-rate sporting country, inhabited by hospitable landholders—who were as liberal with their coverts as their claret—and, moreover, famed for the beauty of its gentle sex, the ne plus ultra of which lay under the walls of the venerable palace itself.

Kate Courtown was the bishop's only child—beautiful, accomplished, clever, and an heiress. Therefore it was quite a natural conclusion that we (I speak advisedly—we, I say) were all in love with her; from the youngest cornet, who innocently told us he liked her best because she was something like his mother, to the brazen-faced old reprobate, our lieutenant-colonel, who actually grew virtuous for the six months we remained in the pleasant old city, and not only got inside the cathedral in time for service, but kept awake until the sermon began, when he took his revenge by snoring behind his red curtain, publicly reprimanding a newly joined sub. for the same delinquency—adding, that if he did sleep, he ought to do so in a reverent way.

I believe most regiments have at least one lady-killer on their list—one, I mean par excellence the acknowledged Adonis. Ours was a certain Captain Hetherston, who rejoiced in the nickname of Box, owing to the efficient manner in which he came out as that well-known character in the jolly old comedy. Although a popular man with the mess, he was not individually a favorite. That was not anything particular, you may remark. But it was not jealousy; his good looks had nothing to do with the feeling. It was the "take all but give nothing" sort of way he had that did the mischief. None of us could have said we knew where he came from, or where the friends he talked so big about lived—how much he had to live upon, or where it came from. We saw him as he was—an uncommonly handsome, well-dressed, and well off fellow; but we saw, too, that he never spent a shilling he could screw out of another man, and sponged cleverly upon any of us for a seat in a cab, to a dinner or ball, a cigar or a drink; that he had always an excuse ready to meet any chance demand for a like civility; and what perhaps riled some of us most was that, upon the strength of a pretty little house in Bayswater, he kept clear of the little expensive peccadilloes which beset our paths, and kept his divinity so quiet that a whisper stole among us, to the effect that the lady in Bayswater was a delusion.

He had affected indifference towards the palace beauty at first, and then had quietly concentrated his forces and taken up his position in a manner that would have done him infinite credit in the field of war, as well as love. At first he made but little ground; but the summer came, bringing with it reviews, chance rides, and sketting parties, and now and then one of those field days for flirtation, garden dances.

The beauty looked amiable. The captain grew sentimental, talked of giving up smoking and the house in town. Our fellows began to prink up their ears, and the odds in his favor were freely offered. The match, from being the talk of the mess, of course crept out and got into the gossips' mouth in the town, and soon conjecture and scandal were at their height.

Meantime Box ate as many dinners as the bishop offered him, called regularly, paid court to the maiden aunts who superintended the house-keeping department, and took all the credit he could get.

Things were at this pass when a lieutenant from the —th Lancers exchanged into our corps—not a prepossessing youth at first sight, very young and boyish-looking, but blessed with a quiet, unimpressible sort of temper, that seemed proof against all the the sarcasms, innuendoes, and even insults, freely lavished under the cover of practical jokes.

He seemed to have got his first step very quickly, and though with all the makings of a fine soldier like man, he was just at that period an overgrown, loose-limbed boy; with a propensity to blush when a woman spoke to him, and a quiet manner of getting out of the way if anything not altogether strictly decorous was going on or being canvassed. He was laughed at, of course, and many a trap laid to bring him to the test; but all to no effect. The laugh made no impression; he went on, quietly and consistently keeping his own course with a good-natured but perfectly firm indifference, and ere long, somehow, most of us began to have a respect for the young hand, and just enough modesty left to feel a little bit ashamed of the scenes he avoided.

Box seemed to have taken an antipathy to the new lieutenant since the beginning, and the consequence was a constant sparring and repetition of jokes perpetrated by the captain, who made a heavy wager he would make the regiment too hot to hold Vincent before the year was out. Vincent heard of it somehow, and only laughed in his quiet way, offering ten to one he would be in the corps longer than Box. Still, through all this affected carelessness, we who watched closest could see how the spirit rebelled, and how the boy's temper boiled under the persecutions of the captain, who divided his time pretty equally between tormenting Vincent and love-making—so said the gossips at the palace.

The townfolk were already deciding the settlements; young ladies were speculating who would be asked to be bridesmaids; and not a few ill-natured remarks were being raked up as to flirtations, and, after the manner of our dear friends, not a little was hinted about the petty peccadilloes of the past.

September, with its turnip-fields and partridges; October, with its red woods, pleasures, and long evenings, worked up the country hospitality to a pitch there was no withstanding. Dinner invitations flowed in galore. The engagement was not yet completed, but what October and the shooting season failed to accomplish, the hunting-field gave ample promise of fulfilling. The heiress was a first-rate horsewoman, and never missed a meet if she could find a lady to second her. Accordingly, Box took a trip to town and brought back a couple of hunters. Our fellows first opened their eyes and then their mouths; but nothing came of it save that Box said, with one of his "shut-you-up laughs," "They cost me a cool hundred apiece, but I'll take three for the pair."

"The deuce you will!" muttered Vincent, and so the subject dropped, the captain taking to his pigskin kindly, riding well and straight when he did ride, but eschewing much following, except after Miss Courtown.

Vincent turned out a hunting man too, and soon showed us that, although we might get our laugh at him in the barracks or on the parade, we had to play second fiddle with a vengeance at the covert side. There was no doubt about it, the fellow was a tiptop rider, and soon made him a marked man in the field, both on account of his tact and judgment, and the quiet gentleman-like way in which he did the business. The livery-stable keepers besieged him with offers of their best horses; he might have them for half-price—nay, I believe for nothing, if he'd only ride them to sell. Vincent had as much of them of it as he wanted, and when our fellows quizzed him for not buying a couple of beasts for himself, he said with a laugh, "I'm waiting to get Hetherston's when he's tired of them." Box heard the joke, and didn't like it; he was beginning to get a wee bit afraid of the quiet lieutenant; and, moreover, the heiress had noticed the new rider, and poor Box was as jealous as a modern Othello.

December came in, and Vincent gave no signs of wishing to alter his quarters; nay, he publicly stated he was very jolly, and that he'd not miss the February hunting for all the leaves in the service. The case was getting serious; so was the courting at the palace, Hetherston evidently watching an opportunity to make the grand check; the lady, to all appearance, willing to accept the mate.

Yet, anxious as the state of the matrimonial speculation may be supposed to render the captain, certain figures in a little Russian leather pocket-book began to become disagreeably prominent. The year was upon its last legs. Charley Vincent was showing no signs of tiring of the jokes perpetrated upon him; indeed, like the eels, he appeared not only to have got used to them, but there seemed a sort of pleasant excitement and uncertainty as to the next move which suited him; and Hetherston began to think he had been a little rash in booking so many figures, which, when reckoned up (in case of the worst) came to a much larger sum than was convenient, to say nothing of beaten—a humiliation the captain did not relish at any time.

A dinner party was to come off at the palace a few evenings before Christmas; all the big-wigs and country people were to be there; a select few of "ours"—Hetherston of course included—were invited, and we made up our minds—though upon what grounds Heaven only knows—that Box would pop the question that night. The lady was just in that tender dreamy state which betrays the awakened heart, and gives the lover courage to take the irrevocable step. The bishop looked the very pattern of a fatherly prelate, and had a mischievous, know-all-about-it sort of twinkle in his eyes, as, in pairing off his guests for the important ceremony of going down to be fed, he told Hetherston to take "My daughter." It was my luck to follow the couple—and it spoilt my dinner, for I had been fool enough to take the odds against the match, and it was pretty evident I should lose.

"Take you a hundred to ten he'll do it to-night," whispered Harry Fulton as we streamed down stairs, the happy couple being directly in front of us, and looking abominably foolish, as is the manner of people at such a crisis.

"Done," said I, involuntarily, and then mentally cursed my folly.

The dinner passed off as such dinners usually do; the soup was bad, fish good, joints ditto, all the other things horrible, saving the dessert, which, being fresh from dame Nature, cannot be easily spoilt. I had taken down a ponderous dame belonging to some one of the county families, who happily devoted her attention to the business before her, and, seeming to be under the impression that it is impossible to do two things well at once, left me to devote my time and fascinations upon an exceedingly pretty girl who sat on the other side of me, and whom, to my surprise, I discovered to be a sister of Vincent's, then upon a visit at the palace. Of course we had plenty to talk of, and ere the dinner was over, I began to think Vincent one of the nicest fellows I knew, and I spoke of him quite affectionately, I assure you. The important business of eating was over, and the servants retiring, when a footman marched up the room, carrying a plain white deal box, which he deposited upon the ground behind the captain's chair, saying, in a distinct and emphatic voice:

"A little box for you, sir!"

He then quietly made his exit, though not before I caught a glimpse of his face, which, in spite of powder and false whiskers, looked uncommonly like Vincent's, and made me hold my breath in anxiety to see the result convinced that the joke, whatever it was, would be a clincher. Nor was I wrong; and amid the buzz of inquiry and polite curiosity that the advent of a deal box in the midst of a formal dinner party might be supposed to excite, a long, plaintive, and unmistakably infantine cry rose from the mysterious box.

Captain Hetherston started to his feet with an oath, and a face like a maniac. An attempt at decorum held the lookers on silent for an instant, then a perfect storm of laughter broke forth, under cover of which poor Box rushed from the room in a state of mind "better to be imagined than described," as the reporters say.

Truly Vincent had his revenge; there was no use telling the bishop the baby was the color-sergeant's, and the whole thing a practical joke. Hetherston tried it once, but made no farther attempt. The story went the round of the country, got up to town, and into the morning paper, and the end was, that our all-accomplished Box, under plea of sudden business, got leave, during which he exchanged into the —th, then serving in India; and ere a year had passed over our heads Vincent had purchased his company, and was figuring off in the first sheet of the supplement to the Times, as having led to the hymeneal altar Kate Courtown, only daughter of the Very Rev. the Bishop of ——.—St. James's Magazine.

BREWSTER & CO.'S Carriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA, will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE, and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES, and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to
BREWSTER & CO.,
Of Broome street,

The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,
Of No. 372, Broome street,

de17-5m NEW YORK.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,
Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets
San Francisco. de17-5m

CALIFORNIA Collegiate Institute, FOR YOUNG LADIES.

64 Silver street, between Second and Third streets.

PRINCIPAL—MISS M. LAMMOND.

ASSISTANTS—Miss M. P. Hastings, Miss De Torrey, Miss H. E. Martin, Mrs. S. A. Gregory.

FRENCH—Mme. Villimere.

SPANISH—Senor A. Vallojo.

MUSIC—Professor E. Hartman, Piano; Mrs. S. A. Gregory, Piano; Professor J. B. Beutler, Vocal.

OIL PAINTING AND DRAWING—Mr. Frederick A. Butman.

DANCING—Mons. Galavotti.

The friends and patrons of this Institution, and these interested in the cause of Education, are cordially invited to visit during the hours of Recitation, from half-past 9 o'clock, A. M. to 3 P. M.

ja14-1m

M. LAMMOND, Principal.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
—N—
Fine Clothing
—AND—
GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

GOODWIN & CO.,
HAVING RECEIVED AT THE
LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,
—THE—
First Premium,
—ON—
FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES.

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such
Consisting of

Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,
DINING ROOM AND
OFFICE FURNITURE,

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,
No. 528 Washington street
no12

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!

CANTY & WAGNER.

(SUCCESSORS TO J. REGAN.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS.

113 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Between Bush and Sutter, San Francisco.

N. B.—ALL CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.

Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to. de3-3m

PHINEAS BANNING,
FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT
WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. sp24

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the heart, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay, San Francisco. au27

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay, San Francisco. au27

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION

FOR

RESTORING, INVIGORATING,

BEAUTIFYING

AND

DRESSING

THE

Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicate dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two hottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Petridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents, San Francisco. ja25-4f

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Minturn, Esq., as to his value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Culverwell and Lyou & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of balling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crinca; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandelers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN,

No. 28 Third street, San Francisco,

Who will give all information about them. de17-3m

ATKINS MASSEY, UNDERTAKER, (At the Old Stand.)

No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,
First house below Kearny street.

Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases. Office of the City and County Coroner. de3-1f

NATHANIEL GRAY, UNDERTAKER, CITY AND COUNTY SEATON,

641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,

Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC BURIAL CASES AND CASKETS.

de17-3m

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS offered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the inventor,

CHRETIEN PFISTER,

oc15-1f No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;

JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;

STEAMBOAT GIN;

GLD TOM GIN;

IRISH WHISKY, from Bond direct.

V. SQRZA,

For sale by 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco. ja28-4f

P. J. WHITE & CO.,

SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN.

BUTTER, LARD, HAMS, BACON, PORK,

SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,

And a general assortment of

GROCERIES,

Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Battery, San Francisco.

Your trade is respectfully solicited. de10-1f

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

FROM THE CITY.

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my25 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 2 and 4, San Francisco. y2

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THERE is very little to "record" this week, the wires having been down most of the time and bringing very little of interest or positive statement while they were up. Still Eastern correspondents seem to be crying "Peace, peace, when there is no peace," and all that we out here can do is hope and wait, not committing ourselves to a too ready belief. Foote is within the Federal lines, where he should be pressed into the foot service if not among the mounted men, and made to kick against the 168,150 bayonets that, according to the Herald's story comprise the rebel strength on the James.

January 26.—Deserters from the rebel army are coming into our lines in front of Petersburg, very numerous, all of whom tell the most doleful stories of the hardships they had to endure from the scarcity of provisions, etc.

More peace speculations! Blair had arrived from Richmond, and was understood to report that among many leaders in the rebel capital, Jeff Davis included, there is a strong feeling towards making peace on the best terms they can get.

The Union gunboats are gradually feeling their way up the river towards Wilmington. They had already gone up some four miles above Fort Fisher. Our troops are quietly resting and organizing for further operations.

In the capture of Pocotaligo by a portion of Sherman's forces, two thousand prisoners were taken, with all their artillery.

Advices from Eastport, Miss., state that the 18th Tennessee cavalry, 600 strong, encamped at Clinton, Tenn., sent word to our lines that they wished to surrender, take the oath of allegiance, and go home.

Two more blockade-runners, the Stag and Charlotte, with cargoes of rifles, blankets, etc., were captured by our fleet.

Large numbers of negroes are constantly coming into the Union lines in North Carolina, for the purpose of enlisting.

January 27.—Heavy guns are being mounted at City Point and other places along the James, to oppose the rebel fleet, should it again make any attack. The Ironsides and Atlanta were ordered up the river.

The fragment of Breckinridge's army that escaped Stoneman and Burbridge, are at Lynchburg.

A Union raiding party has gone up the Chowan, N. C., in the direction of Weldon; it is said to number from 6,000 to 10,000 men, including cavalry and infantry.

January 28.—Capt. Bridgewater, and seventy or eighty Federals, had a fight with a detachment of the Fourth Missouri (rebel) cavalry, four miles from Harrisburg. They killed four or five of the rebels and several prisoners were taken.

On the 28th, Sue Munday's guerrilla band dashed into Bloomfield, surprised a party of one hundred and seventeen discharged soldiers, captured fourteen and killed them on the spot. The guerrillas alleged in justification that the soldiers had executed a guerrilla named Dudley, a few days before.

The Herald's correspondent near Petersburg, on the 28th, says:

The rebel ram movement on the James River, was deeper in design than supply. The rams were to move down the river just as they did, and destroy our pontoons. Signal rockets were to be sent up, by which means intelligence was to be conveyed to see that the pontoon part of the business had been accomplished. After destroying the pontoons, the rams were to prevent reinforcements from being sent from the south to the north side of the river. Simultaneously with the above there was to be commenced a dashing attack in front of Ord's lines, on the north side of the James, having massed a heavy force in front of them for that purpose, and attempt, by overwhelming numbers and a sudden attack, to destroy that part of Grant's army.

The World's Washington special mentions the beginning of a new campaign, which will be brief but grand. It says the reported and ultimate object of their attention will create for them more prestige and glory than the capture of a hundred ordinary cities. Every available soldier in Sherman's army left Savannah, Beaufort, and Port Royal, and their destination is still a mystery to the enemy, who continue to guess.

Deserters from Hardee's army report that the enemy depend almost solely on the resistance made beyond Charleston city to save it from capture.

Two of the fleet which went up the Arkansas river to Fort Smith, were captured and burned at White Oak Shoal. Two other steamers were damaged, but escaped.

Guerrillas attacked our pickets back of Memphis on Thursday, but were driven off with the loss of their leaders and several others.

The Port Royal New South of the 23d contains an account of the occupation of Salkutchie by our troops. It was thought that the rebels would make a stand at Ashepoo. Part of Porter's fleet had joined Dahlgren in Charleston harbor.

The Times' Savannah correspondent of the 19th says the last of Sherman's army would leave Savannah on the day following. The first and third divisions of the Twentieth Corps were at Hardeeville, S. C. when last heard from.

The despatches this week are, as usual, sensational, on the Peace question, especially. According to the Tribune, Jeff. Davis, in their late interview, entreated Blair to effect the passage of the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. He confessed that the war had uprooted and destroyed slavery, which had induced disunion. The hope of being able yet to save slavery and re-enthroned it, was the only obstacle to peace and the restoration of the Union. This was told on the floor of the House.

Whether it was in accordance with the prayer of the Confederate leader or not, the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery passed the House on the afternoon of the 31st, by a vote of 116 to 77.

It is stated that it was part of the object of Mr. Stanton's visit to Savannah to advise with General Sherman, that if the rebels should propose terms of peace he should hold himself in readiness.

The full strength of the rebel army, according to a correspondent of the N. Y. Herald, is 168,150 men of all arms. Their forces are scattered from the James to the Red River, and from the Atlantic coast to the Indian Territories.

Henry S. Foote had arrived within the lines of Sheridan's army at Winchester.

A large number of Union prisoners were taken from Georgia to Salisbury, N. C., to prevent their capture by Gen. Sherman.

LOCAL ITEMS.

The Concert in aid of the Catholic Free Schools of this city, recently given at Union Hall, was a complete success.

Michael Hayes (arrested on charge of complicity in a piratical conspiracy) was released from custody by order of the U. S. District Court, upon taking the oath of allegiance, Jan. 28th, the Grand Jury having ignored the bill against him. His friends and neighbors, with the assistance of Kidd's band, testified their gratification by a serenade in the evening.

Mary Price, aged seven years, fell from a bank near the corner of Mason and Union streets, Jan. 28th, breaking a leg.

The body of James Cunningham, a Norwegian sailor, was found floating in the Bay, Monday, between Jackson and Washington streets. He had been missing several days.

The San Francisco Guards, comprising one hundred of our fighting Judges, Supervisors, merchants, lawyers, and other citizens, assumed their first military occupation of their recently-completed Armory on Post street, Friday evening. The proficiency attained by this company, and the well-known self-sacrificing disposition of its members, will relieve public apprehension in regard to a scarcity of Major Generals, should there be trouble on this coast.

Alexander Eddy, of the firm of Eddy & Fuller, teachers of dancing, suddenly fell and expired of heart disease, at the hall on Market street, Monday. Deceased leaves a family.

"As like as two peas," was illustrated in the Police Court, a few days since, to the utter perplexity of prosecuting witness William Tennent, whose personal appearance had been considerably damaged by one of the Gough brothers. Chas. H. Gough (charged as Wm. H.) had been arrested, but in the Court-room his twin-brother, Henry O., changed places with him, and the witness swore positively that he was the person who made the assault. The other brother was then produced, and so close was the resemblance that Tennent was fairly bewildered, and unable to decide to which of them he was indebted for personal attentions. A postponement was ordered, and on Tuesday the question of which one wasn't the other was solved.

Seldom have our citizens experienced such a thrill of horror as that which was felt on Tuesday last, when the particulars of a most shocking tragedy at the William Tell House, on Bush street, between Montgomery and Kearny, became known. While several were reading at a table in the sitting-room, all unconscious of danger, Isaac Schmidt, an insane man, (an old citizen who has recently returned from Mexico,) entered, walked coolly around the table—doubtless making a selection deliberately—seized Francis Lonncaux by the arm, placed the muzzle of a pistol against his back, and fired, inflicting a very dangerous wound, undoubtedly intended to be instantly fatal. Schmidt then shot himself through the heart, ran up stairs, stabbed himself a few times and passed away, never more, fortunately, to be a source of terror and danger to his species. That he was able to get up stairs after his heart was pierced with a bullet would be incredible but that the fact was developed upon post mortem examination. Lonncaux is a portrait painter, has resided here a long time, and so far as can yet be ascertained was entirely unknown to Schmidt.

The corner-stone of the house commenced for Crescent Engine Company, No. 10, on Stockton street, was laid Thursday afternoon, under the direction of Chief Engineer Scannel, assisted by ex-Engineer D. T. Van Orden and Major John Stratman. The Major filled the stone with selections from the current literature and coins of the day; Mr. Van Orden applied the cement, the Chief declared the work complete, the stars and stripes and three rousing cheers went up, champagne, lager, cake and sandwiches went down, Havanas were lighted, and the affair ended in smoke and jollity.

F. A. Woodworth, (son of the poet of "Old Oaken Bucket" immortality,) one of the founders of the Society of Pioneers, an old-time merchant, an active friend of the Industrial school, and in every way an estimable and useful citizen, died in this city, Feb. 2d, aged 47 years.

Edward Marcott is suing for divorce from Hannah M. Marcott. Meanwhile Judge Pratt has ordered that plaintiff furnish defendant fifty dollars, alimony, on the sixth day of the present and each subsequent month, and pay her counsel one hundred dollars. In the application for this order, Mrs. Marcott alleged that she was compelled to live separately from her husband in consequence of his cruelty, that she was poor, and had a child to support.

Harry Botasky, aged six years, was pushed off the platform of one of the Hayes Valley cars, while in motion, on Tuesday, by a playmate; the wheels passed over one of his legs crushing it badly; it is thought, however, the limb can be saved.

The store and basement of Brannan's building, northeast corner Montgomery and California streets, have been leased for five years, from May 1st, by the Pacific Bank, at $500 per month.

William J. Caldwell, of Murphy's Camp, who has been stopping some time at the American Exchange Hotel, in this city, and who had complained of ill-health, experienced a sudden suffocating sensation and died at about one o'clock, A. M. Feb. 1st.

The sum of $535 was collected in Cavalry Church, Bush street, last Sunday, for the benefit of the San Francisco Protestant Orphan Asylum.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

In Rock Gulch, Yankee Hill, a lump of gold weighing 43 ounces was recently found.

It is understood that Lient. McDougal, late of the Saginaw, has been appointed to the command of the Cumanche.

There were 611 patients in the Insane Asylum at Stockton, Feb. 1st.

The Marysville Express says that prospects for the future progress of that city are brightening. Merchants and mechanics are preparing for an active campaign in the spring.

Some of our interior merchants must look forward with joyful anticipation to a residence in that country "where thieves do not break through and steal." Among other instances of burglaries recently committed, we notice that the store of John Baxter & Co., at Oregon Hill, Yuba county, was robbed of goods worth $600. The goods had just been received, and "went off" with more speed than profit.

J. Kelly was shockingly mangled lately at Austin, Nevada, while adjusting some mining machinery.

We acknowledge the receipt of an invitation to be present at a ball in honor of Washington's Birthday, to be given by Confidence Engine Company, No. 1, of Sacramento. In some cases distance may "lend enchantment," but this is certainly not one of them, for the company has a State-wide reputation for getting up its "Annuals" in a style which assures the comfort and pleasure of all who participate.

In Sacramento a divorce has been asked for and granted in the case of Josephine Thomas vs. Kasper Thomas. The suit was commenced September 27, 1859, since which time the plaintiff died. The decree was probably obtained with a view to securing certain rights of property by the heirs. The Union remarks that it is the first case within its knowledge in which a divorce has been ordered at the instance of a deceased person.

Catharine White, a native of Austria, died at the Comet Hotel, Sacramento, Dec. 29th, under circumstances so suspicious in their nature that they have led to the arrest of C. Miller (proprietor of the hotel) and his wife, on a charge of poisoning. A deed and will conveying to them Mrs. White's property was found in their possession.

Francis Taylor killed R. M. Johnson, in Marin county, Jan. 30th. There are various stories about the affair—all of them long ones—but there can be no doubt as to the killing, if, as stated, Taylor presented his piece and fired, "putting a charge of seven pistol balls in Johnson's abdomen, and a charge of large shot in his side." Johnson fired, in return, badly wounding Taylor, who nevertheless made his escape to this city, where he was arrested, Feb. 1st, by detective officers Chappell and Watkins. He was taken to the City and County Hospital, and subsequently removed to Marin county. An old quarrel (revived at an unfortunate moment) about cattle-shooting, and a dispute in regard to dogs, it is stated, led to the homicide. Taylor, who bears a good reputation, represents his conduct as being entirely defensive.

The total State tax to be levied and collected for the year ending March 1, 1865, is 115 cents on each $100 of taxable property.

A snow-slide suddenly buried John H. Williams, Christopher Nelson and Iver Hanson, as they were going to their claim at Silver Mountain, recently. The bodies of Williams and Nelson were found.

BOOK-KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete BUSINESS EDUCATION, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4 3m

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
645 Washington st., San Francisco.

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvius' Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charrière of Paris, Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

'y30-1m BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
Over Parrott's Bank.

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,

ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,

No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKEY.

Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge.

fe4 3m I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
de31 3m

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

j72

CATHOLIC GIFTS,

IN GREAT VARIETY!

Consisting of—

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,
STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,
MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES

And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

For sale by

MICHAEL FLOOD,

Catholic Bookseller,

de17-1f

No. 428 Kearny street, San Francisco.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
GROCERIES AND PROVISIONS,

WINES AND LIQUORS,

Are prepared to offer great inducements to friends and patrons desiring goods in our line. Our stock consists in part as follows:

Old Government Java, Costa Rica and Rio Coffee.

Powdered, Crushed, Granulated, New

Orleans and Coffee Sugars.

Imperial, Young

Hyson,

English Breakfast

And Comet Oolong Tea, Japan

Tea, the BEST ever Imported to the State.

Expressly for our Family Trade. Genuine New

Orleans Molasses, Golden Syrup, Coal Oil, Choice Istmus

Butter, Extra Family Flour, Corn Meal, etc., etc., together

with a great variety of

FANCY GROCERIES,

Not usually kept by Grocers. Quality always guaranteed as represented. Goods delivered at the Wharves and Railroad Depots Free of Charge. The finest WINES

AND LIQUORS DIRECT FROM BOND.

ENGLISH ALE AND PORTER

For Family or Medicinal use.

BOWEN BROTHERS.

oc6-1f

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES, adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of SUPERIOR CARRIAGES, ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

THE REASON WHY

EVERYBODY USES

THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED

ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,

OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.
Second—It is more effectual.
Third—It saves labor.
Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally. Manufactory, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco. ja7 3m

THE CALIFORNIA ART UNION,

OVER THE STORE OF

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,

No. 312 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Is Now Open,

And will continue to receive Visitors DAILY from 10 A.M. until 10 P.M.

Terms of membership - - - - - Five Dollars
Single Admission - - - - - Twenty-five cents

Annual Subscriptions, Five Dollars, which entitles the subscriber to free admission to the Gallery; also, to an Engraving or Photograph of some Picture in the exhibition and a chance in the distribution of the property of the Association at the close of the season, according to the plan of the various Art Unions of Europe and the Atlantic States.

ja28-1f

WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing
Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-mentioned and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the “medicinal gum” of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.

E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.

Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.

R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.

W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.

W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.

Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.

H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the “utmost bounds of the earth,” without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass. and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of “I. BUTTS,” “SANFORD & PARK,” and “H. WISTAR, M. D.”

WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY

Is for sale by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,

San Francisco.

And by all Druggists.

ja28-1m

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PIC-

TURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, Etc.

Especial attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDS

ENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

ja28-1f

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

—OF—

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,

SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT!

jy30-1f

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, AND JOHN COLLNER.

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific. Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to “THE CALIFORNIAN,”

Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late int. exhibition at LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my25

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

CALIFORNIA

Home Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Caba, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Deering, A. B. McCreery, C. Duisenberg, C. J. Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Hayemann, R. G. Sneath, C. F. MacDermot, J. C. Wilmerding, Levi Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Thibault, S. Hemenway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.

B. F. LOWE, President.

JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5 3m

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs. Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAUST, Agent. no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Kelly & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,

MERCHANDISE,

FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
206 Front street, corner of California.

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

SAN FRANCISCO. jy2

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE,
San Francisco.EUGENE KELLY,
New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,

NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON,
BANK OF IRELAND.London.
jy2

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern my25

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purgative of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S

no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in any style, or on any basis desired—Gold, Platinum, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anesthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. de10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL!

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. de3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. jul8

CARPETS.

We have just received and are now opening

NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF WILTON

—AND—

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets. no12

RUPTURE.

RADICAL CURE OF Rupture by the application of the Anatomical Truss of Elastic and uncompressing pressure, by A. FOLLEAU, Pupils of Chauriere of Paris Anatomical, Orthopedical and Surgical Mechanist of the French Benevolent Society.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club-feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street, Between Montgomery and Kearny, Manufactory, 232 Sutter street. de3

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair, SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,

Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office,)

SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz., Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols, Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballards, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breach-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand. We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breach-loading Rifle. ja5-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, ETC.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

WILSON & EVANS,

No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco,

And 122 J street, Sacramento. de3-3m

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (old No 17

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my23 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

ALTA MILLS,

STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Grits, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large; Hominy, Small; Oatmeal, Oat Grits, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order. del7-3m

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of FEBRUARY, 1865:

FEBRUARY 13, CONSTITUTION
FEBRUARY 23, SACRAMENTO

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,

ja23 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

OPPOSITION STEAMER-DAY,

FEBRUARY 13th!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK!

VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE!!!

THROUGH IN 21 DAYS!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. H. BLETHEN, Commander,

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13TH

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely, Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit of the Isthmus is a pleasant trip. Meals furnished free by the Company while crossing. A baggage-master will be sent through by each steamer. Insurance on Treasure at the lowest rates.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets, Up stairs, San Francisco. ja21

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5-1f J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY, Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms. ju25

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By G. C. LITCHER, Deputy Clerk.

Chas. McC. Delany, Plaintiff's Attorney. de24 3m

THE GREAT SEWING MACHINE
WAR!
THE FIRST GUN!
(October 5th, 1864.)
AHEAD, AS USUAL!
TWO FIRST PREMIUMS
AWARDED TO GROVER & BAKER,
AT THE
Oregon State Fair,
JUST CLOSED AT SALEM,
FOR THE BEST SEWING MACHINES
—AND—
BEST MACHINE WORK!
OVER THE
Wheeler & Wilson,
FLORENCE,
And all other Machines on Exhibition!

(October 6.)
The Florence Sewing Machine
—AND—

Work done on the FLORENCE have taken all the First Premiums awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine work at the Fairs of California in 1864.

Read the report of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the great Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute:

THE FLORENCE.—We have given this new Sewing Machine a careful and minute examination. Its simple and finished mechanical construction, and the obvious adaptability of each part to its work, has been to us an interesting study. It differs essentially from other Sewing Machines, having many new and peculiar features. It makes four kinds of stitch, each alike on both sides of the fabric, has a reversible feed motion, and sews any thickness of goods without change of tension. We consider the "FLORENCE" a decided improvement in sewing mechanism.

COMMITTEE.

S. O. BRIGHAM, Pioneer Sewing Machine Agent on the Pacific Coast, and five years San Francisco agent for the Grover & Baker Machine.

O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California.

A. F. HITCHCOCK, Practical Machinist, eleven years in the employ of the Grover & Baker Co., the past five years as adjuster in their San Francisco office.

MRS C. M. BLAIN.
MRS A. J. TURNER,
MRS H. ROSEKRANS.

(October 10.)

AN UNMITIGATED HUMBUG!

The Agent of a certain Sewing Machine evidently intends, by humbug and deception, to foist his wares upon the public, instead of endeavoring by the merit of the article (if it possesses any) to attain an honorable position among those so well and favorably known. He advertises thus:

"The FLORENCE Machine, and work done on the FLORENCE, have taken ALL THE FIRST
PREMIUMS awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine Work at the Fairs of California in 1864."

That the ambiguity of the insinuation contained above may deceive no one, we would say that ALL the Fairs in California in 1864, at which ANY premium has been awarded, is ONE—the Mechanics', just closed, whose official Report reads thus:

"Sewing Machines.—Premium to the Florence, no competition."
This is the OVERWHELMING success which has attended the FLORENCE Machine at "ALL the Fairs in California in 1864."

And again the Report reads thus:

"Machine Sewing.—Premium to Mrs. Nancy Barton."

As the FLORENCE Machine claims the first premium on Machine Work, and we do not "see it in that light," we publish the following from Mrs.
Barton:

SAN FRANCISCO, October 7th, 1864.

The Machine Sewing for which I received the First Premium at the Mechanics' Institute Fair was executed on the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE, which style I have had in constant use for five or six years, and consider superior to all others. MRS. NANCY BARTON.

So the FLORENCE Machine, with NO COMPE-TITION, did obtain a Premium on the Machine, and DID NOT obtain ANY Premium on Machine Work
as claimed. Even the "Card" published as a COM-MITTEE REPORT loses in a slight degree its importance, as follows:

Extract from the signatures on "Committee Report," published by the FLORENCE Agent.

"O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more SEWING MACHINE Committees than any other person in California."

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

Mr. Wheeler writes thus:

"* * * A gentleman called at my office at a time when I was exceedingly busy, and asked me to append my name to a report which he held in his hand on Sewing Machines, then exhibiting at the "Industrial Fair of the Mechanics' Institute" in this city. I said, "I have no knowledge of being on a Committee, and have made no examination."
He informed me that as the FLORENCE was the only Machine on exhibition, and had no competition, an examination was unnecessary. I then wrote my name and he left."

I WOULD NOT have served on a Committee or signed any report had there been any competition, for the reason that my family have used the GROVER & BAKER Machine for several years, and would be unwilling to change it for any other.

I do not remember having ever served on a Committee or signed a report on Sewing Machines before. The statement that I have "served on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California" is therefore outrage and wholly unauthorized. O. C. WHEELER.

San Francisco, October 7th, 1864.

Thus the advertisement of the FLORENCE agent from first to last, is a humbug, and nothing else.

The only Fair on the Pacific Coast where the FLORENCE Machine has been exhibited in competition for a Premium against others was at the Oregon State Fair, in September, where it was essentially defeated, and two First Premiums awarded GROVER & BAKER for best Sewing Machine and Machine Sewing.

R. G. BROWN, Agent,
329 Montgomery street.

(October 19.)

REPLY TO

THE UNMITIGATED HUMBUG!

CARD OF R. G. BROWN.

A new Sewing Machine, recently introduced on this Coast, having taken all the honors awarded to Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work by the Fairs of California in 1864, an agent for one of the old established Machines, evidently worried, endeavors by ridicule and the charge of humbug to hide from the eyes of the public the magnitude of the victories achieved by this new comer.

The FLORENCE and the Work done on the FLORENCE, have taken five First Premiums instead of one, as would be inferred from the statement of the agent of the Grover & Baker Machine, and no greater triumph could be desired for the FLORENCE than the fact that it had "no competition" at a Fair like the Grand Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute just closed, held, too, in San Francisco, where nearly every description of Sewing Machine in the known world is represented.

If Mrs. Nancy Barton intends in her note to claim the Premium on Machine Sewing at the late Mechanics' Fair, she has made a great mistake, as the Premium was awarded to work done on the FLORENCE.

The "Sun Bonnet" on which she took a Premium was classed with Fancy Needlework, and was not examined by the Committee on Sewing Machine Work.

From Mr. O. C. Wheeler's statement some have incorrectly inferred that his signature was obtained by some party interested in or connected with the FLORENCE. The Committee were chosen in the usual manner, and we supposed Mr. Wheeler, as one of them, did his duty properly. If his name would not admit of this, it would have been more satisfactory to all concerned had he declined to serve.

From the above, which we are prepared to substantiate to the letter, it will be seen that the FLORENCE advertisement, which the Grover & Baker agent calls an unmitigated humbug was true in every particular, excepting the statement that Mr. Wheeler had been on other Sewing Machine Committees.
His connection with the State Fairs as Secretary making it necessary for him to have much to do with Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Committee reports, led to this very natural mistake; while the notice of the Grover & Baker agent, to which he gives so appropriate a heading, contains many misstatements and ambiguously worded "Cards" that are liable to be misconstrued.

SAMUEL HILL,
General Agent Florence Sewing Machines,
111 Montgomery Street, S. F.

(October 22.)

THOSE

SEWING MACHINE PREMIUMS

AGAIN!

The "Reply" of the Agent of the FLORENCE
Machine is fluent with such aspiring words as "Triumphs," "Victories," "Honors," and the like, which, as applied to any events in the history of that Machine, are simply ridiculous.

The "magnitude" of the "victories" attained by the FLORENCE is apparent to none but himself.

Show them up, Mr. Hill; give the public an opportunity of realizing the vastness of "all the honors" conferred in so lavish a manner.

Show them if you can, and name any premium your Machine has ever received at any Fair over any first, second, or third-class machine in existence!

Perhaps it was an "honor" to exhibit against the GROVER & BAKER Machine at the Oregon State Fair, just closed, where Two First Premiums were awarded the GROVER & BAKER over the Florence. Will Mr. Hill name any first premium his Machine has ever received for Sewing Machine work in competition with others?

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

The unequivocal "triumph" of the Florence Machine at the Mechanics' Institute Fair, and its single specimen of sewing at the Stockton Fair—without competition in either case—is certainly tremendous.

"A contented mind is a continual feast." As you say you desire no greater triumph for the Florence than the fact that it had no competition at the Mechanics' Fair, allow us to congratulate you on so readily attaining your desires. All the honors of this bloodless "Victory" undoubtedly are yours, and, as we do not deny it, we trust your laurels may rest easily on your triumphant brow.

Your complete satisfaction in such a result, where there was no competition, and by the rules of the Society the Exhibitors were allowed to select their own Committees, will be more fully appreciated by a sympathizing public in consideration of the immense risk and great danger in which you stood of being defeated (?) by your selected Committee of interested friends and owners of the Florence Machine. Advertise your single-handed "Victories," proclaim your undivided "Honors"—make much of your one-sided "Triumphs," unequalled in their overwhelming (?) "magnitude," but until you can strengthen them by a conquest over some third, second, or first-class Machine, they will be but as sound and fury—signifying nothing.

The Grover & Baker is the only First Premium Sewing Machine, having received every First Premium awarded any Sewing Machines when in competition, in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864.

R. G. BROWN, Agent,
329 Montgomery street.

(December 28.)

THE GREAT

SEWING MACHINE WAR!

A SLIGHT MISTAKE

ABOUT

THE PREMIUM

—AT THE—

Oregon State Fair!

THE COMMITTEE DECIDE

—IN—

Favor of the Florence!

COMPLETING

THE TRIUMPH OF THIS NEW MACHINE!

IT HAVING TAKEN

EACH AND EVERY

FIRST PREMIUM

AWARDED TO

FAMILY

SEWING MACHINES!

—AT THE—

FAIRS

HELD ON THE PACIFIC COAST

In 1864.

READ THE FOLLOWING:

Having heard to-day for the first time that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company claim

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

the First Premium on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at the Oregon State Fair, held in Salem, September, 1864, and being one of the Committee on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at said Fair, I feel it my duty to make, and take pleasure in making the following statement:

Three (if not all) of the Committee were selected by a Mr. Johnson, (an employe of the Grover & Baker Company,) and after a careful examination of the Sewing Machines and Machine Work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was finally decided and agreed by the Committee, to award the First Premium to the FLORENCE Machine as the best Machine for doing all grades of work, and a Promium to the Grover & Baker Machine for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the Committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the Committee and their final decision.

MARY A. HOWE.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
County of Multnomah, }

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, Mary A. Howe, who, being first duly sworn, says the above statement is true, as she verily believes.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, this 4th day of November, 1864.
(Notarial Seal.) J. N. DOLPH,
Notary Public, Multnomah County, Oregon.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
County of Linn, }

I have read the above statement, (I being one of the Committee mentioned,) and the same is true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

EMILY C. GRIFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of December, 1864.

JAMES ELKINS,
County Clerk, Linn County, Oregon.

I was one of the five ladies comprising the Committee for the examination of Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and am the party referred to above as having been called away before signing our Report. I hereby say that the above statements are true as to the decision of the Committee.

MARY MILLER.

Albany, Oregon, December 13th, 1864.

Copy of the Bogus Report which was fraudulently substituted in the place of the Real Decision of the Committee, and which they signed without reading:

SEPTEMBER 29th, 1864.

We, the undersigned, a Committee appointed at the Fourth Annual Fair of the Oregon State Agricultural Society to examine and report upon the merits of different Sewing Machines on exhibition, have endeavored to perform the duty with care and impartiality. In view of all the facts, we have decided to award the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second to the Florence. The principal fact influencing our decision in awarding the First Premium to the former, was the circumstance that it embroidered, while the other does not. We have, however, no hesitancy in saying that both have great merits, and we recommend them both to the patronage of the Oregon public.

MARY S. SMITH,
MARY A. HOWE,
EMILY C. GRIFFIN,
MARY ANN S. KNOX,
Committee.

The FLORENCE Machines are for sale by

I. L. Polhemus.....190 J street, Sacramento
Geo. Vincent.....Stockton
F. Tersteggo & Co.....Marysville
T. Fogg.....Oroville
J. R. Cleaves.....Placerville
R. B. Handy.....Yreka
P. Reichling & Schland.....Mokelumne Hill
Mrs C. Grove.....Santa Cruz
Henry Jackson.....Watsonville
Geo. Gillis.....Carson City, Nevada
J. L. Parrish & Co.....Portland, Oregon
N. O. Parrish.....Salem, Or.
Mrs. C. Monell.....Dallas, Or.
M. Wollheim.....Guaymas, Mex

SAMUEL HILL, General Agent,
1010-111 No. 111 Montgomery street, San Francisco

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

THE DRAMATIC TROUPE

In the Drama of

BLACK-EYED SUSAN.

Together with MISS JENNY KEMPTON, and

The Eureka Minstrel Troupe,

Who will also appear in the

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, February 4th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock

This Saturday Evening, February 4th, 1865.
BENEFIT OF MRS. H. A. PERRY.

For which occasion the bill will consist of the comedy of

MASKS AND FACES.

Peg Woffington Mrs. H. A. Perry
Mabel Vane Louisa Clarkson
Mrs. Triplet Mrs. C. A. Saunders
Triplet Frank Mayo

To conclude with the original sketch

DO YOU KNOW JONES.

Charles Muffington W. Barry
Wilberforce Wobbles Louis Aldrich
Jacob Jones W. J. Hill
Fanny Mrs. H. A. Perry
Mrs. Muffington Mrs. C. R. Saunders

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

Monday Evening, February 6th, 1865,

FIRST APPEARANCE IN TEN YEARS

OF THE

WORLD-RENOWNED ACTRESS,
MISS MATILDA HERON,
AS "CAMILLE."

Miss Heron's rendition of this great character is universally acknowledged to be far superior to all others, and the only correct representation of this arduous part.
Box book now open.

GRAND COMPLIMENTARY
BENEFIT

To the Eminent American Tragedienne,
Miss Annette Ince,
SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 4,
AT PLATT'S HALL,
Being Positively her Last Appearance in California.

On which occasion a splendid selection of Readings will be given, from Shakespeare and other Dramatists, and an entertainment offered to the citizens of San Francisco, of rare literary and dramatic excellence. MISS INCE will be assisted by

MR. J. H. WARWICK,

Who will appear in conjunction with her in scenes from Macbeth, Ion, etc.

PART FIRST.

1—Scene 1, Act 2, from Talfourd's beautiful Play of ION—
Ion, the Foundling of Argos, Miss A. Ince; Adrastus, of Argos. Mr. J. H. Warwick.
2—Our Country Forever Mr. Warwick
3—Mary, the Maid of the Inn Miss Ince
4—Shamus O'Brien Mr. Warwick
5—The beautiful snow Miss Ince
6—Scenes from Macbeth Miss Ince, Mr. Warwick
Fantasia—Piano Forte Mr. Schmidt

PART SECOND.

Drake's Address to the American Flag Miss Ince
The entertainment to conclude with the elegant Comedietta of

A MORNING CALL.

Mrs. Chillington Miss A. Ince
Sir Edward Ardent Mr. J. H. Warwick

TICKETS ONE DOLLAR.

Doors open at 7½ o'clock; Entertainment to commence precisely at 8 o'clock.

PRINTING! PRINTING!!

DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,
Between Sansome and Montgomery, . . . San Francisco.

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city.
fe4-1f

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Pine street, below Montgomery.

THOMAS MAGUIRE Proprietor.
LEW RATTIER Manager
C. F. SHATTUCK Musical Director
J. L. SCHMIDT Leader of Orchestra

GREAT

COMBINATION OF MUSICAL TALENT!

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL

Sacred Concert!

On Sunday Evening, February 5th, 1865,

BY THE STAR TROUPE OF

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

D. S. WAMBOLD,

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
P. B. Isaacs, W. Bernard,
Lew Rattier, Mons. Charles,
C. F. Shattuck, M. Lewis,
Sig. Pinto, S. Washburn,
W. Sheppard, Tommy Peel,
Frank Medina, H. Grob,

MASTER FRANK.

The following extra Artists will appear:
W. J. Hill, John Gregg,
Mr. Schlotte, Signor Pinto,

50 INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Dress Circle and Parquet, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra; Private Boxes, $5.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

Saturday afternoon performances by the Minstrels, at the Opera House.

AMERICAN THEATRE.

ITALIAN OPERA!

FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY.

Wednesday Evening, - - - February 9,

FOR THE

BENEFIT OF SIGNORA BIANCHI,

On which occasion Bellini's Grand Tragic Opera of NORMA!

Will be produced, and the favorite Contralto,

MISS JENNY KEMPTON,

Will make her last appearance in California.

MRS. CASSIE MATTISON,

The splendid Contralto, will also appear on this occasion, for the last time in California.
(The departure of both these Artists is fixed for the 13th inst.)

The cast of characters will be as follows:

Norma Signora Bianchi
Adalgisa Miss Jenny Kempton
Pollione Signor Bianchi
Oroveso Mr. John Gregg
Clotilda Mrs. Yunkers
Flavio Mons. Guinde
Grand Chorus of Druids, Priestesses, Soldiers, etc.

After the Opera MRS. CASSIE MATTISON will sing the Grand Aria from LA FAVORITA, "O mio Fernando," with Orchestral accompaniment.

CONDUCTOR MR. G. T. EVANS

ADMISSION—Dress Circle and Parquette, $1; Gallery, 50 cents; Reserved Seats Fifty Cents Extra.

Persons having secured seats at the Metropolitan Theatre, can have them transferred on application at the Box Office of American Theatre.

THESE PLASTERS have the compactness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove. They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly hump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms. For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.,

"Brandreth Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

Sold by all Druggists.

de17-3m

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of

GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

S. W. H. WARD & SON,

NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
387 Broadway. } San Francisco, Cal.
de31-3m

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are unpure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

401 Battery, cor. Clay,

San Francisco.

ja25-1f

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large.

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other mal-practices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

401 Battery, corner Clay,

San Francisco.

ja25-1f

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGURY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents for the Pacific Coast,

401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,

San Francisco.

Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express.
ja25-1f

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY!

MARY'S VALENTINE.

Bright flowers shall bloom wherever we rove,
A voice divine shall talk in each stream,
The stars shall look like worlds of love,
And this earth be all one beautiful dream,
In our eyes—if thou'lt be mine.

KATY'S VALENTINE.

Among the many fair and bright,
My fancy early singled thee;
Then bend on me thine eyes of light,
And all my love shall flow to thee.

MAGGIE'S VALENTINE.

Yes, I'm happy while fate leaves me
One kind heart to warmly prize,
While the light of pure affection
Beams within thy gentle eyes.

ALLIE'S VALENTINE.

May'st thou live in joy forever!
Night from thee true pleasure sever;
From thy heart arise no sigh,
And no tear bedew thine eye;
Joys be many, cares be few,
Smooth the path thou shalt pursue;
And Heaven's richest blessings shine,
Ever on both thee and thine.

NETTIE'S VALENTINE.

Oh, speak not of daisies or rosebuds of Spring
Or bright pearly dewdrops, or any such thing,
For thy worth and virtues much more do combine,
And gladly I'd take thee for my Valentine.

VALENTINES in extra fine French Boxes—also in solid Rosewood and Mahogany cases. Sold with or without Jewelry.

VALENTINES of every conceivable variety—Valentine Cards, Valentine Mottoes.

SEVENTEEN new and original California Comics, 70 Copperheads, etc.

NEW CALIFORNIA VALENTINE WRITER, and other kinds, comic and sentimental.

APPLETON'S VALENTINE EXPRESS—with Eight Horses, will deliver Valentines every hour on Valentine's Day in every part of the City.

D. E. APPLETON & CO.,

508 Montgomery street, and

620 Market street,

Opposite the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum.
Jan14-1f

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.

A. Roman & Co.,

TAKE PLEASURE in announcing the following list of NEW BOOKS just received from the East:

Enoch Arden. 1 vol. small quarto, elegantly illustrated, Blue and Gold edition.
Clever Stories of many Lands, by John G. Saxo. 1 vol. 4to, illustrated.
The Queens of Song. Being memoirs of the most celebrated female vocalists. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portraits. All lovers of the Opera will be delighted with this charming volume.
The Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, with a memoir. 2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, tinted paper.
Doran's Complete Works. 9 vols., cloth and half Turkey, with the "Annals of the Stage."
Arctic Researches and Life Among the Esquimaux, by Charles F. Hall. 1 vol. 8vo, illustrated. Ranks next to that of Dr. Kane.
Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. 1 vol. 12mo. The latest contribution to the great Theological Controversy in England.
John Godfrey's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor. 1 vol. 12mo. An absorbing story of American life.
Golden Leaves from the American Poets. 1 vol. 16mo., vellum and morocco. A tasteful selection from our most popular Poets.
The Gentle Life. 1 vol. 16mo. An elegant series of Essays on the Formation of Character.
Following the Flag, by "Carleton." A fascinating juvenile.
Ellana, by Charles Lamb. 1 vol. 12mo. Being the heretofore uncollected writings of "Elia."
Autumn Holidays in the Country, by the "Country Parson." 1 vol. 12mo.
The Queen of the County, by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids. 1 vol. 12mo.
A New Atmosphere, by Gail Hamilton. 1 vol. 12mo.
Looking Towards Sunset, by L. M. Child. 1 vol. 4to, Love and Duty. 1 vol. 12mo.
Lost Love. 1 vol. 12mo.
Margaret Denzil's History. 1 vol. paper.
Bohemians of London. 1 vol. 12mo.
Autobiography of Gen. Scott. 2 vols. 12mo.
Woodcliff, by Harriet B. McKeever. 1 vol. 12mo.
Hymns of the Ages. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.
Old Merchants of New York. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

In addition to the above we have a large list of other NEW BOOKS, together with a complete stock in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

All are cordially invited to call and examine.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,
417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

ja28-1m

The Californian

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER
AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II, No. 11.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 11, 1865.

TERMS $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE.
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

Things—by "Inigo."
The Down Trip of the "Constitution"—No 2—"Podgers'" Journal.
The Wreck of the Bark "Ann Parry."
Dining—Corrupency—Laniness.
Frank Blundell's Revelation.
As Others see Us.
A Picasant Incident.

ONLY A CLOD—Miss Braddon's New Novel, Chapter XV.

POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

In the Pouts—By "Ina."
Knocking—By "Ingle."
In the Palace.

NEW YORK LETTER:

From our Lady Correspondent.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS:

A Condensation of the Telegraphic War News of the Week.

CITY AND INTERIOR ITEMS:

The News at Home and Abroad in Brief.

NEW BOOKS:

Notices of New Publications.

DRAMATIC MENTION:

The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

(For the Californian.)

"IN THE POUTS."

CHEEKS of an ominous crimson,
Eye-brows arched to a frown,
Pretty red lips aquiver
With holding their sweetness down;

Glance that is never lifted
From the hands that, in cruel play,
Are tearing the white-rose petals,
And tossing their hearts away.

Only to think that a whisper,
An idle, meaningless jest,
Should stir such a world of passion
In a dear, little, loving breast.

Yet ever for such light trifles
Will lover and lass fall out,
And the humblest lad grow haughty,
And the gentlest maiden pout.

Of course, I must sue for pardon;
For what I can hardly say!—
But, deaf to opposing reason,
A woman will have her way.

And when, in despite her frowning,
The scorn, the grief and the rue,
She looks so bewitchingly pretty,
Why—what can a poor fellow do?

INA D. COOLBRITH.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 11th, 1865.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, Feb. 11th, 1865.
THE RECEPTION OF SICKLES.

SUNDAY last was perhaps one of the most exciting days that has been known in our city since its discovery by the amiable tribe of Diggers that found and founded it.

A Vigilance Committee had been organized some time previous, and they were watching vigilantly for a victim. That victim was expected to reach our shores on the Constitution—so to speak, he had been "sold to arrive."

Never in my life do I remember to have seen a more enthusiastic crowd than that which assembled around the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's wharf on the firing of the gun which announced the coming of the steamer. Fearful of the rush that would ensue when the hero stepped ashore, a guard of four men and a lieutenant was placed around the gates, and the hacks and cabs of the neighborhood, drawn up three deep, were arranged in the form of a square, or a military necessity, to enable those in authority to repel boarders in case of any attempt to take the position.

Generally these hacks and coaches go down to incoming steamers to get all the boarders they can for the hotels they represent, but this was an extraordinary case, all rules were reversed, and the orders were to repel.

A distinguished few, consisting mainly of the Reception Committee, some five hundred in number, were admitted to the wharf. Of the others who gained admittance it may be written down that the greater part admired Sickles and didn't know him, while the balance knew him and didn't admire him. That was the difference.

A resolution had been passed at the first meeting of the Committee that every member should wear a claret colored coat and a stovepipe hat; gloves, whether to wear them or not, and the color, were left to the discretion of individuals. Fifteen carriages, with six horses harnessed to each, had been ordered from the stables of Porter & Covey for the purpose of conveying the General and his Staff to the hotel where lodgings had been secured for him and his board paid a week in advance.

For the General was not to be permitted to take up his Staff and walk.

Some delay ensued in the steamer's coming to the wharf, owing to a glimpse which Commodore Catkins caught of gleaming bayonets along its front. The old hero was plainly visible either to the naked eye or to the vision clothed in righteousness, pacing the paddle-box in a state of perturbation, and wondering what the deuce was to pay.

At first thought it occurred to him that the wharf was in the possession of those dissatisfied spirits in our midst who are no friends of the Constitution either as it is or ought to be, and that they contemplated a seizure of his ship and perhaps a forfeiture of that "fine old Stilton" to which "Podgers" has several times referred in the leaves of his interesting journal since he left.

The good Constitution made her bow well enough on coming in, but somehow it proved hard to make that bow fast to the wharf. The hawser kept snapping—perhaps being an incoming steamer instead of an outgoing one it was not "hard to part." The Committee waved their handkerchiefs frantically to everybody on the steamer, and were with difficulty restrained by the fixed bayonets of the guard from rushing overboard and swimming to her decks. They thought it would prove a stronger mark of esteem to meet him on the steamer than in the team which had been newly cushioned and curtained for his reception or deception.

In the meanwhile everybody on the steamer thought himself or herself the special object of all this attention, several returning Californians remarking to their wives that they never dreamed they were such popular persons before.

Soon the suspense of the Committee became torture. The President, who knows everybody and has a pleasant fashion of familiarity in conversation with his friends, put his neck out from the window of the state carriage and shouted:

"I say, Com! where is Sick?"

The remark was misunderstood: the gallant Commodore thought he was addressed by the President of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company with: "I say, come! where does she stick?" and answered accordingly:

"In the mud! where do you suppose?"

You see it rather annoyed the gallant gentleman to have it thought that he didn't know his business aboard a canal boat, and hence the brusque response, so different from his usual courteous speech. And in manner something like, the President of the Committee felt offended, because he understood the Commodore to call him a stick-in-the-mud, and say something disrespectful about his nose, the voice of the Commodore in reply, being indistinctly borne upon the evening breeze.

Little more conversation was held between ship and shore, until, after a prolonged combat with the wild winds and mad mud of several hours duration, the Constitution was made fast to the wharf and tied—the only instance in which the tide aided her during all her troubles.

It was then announced that General Sickles was not on board. This cut like a knife, and went directly against the grain of the multitude. The further announcement that he had gone to Bogota, and was not coming to California at all, was a worse cut still, for the Committee men had to pay their own expenses and find their own clothes for the occasion.

The only trouble was to find the Committee men. Not a single six-horse team was to be seen on the wharf. A rapid process of unharnessing had been gone through with, and the change was somewhat like that which came over Cinderella's appearance when she lingered too late at the ball—where before was a coach and six there was only now visible a hack with scarcely a pair. As for the Committee men they suddenly became so non-committal that not one was to be seen. A large number of gentlemen walked whistlingly around, remarking upon the weather, the strange delay of the steamer in making the wharf, and the disappointment they felt in not finding a long-lost brother on board, whose arrival they had confidently expected. Some of them went so far as to examine the passengers who came ashore for strawbery marks, but the search in all instances was fruitless. Nevertheless, there was a strong disposition to berry the whole affair in oblivion. Slowly and sadly the entire delegation returned to the hotel, where any inquiry as to the health of Sickles was sure to provoke, always a frown, occasionally a "smile." The inadvertent offering of a Sickles pear to one of the Committee at dinner nearly caused a duel, the offended gentleman turning speedily around and remarking that he didn't like the pair, that such innuendoes under the circumstances were in exceeding bad taste, and would he resented bitterly. The hand slightly changed the tune they had been instructed in for the occasion, playing "See the conquering hero doesn't come," and one by one the crowd outside dispersed to their homes, not to be tempted out to see a swath cut by Sickles again until Time's scythe has laid many a blade among them low.

A WORD ABOUT "CAMILLE."

I went to see Camille the other evening, and I much wish Miss Heron would change the denouement of the piece. It makes me feel as uncomfortable as though I were an Octo-roon, for in both plays the moral seems that to be good is not to be happy, and that all that self-sacrifice purchases for one in this world is the somewhat questionable pleasure of dying to the sound of slow music.

Nor have I any patience with Camille in that scene with the old gentleman, Armand's father. Why was she so stupid as to offer herself up a willing victim upon the shrine of his family ambition? Why did she not say to him: "Go, Father!—and fare worse if need be." A sensible woman, under similar circumstances, would have told him to get, and not to stand upon the order of his getting, either. When the handwriting on all the dead-walls about town told me: The Camille is coming! much as I wished to see Miss Heron, I felt almost a sensation of regret, for I must own that the play provokes me, in the development of its plot, beyond endurance. I cannot hear to see that pleasant pastoral picture spoiled, nor do I like to see people too ready to make martyrs of themselves. A certain grain of selfishness should enter into all human compositions, and no character can be perfect without it. If Miss Heron will permit me, I'll rewrite the play, convict the father of had designs in his visit to Camille, and cause Armand to come home suddenly and kick him out of the garden. That will be an excellent filial lesson to all young minds. And then Camille shall take syrup of tar, bronchial troches, dactyls or something else of the kind, and get well, and a numerous family shall spring up around them, to call me before the curtain and bless me for changing the plot and bringing them to light and life. All this will I do, if permission be granted me, or my name is not INIGO.

SIGNORA BIANCHI had a very good house in Norma on the occasion of her benefit, Wednesday evening last. The opera was passably rendered, when the incompleteness of the company is taken into account. As "Adalgisa," Miss Jenny Kempton made her last appearance in California, as she will leave in the steamer of Monday for the East. She has made herself a favorite with us, and her many friends in private life as well as the public generally will regret her going.

As the reward of villainy, some men are hung, some cropped and branded, others elected to office.

IN THE PALACE.

[A LADY correspondent, to whom we are under many obligations, furnishes this fragment from memory, and inquires: "Who wrote this? What is the rest of it?" We do not know. Perhaps some of our readers can tell.]

PRIDE'S WHISPER.

THE night is blind with a double dark,
The rain and wind come down together;
'Tis well to sit by the fire and hark
To the stormy weather.
The beggar lies down in the misty dell,
The peasant faces the eddying storm,
While you that weep, fair Rosabelle,
Sit housed and warm.

HEART'S ANSWER.

Better he out on the barren hill,
With the wild wind blowing my sorrow blind,
Than listening here, to thoughts that thrill
Like a bell tolled by the passing wind.

PRIDE'S WHISPER.

You may wander all day with a page at your rein,
Greyhound to follow, and hawk on your wrist;
East, west, through your lord's domain
Whither you list,
As you ride through the town in the evening light,
Pacing your steed 'neath the elms tall and shady;
Each village girl all the summer's night
Dreams she's a lady!

HEART'S ANSWER.

My sleek greyhound and my merlin bold,
Chafe at restraining—the steed I rein
Wantonly bears on his curl of gold,
Chafing my will with high disdain.

Through the long lance windows and open door
Shadows stand fighting the golden light,
And the step of my hound on the oaken floor
Rings like the tread of an armed knight.

Would I were hearing the evening hymn
My mother sings to the babe on her knee,
Or floating, by dawn, in the waters dim—
Roland, my brother, alone with thee!
How goes the night in the fisherman's cot?
Does the light burn bright? does the hearth shine clear?
Are they laughing together, whilst I, forgot,
Lark each sad thought to a falling tear?
With my sad eyes and my rich attire
Lifting the latch, should I enter there,
Old Bawl, the bloodhound that sleeps by the fire,
Would rouse him to threaten my pale despair!

FRANK BLUNDELL'S REVELATION.

IT was my last evening at Oakleigh Cottage. I had been spending a month with my friend Frank Blundell. We had met, after an interval of some years, in his country home. He and I had been near neighbors at St. Margaret's and constant companions during our last year there. Both of us were changed since then. We had experienced the realities of life which are so little known by the majority of undergraduates. We had gained wisdom enough to look back with regret upon wasted time and ill-used opportunities. We were grateful for our preservation through that part of life's journey in which we took no heed, and that our eyes had been opened to the prospect before the sun was low upon our way. We had not ceased to like all the pursuits and pleasures of the old careless days; but we enjoyed the superadded satisfaction of evil habits discarded, sound principles cultivated, and duties recognized and to some extent fulfilled. My friend had married since I last saw him, and his wife was a stranger to me until this visit. I found her one of the few wives who practically recommended marriage to their husbands' unmarried friends. This she did, in a great measure, by the sense of reliability as a wife—I don't know how I can better describe it—which she conveyed. Her husband evidently had faith in her, in small matters as in great. It was plain that he trusted to her doing a thing as he would like to have it done, and that they had become one in the details of every-day experience as they were one in heart.

Assuredly, hers was a very pleasant face, with its setting of beautiful hair, and its rare eyes—eyes which stand the test of a heightened color—becoming neither dull, nor uncertain, nor metallic, but only warmer-toned, as Nature becomes in a summer sunset. As a hostess—a position affording such opportunities of making or marring the comfort of a guest—Mrs. Frank Blundell was eminently the "right woman in the right place."

Oakleigh is in the heart of Kent, where hops, cherries and filberts are at home, and orchard apples eatable. The cottage was delightfully placed, looking southward across a valley upon plantations of sweet chestnuts, then fast crimsoning; for it was the season, so enjoyable in the country, between the very outdoorishness of summer and the permanent adoption of fires. There was plenty of amusement—walks and drives in the charming neighborhood, and visits to the hop-gardens, where armies of hop-pickers, with their pioneers the pole-pullers, were advancing, leaving desolation in their track; a scene which no artist has fairly pictured, but which everybody ought to see. Then we had some good fishing in the Medway, far up above the coal barges.

Well, as I have said, it was my last evening at Oakleigh Cottage. We were sitting together, Blundell and I, after dinner, when he said, "There's a fire in my room; I vote we go there till Mary is ready for tea."

So we went, and talked from our easy-chairs through a perfumed cloud. It soon became evident to me that my friend had "something on his mind."

He let his pipe out and relighted it. Presently he put it down, and saying "Excuse me a minute," went out.

He soon came back, and on my inquiring whether anything was the matter, replied, "Oh no; but I have something to say to you, and, as it can't be said in a few words, I thought I would tell Mary we should not want tea for an hour or so, and she need not wait for us; but she is up with baby, and says that she is in no hurry, so we will join her by and by."

"In all our talks together about old times since you have been here," he said, "we have never touched upon a topic that was a frequent one at our sittings after Hall and Chapel. I suppose some delicacy of feeling—for I verily believe you have a little of it—has prevented your beginning the subject."

I was going to protest against this modified form of compliment, and to ask a question, when I was stopped by—

"Don't bother, that's a good fellow, or I shall never get to my story. You remember well enough, I have no doubt, how I used to talk of Mary Percival."

"Yes," I said, "and I have often wondered what it all came to. The Christian name is a 'household word' here. Was it Mary —?" I was checked again by Blundell's look.

"You promised to listen," he growled, "and now you are cross-examining. Have a little patience, and forgive me too, if I repeat what I have already told you. Mary Percival and I were friends from infancy. Our mothers were friends before us, and my earliest recollections are associated with her and hers. When we came to be man and woman we read and argued and were happy together, as we had played and quarrelled and 'made up' again in our childhood. The old friendship had increased, but had not changed its character; at least I can speak for myself. You remember what Teunyson says in 'Dora':

The youth, because
He had been always with her in the house,
Thought not of Dora.

It was something like this with me. Yet I admired Mary very much, and loved her, 'after a fashion,' very dearly, and would have done or suffered almost anything to give her pleasure or to spare her pain. You have heard all this before. I don't mean to inflict any more of it on you. Now take yourself to Cambridge for a moment, and try to recall a Trinity man named Horner—'Handsome Horner' they called him."

"I remember him perfectly," I said. "He was in the second Trinity, and rowed seven in the first boat when they 'bumped' us in the 'Long Reach.' A broad-shouldered man, with curly chestnut hair and white arms."

"Regardless of grammar I cry, 'That's him,'" was the reply. "He and I had a slight acquaintance at the University, in the last Term when we both read with Smith; and meeting in town after we took our degree, we became very good friends. Some time after this, he wrote to ask me to go and see him at his father's rectory in Surrey. I went and saw the dear old rector and Horner's mother, and, more than all, I saw his sister. Recalling her brother—fancy him a woman—refined, brightened, intensely beautified, and you can form some slight idea of Mary Horner. It is impossible for me to describe fitly the effect she produced upon me from the first. My acquaintance had included some very pretty women. I might have said of myself, if it were not cooited, Militari non sine gloria; not as a flirt though, mind: but Mary Horner was a new experience. She fascinated me, and I was a gone graduate. You may be sure that I did not get any better the longer I stayed within the charmed circle. I got on famously with all the people there, and fancied that I was not disliked by her. You know what I mean. But I could never detect anything like symptoms of—what shall I call it?—reciprocity of affection. (Don't laugh, there's relief in such a way of putting it.) On the contrary, she treated me with cordial but thoroughly self-possessed friendliness. She was not the sort of woman to encourage any lover, however acceptable in 'ocular demonstration' and that kind of thing, and it never occurred to me to try it on; and then the exercise, and the general atmosphere of the place, were so conducive to health and spirits that the lady had no reason, on the first visit, to suspect from my appearance the condition of my heart. This was in the summer; but the following winter found me again at Shallowford Rectory. I met some pleasant people there whom I had not seen before; among others, Mr. Horner's curate, Charles Oxenden. He was a really good fellow, heartily devoted to his work, as well as an accomplished man and an agreeable companion. All this I could but acknowledge, in spite of the shadow of a consciousness that there was 'something' in the confidential relationship subsisting between him and Mary Horner. But then I consoled myself with the thought that they had a common interest in parish matters, which involved a good deal of discussion. And there was nothing in the conduct of either that I could complain of as loverlike, even if I had possessed any right to complain at all, which I hadn't any. I had never 'told my love.' I am not prepared to state that on this second visit I might not have, almost involuntarily, betrayed myself; but there had never been the slightest approach to what I believe is called a 'declaration.' Our friendly intercourse had reached the stage of our calling one another by our Christian names. Her brother called me Frank habitually; as I called him Fred (which we should probably never have done if our intimacy had dated from our Cambridge days,) and she naturally fell, as indeed all the family did, into the same habit. Equally natural it seemed for me to call her Mary. My stay at this time was short. We were an unbroken circle at home at Christmas: and I left, with my secret undivulged, a few days before Christmas Day. But I ought to have told you that I had seen the Percivals frequently between these visits to Surrey. They were living then near London, the mother and daughter. Mrs. Percival had been a widow for some years, and I had talked to Mary a little about my admiration for the other Mary. Mary Percival was interested in the subject, and seemed often inclined to return to it. It was not a topic of conversation that I by any means objected to; but I didn't half enjoy it under the circumstances. There was something unlike herself about Mary, a certain constraint not to be concealed. It was not very noticeable; but I, who knew her so well, noticed it, or rather felt it, and was uncomfortable accordingly. At the same time I was perfectly sure that my friend was sincere both in the interest she expressed and in her manner towards me.

"There was no affectation in Mary Percival—far from it. Looking back from a later day upon the events and feelings of that time, I was more wise to know the truth. Then I was only a selfish man who was not a coxcomb. Let me see, where was I? I told you I went home before Christmas. I was entered at the Inner Temple then; and one day, early in the new year, I was alone in my chambers, when an idea, which had been a long time simmering, boiled and bubbled into a determination. It was to write, to write, sir, to Mary Horner, and learn the worst or the best. Ah! I can jest upon it now. I wrote. The thermometer stood at twenty. There were blocks of ice in the river like household candy; but I let my fire out while at my absorbing task. I wrote. I have a bad habit of spoiling several sheets of paper when I write an important letter. I can show you a fac-simile of this, discarded because of the capital M's being of two varieties. 'There it is, read it.' This was the letter:

"LONDON, January 3d.

"MY-DEAREST MARY—I cannot call you by any other name and speak truly. Forgive me if the truth is distasteful to you. Forgive, too, this method of making it known. In all our happy association I have not dared—yes, that is the word—to tell you this. 'A faint heart,' you will say; but 'the bright particular star always seemed so far above me.' These are calu words, dear, when my love is warm; these are cold words when my heart is beating wildly. I would rather read my sentence, if it is to be banishment; but oh! I would ten times rather hear it, if it is one word of hope. Let me have but that word, and I will be with you. In any case, I feel that you will deal tenderly as well as truthfully with me.

Yours, devotedly,
"FRANK."

"In that same hour," he continued, "I decided to tell Mary Percival of what I had done. There is a pretty accurate copy of my letter to her."

It ran thus:

"LONDON, January 3d.

"I know, dear Mary, that I do not look in vain for sympathy from you. I need it greatly to-day. You will believe this when I tell you what I have done. I have written to ask some one to give me her heart. Can you guess who it is? I am not hopeful, but I am not despairing. I cannot say more now than that in all my fortunes I am confident of your sisterly regard.

"Yours, affectionately,
"FRANK."

When I had read this without remark, Blundell went on with his narrative.

"I had finished these letters and folded them, when there was a rap at my door, followed immediately by the entrance of my opposite neighbor. 'Well, I never!' was his exclamation, 'are you out of coal?' I looked round upon the black grate for answer, having first put the letters into envelopes and fastened them. 'I came to see if you were inclined for a skate,' my visitor said. 'I tried the ice on the "Ornamental Water" yesterday; it was pretty good. They say it is capital to-day; but come and have some lunch with me before we go. You are miserable here.' I accepted the invitation, and wishing to get rid of him said, 'You go and order it.' When he was gone, I directed the envelopes containing my letters, and followed him, taking them with me to post on my way to the Park. There were a great many skaters, and the ice was for the most part strong. But here and there, as is always the case except after a protracted frost, were weak places. On to one of these I skated at a rapid pace and went down, without a warning crack, into the bitterly cold water. The ice was above me when I rose, but I could hear voices near me before I sank again. I came up once more, but it was to feel a heavy blow, to be in an explosion of fireworks, and then to lose all consciousness. The clumsily given aid was nearly being as fatal to me as the ice prison would have been. How I was carried home to my father's house, and suffered many days from the combined effects of the plunge and the blow, I could tell you only as it was told me. I was long unconscious, and for some time after the dangerous symptoms had abated I could take no notice of what was passing around me.

"I was gradually recovering, however, both physically and mentally; and one morning I became aware, upon awaking from a dose, that I was not alone. Some one had come in while I was not alone. Some one had come in while I slept, and was sitting by my side. A soft hand was laid on mine, and, as I looked round, a gentle, well-known voice spoke. It was Mary Percival's. 'I am so thankful, dear,' it said; 'so very thankful.' I was still weak, and cried. She stooped and kissed my forehead. 'Bless you!' she whispered, and, with an arch smile continued, 'It was a funny letter for you to write to me. Besides, I thought'—she paused, looking at me. Then she said, 'I must talk to you about it another day, and scold you; but thank you for it now a thousand thousand times! I came to give you my answer, and found you here. Oh, Frank! How could you be afraid of me? How could you doubt my love? But that is all past now, and I must tire you even with my happiness. Good-by, dearest.' And she went out very quickly, the tears blinding her.

"It is a shame to speak of this; but you are my friend, and it is necessary, if you are to understand my feelings. You can imagine them. What had come to me or to her? I scarcely heeded; I made no response to her words; but this she doubtless attributed to my weakened state; and when she left me I lay looking wonderingly at the door. At last a thought struck me. I rang my bell. It was answered by my mother. I asked her if there were any letters for me. She feared I was not equal to exertion, but went to fetch them. As soon as I was alone again I searched for one. I cared for only one. I found it. You shall see it in the original."

He handed me the letter. It was written in firm, clearly-cut characters, more Greek than "Italian," and was as follows:

"SHALLOWFORD RECTORY, January 4.

"MY DEAR FRANK.—It was so kind of you to depend upon my sympathy. Be assured you have it. I do hope you will be accepted; but of course you will, and be immensely happy. You can't think how glad I was to hear about it. Do you know, I fancied, like a vain thing, that you were just the least bit in the world what Fred would call 'spoony' upon somebody here. I should have been so sorry—don't be angry—for Charles and I have been engaged the last two years. We have said nothing about it, except, of course, to papa and mamma; and the same post that brought your letter brought one from him, offering him a long-expected living. Now we hope to be married this year. Dear old Charley! he is so good. I shall, we all shall, be anxious to know more from you. What weather! Fred is skating. He says of us, of Charles and me and you, 'Poor things! poor things!' We don't think so, do we? I hope some day to see and love your wife. I can guess who it is. I know you like the name of Mary. With good wishes from all of us for the new year, believe me, your sincere friend,

"MARY HORNER."

Blundell was standing by me, looking over my shoulder, as I read.

"I took in the truth at once," he said. "Don't you?"

"Why," I gasped, "you had reversed the directions. I saw that at a glance, when you gave me this."

"Exactly! To say that I was not confounded—shocked at first would be untrue. How could it be otherwise? But in the calm reflection of succeeding days, (for I was left in quietness to gather strength,) a feeling of satisfaction grew upon me, grateful satisfaction that I had escaped rejection—humiliation on the one hand, and the sorrow of inflicting useless pain on the other; that I had lost no friend, but had found a noble heart's great love. How I came to give my heart to Mary Percival I have no intention of describing. But I had done so before I told her everything—long before she became my wife. Then the letter she received but faintly expressed my love for her. We have been married four years, and each year has found us more loving, more happy. Now, old friend, you shall tell me what you think."

I only quoted Hamlet's words:

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

MARRIAGE.—A Persian poet gives the following instruction upon this important subject: "When thou art married, seek to please thy wife; but listen not to all she says. From man's right side a rib was taken to form the woman, and never was there seen a rib quite straight. And wouldst thou straighten it? It breaks, but bends not. Since, then, 'tis plain that crooked is woman's temper, forgive her faults, and blame her not; nor let her anger thee, nor coercion use, as all is vain to straighten what is curved."

TWO PARISIAN ANECDOTES.—A Lyons shoe-maker who was unfortunately afflicted with the club-foot had made so many patent leather bottines that he became possessed of an insatiable desire to wear those handsome objects which he made so well. He tried for some time to keep this desire under command, but there is nothing like one idea for getting mastery of a man. It made this son of Crispin the veriest slave that ever wedded soles and uppers. At last he could stand it no longer. He consulted the best surgeon he could find to ascertain if it was possible to transform his deformed foot into one suited with the elegancies of patent leather bottines. The surgeon examined it carefully and at last said that he could remove the deformity, but, he added, the operation will be extremely painful. Crispin replied: "A bristle for that! You'll not be half an hour about it, eh? and I shall wear patent leather bottines all my life?" "Yes, but that half-hour, or rather ten minutes (for I shall not be above ten minutes,) will seem to you like a whole life-time." "Doctor, I know what disagreeable half hours are, for I had a step-mother who made the first ten years of my life seem an eternity, and sooner than not wear patent leather bottines I'd bear a dozen half-hours." "Very well, call at my office day after to-morrow and I will cure your club-foot." The cobbler was punctual. He refused chloroform lest it might kill him before he could put on his patent leather bottines—bore the operation with unshaken fortitude—and in the course of time had a pair of feet as good as any man's. His first visit was to the surgeon. "You see, Doctor, I have patent leather bottines like everybody else." "And you well won the right to wear them." "That was nothing, Doctor, a mere flea bite; but when I put my patent leather bottines on for the first time and looked at myself in the glass I fainted. I never was so happy in my life." And we wonder the Chinese women should consent to undergo great pain from childhood to have club-feet!

Now to another, which is Dr. Trousseau's last anecdote. No man here is fuller of anecdote than he is. The other day a tall fellow was shown into his office (to use the American word, for medical men here call it their closet) who he saw at once was a servant and one of those hearty fat-looking fellows seen only in livery. They have unquestionably drawn prizes in the lottery of life. They are like rich men's sons, only they have more liberty. Dr. Trousseau inquired: "Well, my man, what ails you?" "Sir, my voice—" "Are you a singer?" "No, sir, I am a coachman, and if I lose my voice I lose my place, and if I lose my place I lose my fortune." "My good fellow, don't talk enigmas." "I am not talking enigmas. My master is an old man who will die soon, and he has always told me that I am in his will for enough to make me comfortable the rest of my days. Now he has a mania for going fast, and unless I drive the horses to the top of their speed he isn't satisfied. To avoid running down people in the street I am obliged to keep calling out, 'Ware! ware!' so I have lost my voice and master talks of dismissing me because I cannot bawl as I used to do. So, Doctor, for Heaven's sake do give me back my voice, for it is my fortune." Dr. Trousseau gave him a prescription, but he has said: "I suspect from his nose that he lost his voice calling for 'a glass of wine' rather than bawling 'Ware.' Coachmen everywhere are foud of the bottle."—Spiridon in the Boston Gazette.

BOUFFE'S BENEFIT.—Bouffé has been speculating in houses and building lots, and the adventures so miscarried as to sweep away all his fortune. The government therefore gave him the Grand Opera house, for his benefit performance. The immense theatre is ill suited with the delicacy of comedy, but as it holds a great audience and cost the beneficiary nothing, the former drawback seemed insignificant. The most eminent actors of Paris lent Bouffé their aid. I am happy to say that he put, all expenses paid, $4000 into his pocket by this performance. I believe this is the largest sum ever received here by a beneficiary. Rachel never got above $3000; but the French Comedy is a much smaller theatre than the Grand Opera.—Paris Letter.

A PERSON who dined in company with Dr. Johnson endeavored to make his court to him by laughing immediately at everything he said. The doctor bore it for some time with philosophical indifference; but the impertinent ha, ha, ha! becoming intolerable, "Pray, sir," said the doctor, "what is the matter? I hope I have not said anything that you can comprehend."

REV. MR. SPURGEON is becoming more eccentric every day. He is giving a series of lectures in London, in the course of which he actually appeared with a japau caudle-box in his hand, which he announced to be his text. The tenor of the discourse may be guessed, for the peroration consisted of a rapturous allusion to a chandelier hanging above him, in which were burning various colored lights, which he said typified the effulgence of the elect.

THE SNUB CONNUBIAL.—Loving wife: "Charles, dear, I wish you would put down that horrid novel and talk to me; I feel so dull: and—oh, Charles! my foot's asleep—" Charles: "Hush—sh! my dear, you might wake it."

PETROLEUM WELLS.—The action of petroleum wells is ingeniously explained by Prof. Evans, of Marietta, Ohio. According to his observations, this oil is contained in cavities or fissures of rocks, in connection with both water and gas. These are arranged, of course, according to their weight, the water at the bottom, the oil floating thereon, and the gas (often strongly compressed) fills the upper part of the cavity. If such a cavity runs obliquely from above downward, a well, when bored, may strike either the water or the oil, or it may enter the gas chambers. In the first two cases, if the gas be compressed, as it usually is, there will be a spouting well, the water or oil, or both together, being thrown out of the month of the boring. When the tension of the gas is exhausted resort must be had to pumping, until the cavity is pumped out. But, in some cases, a series of cavities communicate by small openings or erevices, in which case a well may flow intermittently for a long time, as it is replenished by the percolation of oil through these channels. It is not uncommon for intermittent wells to throw out at first 300 or 400 barrels a day, or to yield, in all, as much as 20,000 barrels. They sometimes run two or three years before exhaustion. The productiveness of the Lewellyn well, on the Little Kanawha, greatly exceeds these figures. Where there is little or no gas or where, from the gas-chamber being tapped, the gas is lost, pumping has to be resorted to from the first. Oil wells commonly vary in depth from 100 to 800 feet. Oil coming to the surface in springs is not a reliable sign of oil cavities in the immediate neighborhood, for it is often carried a long distance by the current of the subterranean streamlets by which the springs are fed.

CALCULATION.—In relation to the important custom of shaving the beard, a calculator makes the subjoined announcement in the Massachusetts Railway Times: "A man who shaves seven times a week, spending ten minutes in each operation, uses up 61 hours in a year, and if the person lives to the age of four score years he will have spent all the working hours of a leap year with a razor in his hand. The number of males in the United States is about ten millions, each of whom must shave, on an average, at least fifteen years. If they shave every day—and no person can keep his face free from beard, and carry out the idea of shaving fully, unless he shaves each day—the coming generation will spend nine hundred and fifteen millions of days' work in shaving, equal to nine hundred and fifteen million dollars. Allowing each to expend five dollars for razors, strops, brushes and soap, the aggregate cost of the articles will be fifteen million of dollars—making the whole cost of shaving in the United States for one generation, nine hundred and sixty-five million dollars."

SOME actors have made audiences merry by a mistake; others by spontaneous wit. When Quin, in Coriolanus, bade his soldiers lower their fasces, (in which he pronounced the a long,) down went their faces in the lowest of bows—and up went the laughing shouts of the audience. A similar effect was once produced by Charles Kemble, by transposing unconsciously two letters in the phrase, "Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?" and making of it, "Shall I lay surgery upon my poll? No, not for all Venice!" More intentionally did Lewis once raise a foolish laugh when playing with little Cherry, who, as "Druggot," exclaimed: "He looks as if he were going to eat me!" "Eat you!" exclaimed "Sir Charles Racket," (Lewis,) and out of his character, "I could swallow you. I needn't make two bites of a cherry!"

OLD bachelors who dislike the talk of women will perhaps admit that they never thought of one great good accomplished. Jean Paul says: "Naturalists assert that the leaves of the trees are continually in a fluttering motion, in order to purify the air by flapping it, this vibration in some measure performing the office of a gentle breeze. Now, it would be strange, indeed, if nature, who is thus economical in everything else, had ordained the much longer (seventy years) enduring vibration (of a woman's tongue) without a purpose; but the purpose is not wanting: it is the same as that for which the leaves are made to quiver."

A PLEASANT INCIDENT.—"An angel came into New York this Christmas," said a little girl to us one day this week, "for I saw her. She sent up to our house and brought me to a beautiful palace, where I found many more little girls, and some little boys; and she fed us all and gave us all gifts, and made Christmas, oh, so merry." So soon as we could interrupt her enthusiastic prattle to cross-examine, we found the name of this angel to the little ones around Fort Washington Heights to be Mrs. J. G. Bennett. The occasion was a Christmas dinner for poor children, given at the residence of this lady, who sent her magnificent sleigh for her grateful little guests.—N. Y. Leader.

STAYS were quite unknown in Russia until Peter the Great danced with some of the Hanoverian ladies on his journey to Pomerania. Quite astounded, the monarch exclaimed to his suite after the ball, "What confounded hard bones the German women have!"

(For the Californian.)

KNEELING.

TO NIGHT, O God! I come,
With aching heart, and weary faltering feet,
To thy blest presence, from the crowded street—
Bringing a heart all penitence and tears,
To thee I come.

Father of Life, I pray
That from the fulness of thy perfect love
Thou e'en wilt comfort one, who late did rove,
But now returns, all penitent, to seek
The perfect day.

O God! if in this heart
So faint and weak an idol has its throne,
If aught is worshipped save thyself alone,
I pray thee take it hence: I would not bring
To thee a part.

Father of Life! I seek
To be forgiven; if this day I've knelt
To one of Earth, or, if my heart has felt Anger or pain, oh, make my wayward heart
Forgiving, meek.

Saviour! this night I come,
A weary child of earth, seeking thy rest,
Longing in thy forgiveness to be blest,
Yearning but for the shelter of thy love,
No more to roam.

FEBRUARY 11th, 1865.

(For the Californian.)

WRECK OF THE BARK "ANN PARRY."

MEMORIES.

"ROUGH times on the bar! Ship ashore, and four men drowned!" was the reply of Captain Stewart, Superintendent of our Sailor's Home, to my greeting a few weeks ago; and the eye that had looked unquailingly upon the dangers of the deep was dimmed with sorrow as he thought of the ill-fated four of the inbound ship's brave crew, whose lives had been sacrificed in the terrible engagement between the mad winds and wild waves on the night of the 3d of January, just as they hoped to find shelter and a harbor within our Golden Gate.

But may we not hope that He, who in his ever-watchful love, beheld the storm-tossed bark of his disciples, the lowly fishermen of Galilee, and "went walking unto them," saying, "It is I; be not afraid!" also beheld these lost mariners who had gone down to the sea, and as tenderly bade them "Come!" while he stretched forth his saving hand to guide them into His own Golden City.

The next morning, when the papers announced that the bark Ann Parry had been wrecked and that four of her crew were drowned, the name, "Ann Parry," sounded familiarly to me: but at that time I did not recall any associations connected with it.

With some friends, that day, I visited the wreck at Point Lobos, near the Cliff House, and heard from the lips of the helmsman, who had been washed ashore, the story of the endeavors of himself and comrades to save the vessel—of their vain efforts and of their struggle for life.

On a piece of canvas near the wreck we saw a Bible. There were many people on the beach that morning, and as they passed they would take up the book, look at it, and reverently replace it, carefully arranging the leaves to dry. A sacred relic it seemed—the chart, perhaps, by which the weary mariners had entered a haven of Rest.

For fifty three years, the sailor told us, that noble vessel had weathered the storms of the ocean. In her youth, she had bravely wrestled with the heaving surges of the stormy Atlantic; she had boldly encountered the mountainous icebergs of the North; she had chased the monster of the deep to his lair in the polar seas; her broad sails had flapped idly under the piercing sun of the Equator; gaily had she sailed before the golden trade winds, bringing to our shores perfumes fresh from the spice groves of India, silks from the almond-eyed people of the East, teas from Japan, ivory from the African coast, pearls from the Orient—to every nation and to every clime had she borne the noble flag of America. And so this proud ship that had so long battled with the wind and wave, that had rounded the stormy capes, that had defiantly turned and challenged the terrible typhoon of the China seas, that had laughed at all disaster, was at last conquered in an angry passion of the Pacific.

To-night I was asked if I did not remember the old Ann Parry that had sailed from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, many years ago.

In a moment I am in my childhood and walking with my mother on a bright spring Sunday, from the "Middle street Baptist Church" in Portsmouth. We are approaching "the old stone church," where Dr. Peabody preached for twenty-five years—he whose life was so pure, whose teachings were so elevated and so Christ-like that with him we knew no sect.

Across the way stands the old school building, where we greeted him at the coming of each new month, as a witness and judge of our mind's progress. My old class-mate of this city—the only one that I have seen for many years of the twelve who together crossed that threshold and went forth into the world—remembers how his approving smiles and gentle rebukes were appreciated by both pupil and teacher.

Dr. Peabody is now at the head of one of our leading classical institutions, adding new laurels to those already won, but our loved and gentle teacher is sweetly resting from his labors. Mr. Nichols! the name is fraught with pleasant memories—for we followed him who bore it for four years through an ever onward and upward course; and when the way seemed rough and steep and clouded, and our timid heart grew faint, his pitying regard and kind words of encouragement won our confidence and love, and we would press on, upheld by his own brave, strong spirit.

But we pass on; the crowd issuing from that church blends with that already moving. Soon we meet with the people from the "old North Church," the "Pleasant street Church" and then the Episcopalian flock, with its pastor, the venerable Dr. Burrows, universally beloved and revered.

Suddenly the thunderings of the batteries announce the glad news that the Ann Parry, which had lain outside during the night to await the tide, is in sight, just returned from a three years' whaling cruise.

A general look of gladness brightens like a sunbeam the faces of the multitude. In a moment many of us are eagerly hastening towards the wharf to welcome the returned.

Now we behold the ship proudly approaching her moorings with her sails unfurled; and now the gallant commander, Captain D—t, the darling son of my mother's friend, steps gracefully from the deck, and is clasped in the embraces of a loving wife and mother. Friends flock around, and he is overwhelmed with cordial greetings and congratulations, for he has had a voyage of unprecedented success.

There are many glad welcomes, too, from fond mothers and loving friends for the brave, warm-hearted sailors, who have all returned, save one, for whom the flag is waving at half-mast. Listen to that eager, hopeful mother, pressing her way through the crowd which seems a blank to her, with all else besides, for her heart is impatiently bounding to meet her boy.

"How's my boy—my boy?
What care I for the men, sailor!
I'm not their mother—
How's my boy—my boy?
Tell me of him and no other!
How's my boy—my boy!"

In vain she asks! In vain she asks! her sailor boy comes not to greet her! He is lying—

"Fall many a score fathom—down, deep in the main!" and the sunny faces of that happy group are shadowed, and tears of sympathy are shed at that mother's sorrow as she listens to the dying message of her boy from the lips of a comrade.

But home and more friends and welcomes are waiting, and the glad ones hasten to meet them, while the weary, sorrow-laden one must wait a little longer for that other meeting in a blessed haven beyond.

At the threshold of home, and with outstretched arms, a beautiful child of five summers, with curling, ebony locks and glowing cheeks and eye—the reflection of her father—springs forward and gladdens anew the heart of the captain with her wild delight.

How happy I was, when invited to look at some of the beautiful treasures of the deep that he had brought with him—the exquisitely tinted and beautifully formed shells, among which was the chambered Nautilus, with its new and wider chamber for each new year of its occupant's life, and which suggested that beautiful apostrophe to the soul, by Oliver Wendell Holmes:

"Build thee more stately mansions, O, my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave the low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven, with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!"

And then there were branches from coral groves, unrivalled in beauty; and when one of those branches and some of the pretty rainbow-tinted shells were given to me, I returned home delighted.

I saw the captain and his beautiful wife and child several times after this, and their cup of happiness was full. Indeed, the few short weeks his presence lightened that home seemed one glad holiday to all of his home kindred, and particularly to his devoted Christian mother.

But the holiday passed over; its sun had set, and the night of his departure had come. There were heavy heart-beatings, heart sighs and suppressed sobs, as they pressed his hand for the last time and whispered tremblingly, "Good-by! God-speed!" But in the mother's last prayer she had committed her son to God, to return him again to his heart's home, if so he willed, and if not, to take him to himself—and they separated, cheered with the Christian's trust in an all-wise Providence.

Weeks passed on; cheering letters were received; much was to be hoped from this voyage, the waiting time promised to seem short, beguiled by frequent glad tidings.

But the last glad tidings had been received. There came a letter stating that the commander of the Ann Parry, when on the Indian Ocean, had sickened with the Madagascar fever, and it was thought best to leave him on the coast of Africa.

The physician who attended him soon expressed hopes of his recovery, and presented him letters brought from home by an American vessel. He read them and pressed them to his lips as he thought of his own New England home and friends ten thousand miles away, and he wept—the brave sailor wept—and then he grew delirious, but ever and anon he would sing—

"Give me my ship! I'll come to thee, Ten thousand miles across the sea."

In a few days he died, as the American Consul wrote, not so much from the effects of the fever as from another malady of which he gave the scientific name, signifying, the home physician said, "Home-sickness."

One link of the golden chain of love was laid up in heaven, and the bereaved ones, with their crushed and blighted hearts, could only say, "Thy will be done," and await God's time for each remaining link to be united with it.

Soon there came the hectic flush upon the cheek of the young and beautiful widow. Her bright eyes grew brighter, and while gazing on her burning beauty one would think of Moore's lines:

"Though some flowerets of Eden you still may inherit,
The trail of the serpent is over them all."

A few short months and consumption had done its work, and another link was united with that in heaven.

The last time I saw the orphaned one, she was in a beautiful promising childhood, surrounded by loving friends, so tender in their ministry that her parents' love seemed almost supplied and the promise of the orphan's Father fulfilled.

If she has not joined the love-links above, she has now unfolded into the promised radiance of a beautiful maidenhood.

Three years had passed since the Ann Parry had so gallantly sailed into Portsmouth Harbor, and again she enters, but under what different circumstances; disabled and so forlorn looking, with her tattered sails and quivering masts, that she seemed a pitiful object of distress. Her crew had mutinied and scattered after the death of their beloved commander; and lastly she had been wrecked.

For a long time she lay in the harbor, abandoned as worthless, serving only as a place of rendezvous for the boys who loved to play upon her decks and climb her broken masts; and when a certain nautically-inclined brother was missing at the usual hour of his return from school, upon inquiring for his whereabouts, the answer always was, "down on the old Ann Parry."

It was about this time that gold was first discovered in this then unknown land. Every available means of conveyance to the new Dorado was eagerly sought; even the hulk of the sea-worn, worm-eaten Ann Parry was bought for a trifling sum by several fortune-seekers, who, upon examination, had decided she might yet be rendered seaworthy. She was soon repaired, and the good Ann Parry, bound for California, sailed for the last time out of Portsmouth harbor, with much of the gallant bearing of old, to the regret of the boys, who shouted their adieux and watched her until she became a speck in the distance, sighing at the loss of their huge plaything.

As she vanished out of sight, she vanished out of memory, to be recalled by the mouldy, worm-eaten mass lying on the beach, and the flags again at half-mast for noble lives yielded up in her service.

Vale! Vale! Requiescat in pace! L. A. S.
SAN FRANCISCO, February 11th, 1865.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This excellent weekly comes to us regularly every week, and shows that no pains have been spared to make it what it is—the only literary paper in the State. Its editorials are excellent, its selections unequalled, and a dose of "In(d)igo" is sure to cure the blues.—Stockton Record.

THE term "Brother Jonathan," which is applied to the United States, originated many years ago, in this wise: Connecticut possessed, during the Revolutionary War, an energetic Governor, Jonathan Trumbull. Gen. Washington found him always prompt, and when there was a difficulty to solve, the General used to say, "We must consult Brother Jonathan on the subject." In course of time the phrase became a popular one, and Brother Jonathan is now consulted by pretty nearly the whole world.

"SPECULATORS," said Napoleon, "trace their schemes on paper; fools read and believe them. All are babbling about present happiness, and presently the people have not bread to eat; then comes a revolution. Such is usually the fruit of all their fine theories."

"AS OTHERS SEE US."

[THE "giftie" that Burns sighed for very often comes to mortals unsolicited through newspaper columns. For the following revelation we are indebted to the Grass Valley National. So far as notice of THE CALIFORNIAN is concerned, we consider the article an excellent and a truthful one, but we feel inclined to deny that "the higher classes in San Francisco are not up to the higher standard of taste and culture." Have we not an Art Union among us, and a Museum and several other things that decidedly disprove the assertion? The National, however, admits that to its rule "there are exceptions." Of course there are; all the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN are "exceptions," as well as many others of the higher classes who are too poor to subscribe to the paper and would not have time to read it were the contrary the case. The "exceptions" are in fact so numerous, at present, that it would be easier to reverse the National's idea and write them down as the rule. "Inigo" feels rather complimented at being referred to as "a man of genius," but "Mark Twain" is indignant at being left out, and others of our "funny" contributors, we fancy, would be willing to join him in bidding the editor of our exchange "go to grass," i. e. to Grass Valley.]

A GLANCE AT SAN FRANCISCO LITERATURE.—The popular literature of San Francisco, that is, the literature by which authors can subsist, is very light and flimsy, but sparkling. Superior writers, except superior ones in that line, of course, are not appreciated, and consequently not paid. Publishers of literary papers are not to be blamed, if they refuse to remunerate authors whom the public do not care to read. It is the public themselves who are to be held responsible. If they like "Inigo," who is a man of genius undoubtedly, and who is able to come up to a more solid standard, if he so desired, better than one who would give indications of a Johnsonian or Emersonian power, why then the embryonic Johnson or Emerson must stand aside and leave a clear field. * * * Funny fellows are all right and good in their place, and must have more or less genius in order to be funny, but then, the sole supreme taste of the public ought not to lie in that direction.

And yet, when we come to discriminate closely, it will be found that even the sparkling hits of "Inigo" and his imitators or rivals, are not admired by so large a number of even the so-called élite as the trashy "pale-face and bloody-hand" yarns of the "yellow-covered" fraternity. Children of larger growth, in California, must have their picture-books and their stories of Jack the Giant Killer. It, therefore, happens that original genius is shoved aside, in order to appease the public clamor for blood and thunder, and chain-lightning novels or novelettes, of foreign importation.

The fact is, and there is no disguising it—the wealthy classes in San Francisco, and those who can command elegant leisure, are not up to the higher standard of taste and culture. Of course there are exceptions. If they cannot appreciate, for instance, a literary journal like THE CALIFORNIAN—a periodical edited with rare ability and having contributors of the first class—a journal which, in the Eastern States, in London, in Edinburgh, or any capital of thoroughly refined and cultured communities, would receive the warmest and most cordial support—it is idle to complain of any injustice on their part. They are not unjust, they are simply ignorant. It will take a generation or two, on this coast, to bring the wealthy classes to the true level in this matter. Their children, having the superior opportunities for education which wealth affords, and ample time for elegant pursuits, together with travel and society of a higher order than their parents were accustomed to, will naturally go through a refining process, and come forth free from much of the vulgar hamperings and impediments of the former generation.—Grass Valley National.

MOUSTACHE SPOON.—Under a very elaborate engraving of a newly-invented patent of this article, the Scientific Journal gives us the following description: "A moustache is an ornament to the human face divine, under ordinary circumstances, but when it is drenched in a cup of smoking coffee, or emerges dripping from the cream, as Venus rose from the sea, the wearer of it is placed in an embarrassing position. Moustache coffee-cups have been sold in stores for many years. These cups have a portion of the top covered with a bridge in which there is an opening whence the beverage finds its way down the throat of the drinker without soiling his hirsute appendage. This mysterious-looking spoon effects the same object. When soup is taken, unless the eater thereof is dexterous, and "understands his business," he is apt to present an uninviting spectacle, and becomes a very undesirable addition to a small but select dinner-party. Hence this spoon. The bridge over the centre prevents the disagreeable results alluded to, and supports the moustache in its passage over the savory flood. The bridge may be made permanent or removable, and can be attached in a few minutes, and by any common mechanical device."

A ferryman, whilst plying over a river which was only slightly agitated, was asked by a timid lady in his boat, whether any persons were ever lost in that river. "Oh, no," said he, "we always finds 'em agin, the next day."

An old English game keeper says, that "without the deer ladies we should be but a stagnation."

MISS. M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XV.

A COMMERCIAL CRISIS.

THE private theatricals at the Cedars were postponed till Christmas, and in the middle of November Mr. Hillary removed his household to a big bow-windowed habitation at the western end of Brighton. Francis Tredethlyn followed, as in duty bound, and spent a great portion of his life in hurrying to and fro between London and Brighton by express trains. Never had a better adorer done suit and service to a mistress. There were no lovers' quarrels, no temporary estrangements between these two people. A serene and cloudless sky heralded the coming splendor of their union, and Maude declared again and again that she had never seen such a model pair of lovers.

"Harcourt and I were always quarrelling, you know, Julia," she said; "but then we were both such horribly jealous creatures. I didn't like his turning over music for other girls; though I suppose he was right, poor fellow, and a man must either turn over music or shut himself from society altogether. And he didn't like my going down to dinner with people in crack cavalry regiments; but I'm afraid we rather enjoyed ourselves when we quarrelled, and I used to feel as if it would be the easiest thing in the world to part from him forever, and go into a convent, or marry somebody I hated, or something of that kind; and then directly we had parted, I used to get so silly and miserable, and used to write him such penitent letters, taking all the blame upon myself, and making an idiot of him. But it's so nice to see you and Mr. Tredethlyn, and I'm sure he'll be the dearest husband in the world, Julia, and you'll be able to twist him round your little finger."

It was not with a feeling of unalloyed pleasure that Miss Desmond accepted her friend's congratulations. She was quite ready to admit that Francis Tredethlyn was a model lover, and promised to be the most submissive husband that ever bowed himself before a clever wife's dominion. His presents were magnificent, his attention was unflinching, his temper serenely even; and yet there were times when Julia Desmond felt that all was not quite as it should have been.

She had angled very successfully, and the fish she had landed was a splendid prize, victoriously snatched from all other anglers; but oh, what a difference there is between that poor deluded fish, entrapped out of the free waters by the cruel hook of the angler, and the willing bird which flies, of its own loving impulse, to the breast where it fain would shelter!

Julia Desmond knew that, in securing a husband, she had not won for herself a lover; and the knowledge pained and humiliated her. It was a small thing that she should not love Francis; but it seemed very hard that Francis should not love her. Her womanly tact would have stood in the place of affection, and she would have been lavish in the expenditure of a spurious coin, in the way of pretty words and tender looks, which should have had all the glitter and some of the vibration of the real mintage. But with Francis it was altogether different. The young man had no power to simulate, and there was a deadly coldness in his wooing that chilled the proud Irish girl's heart.

"Are they worth the humiliation?" she thought sometimes, when she contemplated her diamonds before the lighted glass in her bedroom at Brighton. "They are very big, and brilliant, and costly; but I've seen myself look handsomer with a scrap of scarlet ribbon twisted in my hair, than I look to night with all these stars, and crosses, and serpents flashing and twinkling about me. And then when I go down stairs I must go through all the old stereotyped business; and when I thank him for the flowers that he sent me this morning, he will look at me with his cold eyes, and tell me he is pleased to have given me pleasure. What is he but a clod—a mere clod, nothing but a clod? I ought to remember that; and yet I am angry with him because he does not love me. Why can I not be thankful for my good fortune, and accept my future husband for what he is—a respectable, well-behaved ploughman, whom an accident has endowed with thirty thousand a year?"

Perhaps Miss Desmond did not particularly care to answer that question which she put to herself in so impatient a spirit. And yet it was a question that might have been answered had she cared to fathom the lower depths of her own mind; but then there are questions which are better left unanswered. Why was she angry with Francis Tredethlyn for that passionless serenity of manner which was so nearly akin to indifference? Why? unless it was because in her own heart there lurked the consciousness that the unpolished Cornishman might have been a very different kind of lover, and that beneath his cold exterior there were slumbering embers which might have blazed into glory had one special torch been applied to them.

Yes, Julia knew this, and the knowledge was a perpetual poison that embittered the wine of success. The pride of the Desmonds had not been entirely trodden out beneath the iron heel of poverty. This girl, who had not been too proud to set herself to ensnare a rich husband, was yet proud enough to feel the bitterness of her degradation.

"If he only loved me," she thought, "I should feel that the bargain was a fair one. But to know that, at best, he only submits to the force of circumstances! He has been drifted into the position of a lover, and he performs the duties exacted of him; just like some non-dancing man who has been persuaded to dance in order to fill the last place in a quadrille, and who dawdles listlessly through the figures, and almost yawns in the face of a partner. And yet I have seen him look at her until the dull clay of which he is made seemed to change into a thing of life and fire."

And then Miss Desmond would fain turn to her jewel-case for consolation, and to beguile her mind from unpleasant thoughts by the consideration of all those grand things that may be done with thirty thousand a year.

If the young ladies of the household thought it a pleasant thing to spend the brief November afternoons on that delightful esplanade beside the sea, Mr. Hillary did not find a residence in Brighton so entirely convenient. A great deal of his time was spent in journeyings to and fro by the best and quickest express train in England; and there were days when even the facilities of a Brighton railway would not enable the merchant to take his dinner in the society of his beautiful daughter and her companion. There were occasions on which the two girls sat for a wearisome hour or so, trying vainly to amuse themselves by some feminine occupation, or to beguile the time by some feminine discourse, while the soup grew cold and the Brightonian cook grew angry; and then at last were fain to sit down at nine o'clock, and make a dismal pretence of dining without the head of the household.

"I sometimes think so much railway travelling must be bad for papa," Maude said. "I am afraid it must shake him a little; though riding in the Brighton express is almost as good as sitting in one's own room. I fancy papa has not looked so well lately. I have begged him to see Dr. Desborough, our Twickenham doctor, or some London physician; but it's no use, for he won't listen to me. I can't tell you how uneasy I am about him, Julia. He has had so many of his bad headaches lately; and then he says the business in Moorgate street has been so heavy. Ah, Julia! what is the good of being rich if papa must work as he does?"

Miss Desmond shrugged her shoulders.

"Business men seem scarcely to exist out of their offices," she said, rather scornfully. She always took care to let Maude know that she looked down upon the Twickenham splendor and its commercial sources. "I dare say your papa will devote himself to money-making as long as he lives."

"I sometimes think we might have been happier if we had been poorer," Maude said, dreamily, by-and-by. "I can't help fancying how we might have lived in some quiet country place, in a low-roofed, old-fashioned cottage, with a garden all round it and a churchyard close by, and the smell of cows and cooing of pigeons; and then I need not have been separated from ——" She did not finish the sentence; she was talking to herself rather than to Julia. Her face was beautified by an inexpressible softness and tenderness as she murmured that broken sentence. Her thoughts wandered back to the time when she and Harcourt Lowther had sworn eternal constancy, standing with their hands locked together in the dim summer twilight, on the bank of the shadowy river. She thought of that time, and all the freshness of feeling that had gone down with it came back upon her suddenly, like a breath of air from a distant ocean. How frivolous her life had been since then!—how selfish and useless! What a round of dress and decoration, and hurry and weariness! Harcourt Lowther's last letter was in her pocket as she sat musing despondently by the hired Brighton hearth—his last letter, a most melancholy epistle, full of despairing lamentations about the bitterness of separation and the hardships of Van Diemen's Land. And over and above all these feminine perplexities which tormented poor loving Maude, there seemed real cause for anxiety in the state of Mr. Hillary's health. It was not that the merchant himself complained, and, indeed, appeared to resent any inquiries as to his state, even when those inquiries came from such a privileged person as his only child. But every morning at the breakfast-table, sitting opposite to her father in the bright sunlight Maude could see a darker shade under Mr. Hillary's eyes, a more weary look about his haggard face. She defied his anger very often, and pleaded earnestly with him, imploring him to consult a physician, but his answer was always very much the same.

"I am subject to this sort of headache; my work in Moorgate street is peculiarly hard just now. Pray do not trouble yourself Maude; there is not the least occasion for an uneasiness about my health."

With such assurances as these Miss Hillary was compelled to be satisfied. There had been an air of coldness, or almost displeasure, in her father's manner to her lately, and Mande found to her surprise that he was by no means pleased with the matrimonial engagement that had arisen between Julia Desmond and Francis Tredethlyn.

"Engaged to her!" the merchant exclaimed, when his daughter carried him the news of Julia's conquest—engaged to Julia Desmond! Why, I fully believed that he came to Twickenham on your account, Maude. I said nothing to you about the matter, because girls have sometimes such absurd notions, and I thought it better to let things take their course. And so Julia has entrapped him, has she? I ought to have been on my guard against Ryan O'Bryan Desmond's daughter."

"How can you talk like that, papa?" cried Miss Hillary. "I'm sure Julia and Mr. Tredethlyn are really in love with each other, and dear Julia is perfectly disinterested. And then, if Mr. Tredethlyn had been ever so much in love with me—and I'm sure he never cared the least bit about me—how could you suppose that I could ever dream of marrying him; when I—when he's such a very common kind of person?"

Harcourt Lowther's name had been almost trembling on Miss Hillary's lips, but she had remembered her father's aversion to that name, and had modified the conclusion of her sentence in deference to his prejudices.

"A very common kind of person!" repeated Lionel Hillary, in a thoughtful tone; "yes, yes, my dear, I dare say he is, I dare say he is. But I've seen women as beautiful as you married to commoner men than Francis Tredethlyn."

And then, after a brief silence, the merchant's manner changed all of a sudden; he took his daughter in his arms, and pressed his lips upon her forehead with an almost passionate fondness.

"My darling! my darling!" he cried, "do you think it wouldn't please me to see you married to a man you could love?"

Mande looked up into his face with a sweet smile upon her own: her lips parted, and in the next moment Harcourt Lowther's name would have been spoken and his cause pleaded by those innocent lips. But it seemed as if her father in a manner anticipated what she would have said, for he put her from him suddenly, and turned away with a faint shiver of pain.

"I am very sorry to hear of this engagement between Julia and that young man," he said, with his face averted from his daughter, and his hands nervously shuffling among the papers on the table before him; "I am very much vexed. There, go, Maude; you don't understand, you can't understand. Go, my dear; I'm busy."

No more than this had ever been said between the father and daughter upon the subject of Miss Desmond's matrimonial arrangements, but Maude had been able to discover that her father's vexation was not a matter of the moment, to be forgotten and done with after the first surprise of the announcement. Lionel Hillary was tolerably gracious to Mr. Tredethlyn, but his manner towards Julia changed altogether. There were times when he scarcely took the trouble to conceal his displeasure from that young lady herself. He would sit watching her moodily when Francis Tredethlyn was by her side, and would sometimes, when the conversation gave him an opening, break out into some cynical generality upon the husband-hunting propensities of modern young ladies. Francis was too simple-minded to comprehend the drift of these covert sneers; but Julia understood her benefactor, and defied him with her bold handsome eyes and her flashing teeth.

"He wanted thirty thousand a year for his daughter. I suppose," she thought, when she pondered on Mr. Hillary's discourtesy. "What grasping, avaricious creatures these rich people are!"

Christmas was approaching, and that festival period was to be spent at the Cedars, to which place Maude Hillary was tenderly attached, despite her sentimental talk about poverty and a simple home deep down in the heart of rustic England. The young ladies' portmanteaus had been packed ready for the departure from Brighton, and Maude and Julia only waited for Mr. Hillary to escort them on their homeward journey. He had not been so much with them during the last week or so of their sojourn, and as Francis Tredethlyn only came backwards and forwards with Mr. Hillary, the girls had been left by themselves, with no better occupation or amusement than the reading of new books, the trying of new music, and a contemplation of the blustering gray waves beating eternally before their windows: for the weather had been cold and stormy of late, and the delicious esplanade had been deserted; only an occasional masculine wanderer, out for a "constitutional," buffeted the winds and strode in dismal loneliness along the pavement beneath Mr. Hillary's windows.

It was only natural, under these circumstances, that the young ladies should have grown weary of Brighton. They had a close carriage at their disposal, but then driving through perpetual tempest is not particularly agreeable even in a close carriage. They went shopping in East street two or three times during this severe weather, and bought expensive materials for impossible complications of Berlin wool work and gold beads; and, experimentalizing with the same on their return home, discovered themselves at sea in a wide ocean of perplexity. Thus it was that they grew very tired of Brighton, and wished most earnestly for Mr. Hillary's coming.

"Oh for the silvery ring of my own Broadwood!" exclaimed Maude, as she rose from a struggle with a German rendering of "Polly put the kettle on," in seven flats, and ten pages of double arpeggios. "I wonder who makes the pianos for houses that are let furnished? I'm sure they must all be made by the same man; and I suppose it's a theory of his own that makes him always use damp wood, and put so much flannel into his trebles. I wish papa would come and take us home, Julia."

Miss Hillary expressed this wish at least twenty times in a day, and Julia echoed it, as if out of pure sympathy. But Miss Desmond was not a very sympathetic person, and she was really anxious to get back to the neighborhood of London and Francis Tredethlyn. Nearly a fortnight had passed since the Cornishman had been to Brighton, and Julia was terribly conscious that the link which united him to her was very fragile, and might be broken by any unlucky hazard, unless, indeed, his constancy were sustained by a chivalrous sense of honor. She had as yet had no opportunity of discovering his sentiments on this subject, and she had a vague idea that a small farmer's son, who had taken the Queen's shilling, would be unlikely to entertain the same splendid notions of truth and loyalty that glowed in the breasts of his superiors.

"I know that he's a very good fellow," Julia thought; "and I don't suppose he would steal anything, or tell a deliberate falsehood; but I dare say he would think it no sin to throw me over at the last moment if——"

There was a point at which Miss Desmond's reveries always stopped short. She did not care to think about that which Francis Tredethlyn might like to do, even if he were free to do as he liked.

Mr. Hillary came home very late upon the evening of an especially disagreeable day. He came down to Brighton by the mail train, and arrived at the hired mansion just as the two girls were gathering together the gold beads and Berlin wools, preparatory to going to bed. But though the merchant had been so much longer away than usual, he seemed in no particular hurry to embrace his daughter; for instead of coming up to the drawing-room, he walked straight to a dreary little study at the back of the house, which had been set apart for his use.

Maude had heard the sonorous knock at the big street door, and flew out of the drawing-room to greet the traveller.

"At last, dear papa!" she cried. "We have been as dull and dreary as a pair of Marianas in a moated grange. Oh, you darling papa, I am so glad you have come. Please take us home to Twickenham, we've had such weather; we're as helpless and miserable as those poor working people who go about singing so dreadfully flat when there's a hard frost. We are two lonely, single girls, and we've got no work to do," sang Miss Hillary, with the established nasal drawl, as she skipped down the stairs.

"Kiss me, you wet, melancholy-looking papa," she said, planting herself between Lionel Hillary and the door of his sanctum.

The merchant seemed in no very affectionate humor to-night. He put his daughter aside without looking at her. His face was fixed and stern in expression, and its gloomy rigidity was in no way relaxed as he spoke to Maude.

"Why are you up so late?" he said. "I thought you would have gone to bed an hour ago. I don't want to be worried to-night, Maude; I've some papers down here that want looking into, and I've brought other papers with me. I may have to sit up half the night, perhaps; and, remember, I am not to be disturbed."

"But you will be ill, papa, if you work so hard."

"I shall not be ill, and I know what is best for myself. I cannot and must not be annoyed to-night, Maude."

He went into his room, where the servant had already made an illumination that would have been enough for a chapel or a factory, by means of five flaring gas burners; but Maude followed him, and was not to be put off even by the harsh words that sounded so strangely in her ears.

"Papa," she remonstrated, piteously, "I am sure that you are ill, or that something has happened."

Mr. Hillary laid his hand upon his daughter's shoulder, and put her out of the room—very gently, but with a certain determination which was quite a new thing in his treatment of this idolized and exacting Maude.

"I tell you, once more, that I am going to be—very busy, and must not—be disturbed." He seemed tired, for the words came slowly, as if the mere utterance of them were a painful exertion. "Good night, my dear; go to bed, and sleep peacefully. God bless you, and take you in His keeping."

His manner changed all in a moment as he said this, and he caught her suddenly to his breast and kissed her passionately, as he had done the other day when they had talked of Francis Tredethlyn.

But the next moment Maude found herself standing outside the closed door of her father's retreat, amazed and unhappy. That sudden little gush of affection had been as perplexing to her as Mr. Hillary's unusual sternness of manner. It was all alike strange; and vague fears agitated her as she went slowly up-stairs, to the barren drawing-room, which looked very little more home-like than a first-class waiting room at a railway station.

Julia had disappeared, and the flaring gas lamps illumined a great barren desert of Brussels carpet and emptiness. Dear Julia always remembered that her good looks were her only dower, and took care not to waste them by late watching in the glare of many gas burners. Maude sighed as she looked round the empty room, and then seated herself at a table adorned with a gaudy cover that looked like a small "Turkey carpet." She took up the impossible Berlin wool work, and the gold beads, and set herself to the task of counting tiny dots and squares on a colored paper pattern, with a view to discovering where the Berlin wool left off and the beads began. But she was tired and unhappy, and the bewildering dots and squares made her head ache; so she pushed away the work presently, and roamed restlessly up and down the room; now stopping by a table, and taking up a book, only to open it haphazard, and stare blankly at the pages; now lingering by the piano, noiselessly fingering the notes, and tormented with a wild desire to dash into some blustering march that should startle the slumbering household.

Her father told her to go to bed. He was going to work very late, and must on no account be disturbed. He had worked late sometimes at Twickenham, but not often, and on those occasions Maude had gone to sleep happily enough, only a little disturbed by the thought of "poor papa" toiling over those cruel business documents. But to-night it was altogether different. At the risk of incurring her father's anger, Miss Hillary paced wearily up and down the desert of Brussels carpet, waiting till she should hear the merchant's step on the stairs, and know that his night's work was over.

She waited, oppressed by a vague uneasiness, and wondering why she was uneasy. Why was it that to-night the thought of her father's toil mingled with all manner of strange fears and misgivings? She was usually so frivolous, so apt to look brightly out upon the sunnier aspects of the world around her; but to-night her heart seemed like a leaden weight in her breast. What was it? why was it? The cheap French clock upon the chimney-piece struck some abnormal number between twelve and twenty, and a distant church clock struck two; but still Miss Hillary waited in vain for that expected step upon the stair. Her father had said that he would be very late, but she had hoped that at the worst his work would be finished in a couple of hours. The time seemed intolerably long to Maude Hillary, roaming in a purposeless manner about that big room, or standing in the bay-window to listen to the hoarse roaring of the waves, or sitting down to read for five minutes together, but never once knowing what she was reading.

There had been so few troubles in her life, and looking back at the smooth, sunlit ways by which she had wandered from childhood to womanhood, she was seized all at once with a fear that there must be some great grief in store for her. It was quite impossible that she could have altogether withheld herself from some contemplation of that startling question as to her right to be happy in a world where so many people were miserable; but the question had never intruded itself upon her so awfully as to-night.

"I have never had sickness, or death, or sorrow near me," she thought. "My mother died before I was conscious of her existence—as I think—and yet it seems strange that there can be any time when a child is unconscious of a mother's presence, or heedless of her loss. The worst trouble that I can remember is my parting from Harcourt, and I have always hoped that all would come right at last. But to-night—to-night I feel as if there had been something sinful in my happiness. The sermons I have heard at church never came home to me. I never felt that I was a miserable, sinful creature, groping my way upon a thorny path. I'm afraid I have been very wicked, selfish and idle, vain and frivolous."

Looking back at her life, Miss Hillary saw an existence of Twickenham pleasure, water parties and picnics, "Star and Garter" dinners, perpetual Parisian bonnets, and turquoise bracelets, pet dogs, new novels, opera boxes, and concert tickets. Perhaps she had never before watched and waited alone at these still hours of the dead winter night, and these unusual thoughts may have been only the natural companions of her loneliness.

She looked at her watch a dozen in an hour, and at last, when it was nearly three o'clock, her patience was exhausted all at once, and she resolved on going down to her father's room.

"He will be very angry with me for sitting up so late," she thought, "but I cannot go to bed until I have seen him. It will be better to see him ever so cross with me than not to see him at all."

Having once arrived at this determination, Maude Hillary ran down stairs and tapped lightly at her father's door. There was no answer, and she repeated that timid tapping. Again there was no answer, and she tried the handle of the door, intending to steal softly in and surprise the merchant at his work. But the door was locked, and her breath grew thick with the sudden oppression caused by some vague terror. She lost all command over herself, and knocked loudly, calling in a frightened voice, "Papa! papa!"

It was not so strange that she should be frightened. How often she had heard of hard-working city magnates suddenly stricken down in the prime of life by some fell disease, unsuspected until that last fatal moment!

A heavy step inside the little room relieved her of these vaguely terrible fears. The door was opened, and Mr. Hillary stood before her, very pale, very angry. "Maude! how absurd this is! What have you been doing? Why have you been sitting up?"

"Because somehow I couldn't go to bed while you were working down here, papa darling. I couldn't; I didn't want to worry you or disobey you; but I don't know what's the matter with me to-night. All manner of ridiculous things came into my head, and I felt that I must see you before I went to sleep. Let me come in, papa."

She pleaded so prettily, looking up in his face with such tender devotion beaming in her own, that Lionel Hillary must have been something harder and sterner than the stoniest of mercantile men if he had been deaf to her pleading.

"Come in if you like, Maude," he said, with a weary sigh; "I am sorry that you disturbed me. I had very nearly finished my work."

The littered mass of papers that had been scattered on Mr. Hillary's desk when Maude had left him were gone now, and only a few neat little packets remained in their stead. But, placed conspicuously upon the desk, Maude perceived a big envelope with a great red seal, and lying near it a smaller envelope, also sealed.

The merchant had removed his neckcloth. He seemed to have been working hard, for big drops of moisture stood upon his forehead. A great basket near his chair was filled to overflowing with torn scraps of paper, and the shower of waste had fallen far and wide, and lay like snow about the chair in which Mr. Hillary had been sitting.

"Now, Maude," he asked sternly, as his daughter followed him into the room, "what is it that you want with me?"

"Why, to see you leave your work and go to bed, papa. You don't know how late it is."

The merchant smiled a grim smile, and pointed to his watch which lay open on the desk.

"I've been working against time, and I've kept watch upon every quarter of an hour," he said.

"But you have finished now, papa."

"Not quite. I have very nearly finished—but not quite."

Miss Hillary shook her head with a very petulant gesture. She was not in the least afraid of her father's anger now. She had been so tortured by dim and shadowy apprehensions, that her spirits rebounded suddenly now that she was bold enough to defy him.

"I shan't leave you any more to-night, papa. If you had all the business of the Stock Exchange to transact, I wouldn't let you sit up any longer, ruining your health by brooding over those tiresome papers. Besides, your desk is quite clear, you seem to have done everything."

"No, I have not done everything."

Mr. Hillary had resumed his seat, and was staring absently at the desk before him, where all things looked so neat and orderly that Maude seemed justified in thinking that her father's work was done. There was a row of drawers on each side of the desk. One of them was open, and a bunch of keys hung from the lock. A copy of the Times newspaper lay across the top of this open drawer; but as Miss Hillary hung about her father, some portion of the silken flounces or furbelows of her dress brushed against the paper, and it fell rustling to the ground. Lionel Hillary turned suddenly with a look of alarm directed towards the open drawer, and Maude following his glance, saw something lying among the neat packets of letters and papers—something which had no business to be there: something which seemed to realize a greater terror than any that her fancy had shaped, however dimly, during those hours of weary waiting in the room above.

The object which seemed so terrible to Maude Hillary was a pistol, a small pistol of very modern fashion, fresh and bright from the hands of the gunmaker. Mr. Hillary was not a man who affected the gunsmith's art, and Maude had never seen such a weapon in her father's possession until to-night—until this night when vague fears respecting him had been so long busy in her brain, only wanting a form into which to shape themselves.

It seemed as if her frivolous girlhood left her all at once. It seemed as if that great terror, coming upon her with such ghastly suddenness, transformed her into a woman—a woman possessed of woman's highest attributes, fortitude and self-abnegation. She uttered no cry of alarm, no exclamation of surprise; but she suddenly closed and locked the drawer in which the pistol lay, and dropped the bunch of keys into her pocket. Then kneeling down beside her father's chair, she put her arms tenderly about him, and laid her head upon his breast. Mr. Hillary had grown very passive all at once, and sat idly staring at the table before him.

"Papa," said Maude presently, in a low, pleading voice, "what is it? tell me, confide in me. In whom should you trust if not in me? What is it, papa? what does it mean?"

"It means—ruin!" the merchant answered, huskily. He did not turn towards his daughter, but still sat staring blankly straight before him.

"It means failure and ruin, Maude; ruin in its worst shape, its most hideous shape."

"You mean that we shall be poor, very poor, that we shall have to leave Twickenham, that you will be a clerk perhaps in some office, and I a daily governess. I remember when the Gordons failed, and poor Constance Gordon and her brothers had to begin the world afresh, without money, and with very little help from their old friends. Do you think I could not bear as much as that, and be happy still, if you were with me? Ah, papa, papa, do I seem to you such a helpless, useless creature, that you shrink from trusting me at such a time as this?" Hysterical sobs rose in her throat, but she stifled them and went on talking to him in the same quiet, tender voice, and caressing him as she talked. He submitted passively enough to her caresses, but he seemed scarcely conscious of them.

"Trust me, papa; tell me everything. Such troubles as these seem so much less dreadful when once they have been freely spoken of. I remember how Mr. Gordon kept everything hidden from his family as long as he could; and Constance told me that it seemed as if a great cloud was hanging over the house, and there was something in the atmosphere that stifled them all. But when the crash came at last they bore it bravely; and see how well they have got on ever since, in a moderate way. Ah, papa, you have brought me up like a spoiled child, or a princess in a fairy tale, and now that trouble has come to us you think I can't bear it. But I can, papa, if you will only be brave, your foolish, extravagant daughter will learn to be wise and patient. I was getting very tired of Twickenham, papa, and shall be as happy as the day is long in a nice little cottage, in some cheap suburb, where I can have pupils."

Lionel Hillary ought no doubt to have been comforted by his daughter's tenderness, but unhappily there are some wounds so cruelly inflamed that the gentlest application the surgeon can devise is apt to chafe and irritate them. The girl's talk jarred upon the merchant's mind, and it was with a shiver of pain that he turned to her as she left off speaking.

"Child, child," he exclaimed, fretfully, "you don't know what you're talking of. Do you think it is such an easy thing to pass from one of the first positions in the City to a clerkship and a cottage in the suburbs? Do you think there is nothing between such opposite conditions? Do you suppose I have only to shut up my books, and wish my creditors good morning, before I walk out of my office? You talk and think like a child, Maude. It is all very well for an old twaddler like John Gordon, who suspends payment upon the first failure that affects his stability, and who winds up his affairs with a dividend of fifteen shillings in the pound, and the compliments and sympathy of all Basinghall street. No one will sympathize with my fall, though more than I can count will suffer with me. I am not a man to drop under the first blow, Maude; for nearly three years I have been working a rotten ship, with the knowledge that nothing short of a miracle could save me from wreck. The wreck has come. The wreck will call me a dishonest man, because I waited for that miracle. I waited as the gambler waits at the green table, hoping that the last risk would bring me salvation. With me ruin means disgrace. I tell you, Maude, before the month is out there will be a panic in the City, and men will cry out that Lionel Hillary is a rogue and a swindler. There's not a man who ever dined at Twickenham that won't use his knowledge of my home as a weapon against me. There's not a bottle of wine I ever gave a friend whose price and quality will not be made a reproach against me. Oh! I know how people talk about these things. Go away, child. Your presence only goads and irritates me. It reminds me that I might have done better than I have done, I might have been wiser, I might have saved something—my good name at least. I have loved you dearly, Maude, Heaven only knows how dearly, for I am no man of big words or sentimental phrases. And now I leave you utterly destitute, the pauper child of a disgraced father."

"But you shall not leave me," cried Maude, with a sudden energy that startled Lionel Hillary. "Papa, why do you insist upon treating me as a child? Why do you judge me by what I have been, rather than by what I can be? Why won't you trust me? why won't you talk to me as if I were a son, and had a right to share your secrets? You have told me the worst, and you see I can bear to know it. I can endure even disgrace; but I cannot bear to lose you. Trust me, papa. I will be patient under any calamity except—" She was seized with a sudden shivering, and clung to him, with a convulsive force in the small hands that entwined themselves about his arm. "You know what I mean, papa," she said. "Believe that I can bear anything if you will be true, and brave and patient. And even yet the miracle may come. Something may happen at the very last, surely it may, to save your good name."

Mr. Hillary pressed his daughter's hand in acknowledgment of so much tenderness and devotion; but he shook his head moodily as he answered her, "Nothing can happen to save me, unless twenty thousand pounds drop from the skies between this and the 10th of January."

Twenty thousand pounds! Maude's thoughts flew to her jewel-case in obedience to the most universal of feminine instincts. Twenty thousand pounds! Alas for that birthday gift of opals and diamonds, the turquoise rings and bracelets, the emerald cross, the delicate pink coral, and all the fragile fantastic toys of gold and enamel, bought in the dearest market of elegant West End dealers, who give three years' credit! Maude, in all her ignorance, was wise enough to know that these things would not realize one of the twenty thousands required by her father.

"But there is Twickenham, papa," she said; "the Cedars must be worth ever so many thousands."

"And is mortgaged to the full extent of its value," answered Mr. Hillary. "Find me twenty thousand pounds if you can, Maude, but don't worry me with frivolous suggestions. I tell you that it is quite impossible for a woman to understand my position. God help me! I scarcely understand it myself. I only know that everything round me is so much rottenness, and that the crash must come next month."

"But you will not think—of that—again?" urged Maude, pointing to the drawer.

"No; I'll wait to the tenth."

"For my sake, oh, papa, for my sake."

"No, child; not for your sake, but from a selfish, cowardly clinging to life," cried Lionel Hillary, with sudden passion. "It would be better for you, ten times better, if I were dead. The thought of that was in my mind as I came down here to-night, until the noise of the engine almost seemed to thump out the words, 'Better for her, better for her.' People would have mercy upon you if I were dead, Maude; even those who suffered by me would be less bitter in their reproaches if I were dead. A man can only break his heart once, and when the man is dead, there is no mark for the arrows of justifiable reproach, or the foul garden stuff and rotten eggs of malicious calumny."

"Papa, the help may come; the twenty thousand pounds may be found."

"No, child; there was only one hope of that, and the hope is gone."

For the first time that night Mr. Hillary looked at his daughter; she saw the look, an anxious scrutiny that sent a chill through her heart. She did not ask him what that one hope had been.

"Papa, trust in me, only trust in me!" she cried; "you do not know of what I am capable for your sake—for your sake. You don't know what I have suffered to-night, and how changed I am by that suffering. Hope for a miracle, even, papa; keep things as smooth as you can, and between this and the tenth the twenty thousand pounds may be found. Only tell me one thing. You don't want any one to give you the money. If it were lent to you, you could repay it by and by?"

"Yes; with sufficient time I could repay it."

"Then hope for the miracle, papa. Ah! you think me such a child that you are almost angry with me to hope; but the lion laughed at the mouse. I dare say."

Five minutes after this, Miss Hillary led her father to his room and wished him good night, cheerfully enough, upon the threshold. But under that pretence of cheerfulness, cruel fears and perplexities were torturing her innocent heart. Ruin, dishonor, disgrace; the misery of many homes besides that one household on the bank of the river—all these terrors had come very suddenly upon the girl who only that morning had been impatient of the December weather and the dull gray sky.

She went to her room, but only to sit with the door open, listening for any sound in her father's apartment, which was next her own. She sat for nearly two hours shivering with cold, and then crept softly to her father's room and opened the door. The merchant was sleeping, peacefully enough to all appearance, for his breathing was tranquil and regular; so Maude went back to her room. It seemed the bitterest mockery to go to bed, but then Miss Hillary's maid would have been scandalized had she come at eight o'clock and found her mistress still watching. Alas, poor Maude! for the first time in her life she had to submit to that most cruel social penance, entitled "keeping up appearances." She went to bed, and though she seemed to hear every hour, and half-hour, and quarter of an hour chimed by the church clocks, she must have slept at some time or other in that brief remainder of the night, or else how should she have been tormented by those hideous dreams, in which she was always wading through black morasses and turbid waters, carrying in her arms a great bag of gold, which she vainly strove to convey to her father?

(To be continued.)

THERE is a very prevalent belief—as erroneous as it is popular—that more attention can be paid to a sermon when the eyes are shut than when they are open.

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1865.

WANTED.—Good canvassers to canvass for THE CALIFORNIAN, will find profitable employment by applying at this office.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

ON Monday evening Matilda Heron made her appearance on the Opera House stage as "Camille," in the play of that name with which her own has become inseparably connected. Ten years and more had rolled their round since California returned this lady to the East, which sent her to us to be pronounced upon, with an endorsement written in the golden characters for which this State is famous, an endorsement at once accepted and appreciated the world over. Miss Heron's career since then has been an eminently successful one, giving our people every reason to feel proud of their protegee, and surely if the right of discovery holds as good in artistic claims as it does in mineral ones, few will dispute California's title in claiming this artist as her own. There was naturally a slight embarrassment attending Miss Heron's reappearance, and the trifling nervousness or apprehension on her part, which we fancied we detected during the first act, was fully justifiable, for communities change as well as individuals. Many of the friends who were present at the scene of her early triumphs were dead or gone, and a cool reception now would have been rendered doubly cutting by its contrast with the enthusiastic demonstration of former days. It was evident from the first that the audience was inclined to be critical, taking nothing for granted and prepared to reverse, if need be, the judgment of other years, for the greeting which met the artist was not remarkable for over passionate warmth. Possibly a certain feeling of disappointment was entertained by the multitude at finding their old favorite changed in personal appearance, a feeling similar, perhaps, to that which the lady herself may have felt when the outlines of our city for the first time met her gaze on her return, for that too has grown and changed. Coolly critical, the audience sat and the play proceeded. Before the end of the first act it was evident that several points had been made, and that at least a favorable verdict would be rendered, for at intervals the unpremeditated pat of approving feet would be heard upon the floor, and a rattling fire of applause from impatient hands like that which in skirmishes precedes the regular volley. In due time the volleys came, with enthusiastic calls before the curtain, and abounding bouquets, in acknowledgment of which the lady bowed her thanks, and remarked that it was not the first time that California had strewn her path with flowers. The play of Camille has never been a favorite of ours; thrilling and effective it undoubtedly is, but it moistens the ladies' eyes and saturates their handkerchiefs too early in the evening, besides making their noses look red. And the sick chamber of the pale Dame aux Camelias and the death-bed scene, as vividly portrayed by Miss Heron, move one with a painful shudder like that which the reality might excite, and, indeed, it is hard to persuade oneself that it is not a reality which is before us instead of consummate acting. In her delineation of the character, Miss Heron has learned that to be natural under such circumstances is to be truly tragical, and we have no ranting tones, no wild tearing of the hair, or excited clutchings at imaginary candlesticks, but the suppressed voice of real passion instead—the deep drawn breath and the effort at calmness, the quick play of the features and the involuntary intonations which respond like the chords of an Aeolian harp to the wild storms which sweep across the soul. Let writers differ as they choose as to the merits of the play itself, we fancy there can be but one expression of opinion as regards Miss Heron's rendition of the character—that it is a rare and consummate piece of acting, marked by more power and individuality than any character that has been introduced upon the stage in many years. Mr. Mayo's "Armand" was excellent, and he can convey it to the East with him when he goes with a certain assurance of success. Of course Mrs. Saunders' "Prudence" was good, according to the stage tradition of the character, but, to our thinking, an unpardonable sin against good taste was committed in the invention of the part. It is too strong a foil to Camille, and towards the close becomes repulsive instead of funny. Contrasts are good, but few would step from a warm bath into one of icy temperature by way of a pleasure-plunge. The piece was well put upon the stage, the other characters were very creditably sustained, and when a proper and common understanding is arrived at among the various dramatis personae as to the proper pronunciation of the love-sick hero's name, the effect will be fine, indeed. Medea was announced for last night. Fazio will be produced this evening, and Gamea is in active preparation.

Mrs. Perry's benefit on Saturday night last was crowded. Miss Clarkson made a very successful début, and the beneficiary, in acknowledgment of the kindness of her friends, made one of the best little speeches imaginable—we score this latter fact down to the credit of a sex which does not always appear to advantage in similar essays.

The minstrels still continue their nightly ministrations at the Academy of Music, the Eureka being closed. They appear in the afternoon performance at the Opera House to-day and in the usual Sacred Concert at the Academy to-morrow evening. Last Sunday an excellent house attended them, and if the encouragement be kept up perhaps this will change their intention of migrating in April.

NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, January 13th. 1865.

WHAT phrase can be more expressive than that of the French, a scalereux secret? It is used in the notices, now so frequent, of the death of Constant Moequard, private secretary of Louis Napoleon, and chief of his cabinet. He was the prime agent in that detestable, dark coup d'état, and the confidant of the Emperor in his political and social intrigues. Napoleon seized his papers at his death, but he has undoubtedly secured the advantages to be derived from dangerous secrets—their mantle will fall on his children. He was a dramatic author, and was possessed with the spirit of his class; authors and artists will regret his death, for he procured crosses and pensions for them, and brought them under the Emperor's notice. The bit of obituary given here of Moequard, I derive from an article in the first number of a revived musical paper, called the New York Weekly Review. Its editor is Mr. Seymour of the Times, a capable critic, who was somewhat famous several years since for introducing a lively and companionable elephant in his theatrical articles. Mr. Henry Clapp, the conductor of the now extinct Saturday Evening Press, and afterwards the literary editor of the Leader, has removed himself from the latter, and reappears as "Figaro" in the columns of the Weekly Review. The Leader is owned by a company who intend to make it a "sound" Democratic paper; they have therefore placed it in the hands of Mr. Fiske, an able newspaper man, who has been attached to the Herald, and is of course in ample knowledge of the nature of political ropes. How far the Leader will continue to be the refuge of the literary Bohemian, remains for Mr. Fiske to teach us. The life of the Bohemians is as short as it is ardent; like May flies they dance and sport in the sunrise of every newly born periodical; whether the periodical kills them, or they kill the periodical, my tender heart forbids me to search out, but the gods must dearly love them, they disappear so often, and so suddenly. In no city of our continent do they swarm so thickly as in this. Let but a new journal appear, and a host rises to show the world what may become a Bohemian. It would be curious to discover the nature of the individuals who furnish the money for the pastime of these merry grigs, who combine the bent of the locust with their sunny fascinating qualities; they devour noodles' houses, and the noodles are happy to have their tenements destroyed for the sake of basking in what they believe to be a famous intellectual splendor. A great many noodles must at this present time go to the support of a paper; thousands of dollars are edited away in a short number of months. The Tribune has paid this year for editing and correspondence, eighty-four thousand dollars, and the difference in the price of its paper, between now and six months since, amounts to seventy-two thousand dollars. Notwithstanding this great expense, and the increased liveliness of the Bohemian tribe thereupon, I am glad to see the Weekly Review; there are some capital articles in the first number. I wish more and more literary enterprises would be undertaken, especially in magazines, in order to hold in check the elegant conservatism and the methodical propriety of well-established literature. An instance of steering by public opinion has happened lately in the case of the Atlantic Monthly, which is rather striking. Its proprietors published the name of George Augustus Sala in its list of contributors for the present year, whereupon the newspapers set up a bowl of virtuous indignation, and the proprietors withdrew Sala's name from their list; but they have published an article of his in the magazine, without mentioning his name. The laborer Sala is only worthy of his eight or ten dollars a page, and must not have any fame, because he did not look at things political in the right light.

The publishers of the Young Folks' Magazine sold thirty-five thousand copies of the first number, and, of course, it is a decided success. Publishers believe that the best magazine period is at hand, because books are so dear, and will be for a long time. People will not buy them; but as reading must be had, magazines will be sought. America will never again boast of her cheap literature. Taylor's new novel, John Godfrey, sells at two dollars and a quarter, and Mrs. Hosmer's novel, The Morrisons at two dollars. There never was an American novel worth that sum, excepting Hawthorne's. We must import Mudie, and have him start a fast circulating library.

Artemus Ward has hired himself out to another showman for fifteen thousand dollars a year, and he is now on exhibition, with his Panorama thrown in, at Boston. Another celebrity, Dan Bryant, has made himself remarkable, from the fact of having his table on New Year's day served from the Maison Doree, to the tune of a thousand dollars. Minstrelsy pays better than it did in the days of the Troubadours, when young gentlemen went about singing in dirty wash leather.

There were as many fights on the first of January as usual, owing to the spirit of whisky, as well as that of good-fellowship, which is apt to reach before night, or midnight on convivial occasions. The time is coming for another Temperance apostle; whisky-drinking is universal. I have been to no dinner, supper, reception, this season where the whisky bottle was not ready. When the sherry, claret, and champagne courses are over—"coming through the Rye" is begun, and a steady march is kept up, till everybody's head has reached that stage of whizziness which is neither delight nor misery, but approaches both conditions. The pictures of social life which Judd drew in his novel of Margaret in the early New England times, when all classes drank rum habitually—when it poisoned and sapped the moral foundations of society—might be surpassed, if as powerful a genius existed now to draw them.

Several persons are at, or on their way to Richmond to see about the end of the war; they will not find it there probably. The State Convention of Missouri have passed an ordinance for the abolition of slavery in that State. If all the States would attend solely to States' business, provided the Federal Government would allow them to, the difficulty arising from this black business might be adjusted.

E. D. B. S.

"PODGERS'" JOURNAL.

THE DOWN TRIP OF THE "CONSTITUTION."

NUMBER TWO.

ON BOARD P. M. S. S. "CONSTITUTION."

JANUARY 8th is a day to be remembered, and I can vouch for the fact that it was not forgotten on board the Constitution. The Commodore's table seemed to comprise a very patriotic assemblage, and in its arrangement "the love of the beautiful" still pervaded the Old Hero's heart, for on either hand he had managed to seat two of the fairest. Our young bride graced his right, while on his left the lady of one of our Nevada Senators assisted in the honors with the grace and dignity natural to her. The next two ladies, representatives from the Sunny South, were placed opposite two of the most enthusiastic patriots on the ship, Gen. Frisbie and Professor Silliman. This arrangement was probably with a view to counteract the influence of the two ladies, or else to convert them to the good cause; but for once North and South harmonized good homoredly, and peace and good fellowship reigned. Next to Mrs. L. sat Col. Pride, the handsomest man on the ship, except perhaps Gen. Vallejo, who faced him. The Colonel having served with distinction on General Grant's staff for two years, at the siege of Vicksburg and elsewhere, was perhaps the only man that could with safety be placed next to the fascinating Southern widow, for he had faced the enemy before, and proved himself shot proof, although I think if he had ever encountered such direct fire, so pointed and so rapid, he would have fallen early in the action—a real rebel sharpshooter we found before a day was over in the sparkling little widow. Opposite the Commodore at the other end of the table sat Gov. Nye, Major Van Voast and sundry other gentlemen, comprising, as he said, his staff—a goodly company. On the day aforesaid, January 8th, the array of ice and silver-tipped bottles argued that there was an almanac on board, and that it had been consulted.

The ceremonies opened with "the day we celebrate," drank enthusiastically by North and South—from grave to gay—when we rose from the table after having, as the Governor remarked, "done our duty." Everybody adjourned to the upper deck, where a select party took coffee with the Commodore. Whether or not it was the coffee, or the exhilaration of the day and hour, the influence of the bright moon, or patriotism, I do not know, but the party "felt good," and, as Governor Nye remarked, if any man wanted to borrow a thousand that was the time he could come about us near it as ever he could. I felt a little sleepy, and in the midst of the united assertions that they belonged to "Gideon's baud," slipped off to bed. But an hour or two later my blissful dreams were interrupted by the entrance into my room of a procession in single file singing,

"We belong to Gideon's baud, Here's my heart and here's my hand," and all my inquiries of "who's there?" elicited only the reply, "we belong to Gideon's band." Gideon had reason to congratulate himself on the augmented strength of his band, for sundry other recruits were "conscripted," and forced to join whether or no. About 3 A. M. the ceremony of putting Gideon's followers to bed, according to rank, commenced, and was pursued with appropriate honors and music, the first being honored with the song, "Thou art Nigh," then came the aria "Pride must have a fall." It must be confessed that it was a most stubborn specimen, and died hard. The triumphal march pursued its rounds until there were but two left, myself and another sober man, and we tossed to see who should go last. The gentleman from New York, who had made California a flying visit to inspect his quartz interests in Reese River and elsewhere, won the "toss," and was the last of his race. Here let me state that "my head head was level," and although a conscripted member of Gideon's band, I partook not of the ruby wine, and was seriously and properly lighted to bed by the gentleman from New York, who produced a dainty little wax candle from a carpet-bag, which seemed to contain all things most necessary in this life, ornamental and useful. And while on that subject I cannot but congratulate him on the devotion of a fair lady friend who "saw him off" at the steamer, and who again saw him off the Cliff House while we were on the bar. At least I so judged, for despite the excitement of the scene and the surrounding danger, the waves of old Ocean were not more persistent and continued than were those of his handkerchief to the "somebody" who stood upon the porch of the Cliff House. I can bear witness to his maintaining his position till "twilight dews were falling fast," and at dinner I drank to him "long may she wave."

As a good moral character is of great value in these days, on account of its rarity, I deem it my duty to see that justice is done, and so give the Major the benefit of the doubt as to where he was on that "eventful night," by declaring that he did not desert his colors and enlist in Gideon's band, for although the "delegation" pounded oft and loudly at his door, no response came therefrom, and he was either "out" or playing "possum."

The band of Gideon numbered but few performers next morning at breakfast, but there came from their state-rooms subdued voices praying for soda and ice. Cider cocktails seemed to be in high favor. I called on the missing members and then one and all declared that they would have felt first rate if it had not been for that old cheese of the Commodore's. The Commodore did set on some rare old Stilton with brandy in it, but he also set on some brandy without Stilton. They had their choice and they took both, but the Stilton got all the credit; however, Gideon's followers all turned out fresh and sound for dinner, although I noticed they preferred ice-water to any other beverage, and smiled faintly when asked how they felt—evidently martyrs to "the day they celebrated."

We had rather a rough sea and a stiff breeze crossing the Gulf of California. Consequently we did not arrive at Acapulco until 10 o'clock on the evening of the 11th, where poor Doctor McNaughton was buried.

The Doctor had been for a number of years in the service of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and was widely known and highly respected. His health had given way under the constant changing of climate, and on his arrival at San Francisco the last trip of the Constitution he was quite unwell, looking wretchedly when he came on board the morning we sailed. He never should have essayed the trip in his state of health. He seemed considerably excited and nervous while we were on the bar endeavoring to assist the distressed ships; but becoming exhausted he went below to his room, whence he never again came alive. He seemed suddenly to sink; on the 10th it was whispered around the ship that he was dying, and at noon he ceased to breathe. For twelve hours previous he had not his senses, or at least was apparently unconscious, lying in a heavy stupor, and so he continued until he died—gently as a child and without a movement. Every care and attention was shown him, and a skilful physician on board did all that man could do, but in vain. The body was enclosed in a coffin constructed on board, and placed on the pilot-house and covered with the ship's colors.

After the coaling and other business of the ship was completed, about 2 o'clock in the morning, all hands were piped and every employé on board was mustered on the forward deck. The body was then placed on a platform of chairs, the crew were ranked on either side, Commander Watkins and Gen. Vallejo took their places at the head, and, by the lurid glare of burning blue-lights, and in profound silence, the Episcopal funeral service was read by Col. Pride in a deep, sonorous voice. It was a solemn scene; the glare of the blue lights falling upon the faces of the uncovered crowd gathered there, from the swarthy fireman to the delicate lady passenger—the long row of rough sailors and waiters, the light of the moon mingling with the pallid rays of the blue-lights giving an unearthly hue to every face, the old Commodore standing uncovered with the tears streaming down his weather-beaten cheeks. The deep voice of the reader floated upon the still night air;

I never heard the service so beautifully or effectively read—never witnessed a more solemn and affecting funeral; and I doubt if the few natives who happened to see it from their boats, as well as the officers from the deck of the Saragat near at hand, ever looked upon a ceremony with such breathless interest. When it came to that part of the service where the body is consigned to the grave—"earth to earth, dust to dust"—the coffin was lowered over the ship's side into a boat waiting to receive it; and as it was borne away to its temporary resting-place ashore, the steamer's gun boomed over the water, waking a thousand echoes from the neighboring rocks and hills, and dying away in mournful anthems for the one who slept "the long sleep that knows no waking." We shall see him no more on earth. Though he died far away from his home and in a foreign clime, there was not wanting the tender hand to close his eyes, and big hearts that loved him stood by his bedside till the spirit took its flight.

JANUARY 16TH.—This morning, soon after breakfast, the cry of "man overboard!" startled everybody. Mothers rushed for their children, each fearing that the victim might perhaps be one of her own; but it proved to be a fireman, who came up from the fire-room, walked to the guard and sprang into the sea. The alarm was given at once, and within ten seconds the ship was stopped, the engine reversed, and a boat lowered. We saw the man close astern, but before the impetuosity of the ship could be arrested he had of course drifted some distance. The boat hung suspended a foot above the water, with the first officer and crew at their places, all ready to drop and pick up the man the instant we came near him, the steamer backing meanwhile to the locality. With a glass I observed him swimming very well, the sudden plunge having apparently changed his ideas, and he seemed to be doing his best to save himself. Suddenly he sprang with a convulsive effort half out of the water, tossed his arms wildly about, and disappeared amid a foam and commotion in the water that too painfully demonstrated the mode of his death. The sharks had seized and instantly devoured him. It was a horrid sight: a human being just about to be rescued from drowning torn to pieces by the ferocious monsters of the deep that now came crowding about the stern of the ship, greedy for more! The Commodore knew too well the man's fate, and reluctantly gave the order to go ahead. The whole scene occupied but a few moments from the time the alarm was given to its tragical termination; but it was a sight not soon to be forgotten.

JANUARY 17TH.—On every side the busy note of preparation argues that this voyage is near its end. Perspiring faces, red with the exertion of packing valises and closing refractory trunks that refuse to lock, prove it. The Room-Boys are unusually attentive and polite, and "there are signs in the moon and the stars" that we must soon go ashore, which we will do with a feeling of regret, after all, for we have become settled down, as it were, every one to his place, and we hate to move, especially as we know that we go from comfort and luxury to all the discomforts that passengers per North Star are heir to. It would be simply absurd to say anything in praise of any ship of this line, and especially of the Constitution under command of Commodore Watkins. Neatness, such as any housekeeper could learn and pattern from, order and system that make this immense affair run like a clock—everything in its place, and so refreshingly clean.

There is a nice, cool and delicious breeze. The bride and several gentlemen are at the piano singing their farewell songs, and as we lose here our gallant Colonel, who journeys Costa Rica-wards, the song of Don Caesar's seems appropriate:

"Farewell my gallant Colonel,
I told you how 't would be."

Governor Nye is out as fresh as a rose, rejoicing in spotless linen and a smooth face, and at the present writing is making himself agreeable to the lady of the other distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Major Van Voast is helping a young lady pack her trunk. I think, at least, I heard him offer his assistance, which she rather declined, remarking that she did not think he knew the uses and places of feminine toggery. Like little George Washington, he couldn't tell a lie, and therefore had to say he did. I may do him injustice, and he may only be packing his own. Ah! yes, he is! I see him at lunch down at the other end of the cabin!

The children are kicking up such a jolly "row" at the prospect of going ashore, that Babel would be painfully quiet in comparison, and to write is impossible, so I will close these jottings, "to be continued," perhaps, hereafter—from elsewhere generally.

Our last toast at dinner yesterday was: "The Constitution and its Commodore: long may they wave! May the waves never come that could overwhelm them!" PODGERS.

The Denver News publishes a table of distances, from which we see that Austin is 329 miles from Sacramento, 169 miles from Virginia, 384 from Salt Lake, 986 from Denver, 1,636 from Atchison, and 772 miles from Virginia, Montana Territory. Stage fare from Salt Lake to Denver, $175; from Denver to Atchison, $150.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

A NEW style of binding is coming into vogue which excites our admiration. It is now possible to have a library that looks like morocco for a mere fraction of what that expensive style of binding would actually cost. Two books attract our attention this week from the neatness of their exterior, The Morrisons and Autumn Leaves. The first mentioned is by a Californian authoress, Mrs. Margaret Hosmer. It is a story of considerable power, told with creditable skill. The plot can scarcely be called a new one, for both in real life and in romance it has been enacted daily and hourly since the deluge. A handsome dashing young man wins a noble woman's love and after betrothal deserts her to marry a wealthier bride. Of course his life is unhappy; he discovers his mistake when too late, and appears in the dark light of a villain in subsequent pages. His first—or at least his first betrothed—love, was the idol of his mother's heart and the serviceable member of the household. In the end she wins the love of a better and truer man, and marries him. The central characters are well drawn, and were it not for the idea of want of finish which the book somehow conveys we should write it down as an excellent novel. But at times it seems as if the authoress became bewildered in the plot and puzzled as to the denouement, changing her mind in this latter regard after half the chapters were written.

Autumn Leaves, by Samuel Jackson Gardner, contains some passable prose and some not very good poetry. Contributed to a newspaper, almost any one of the articles would stand a good chance of acceptance; but the best of them, as essays, are scarcely worth the pretty binding in which they appear.

Jean Ingelow's Studies for Stories are most appropriately named, for they bear about the same relation to the works of that authoress that the artists' studies do to finished pictures. However, it must be remembered that it makes a deal of difference from whose hand the studies come; for instance, we would prefer to possess simply the suggestion of a picture from the pencil of Bierstad than to be the owner of a room full of landscapes by other artists we could name. A strong vein of sense characterizes Jean Ingelow's works, and notwithstanding the soberness of the present volume it will find readers and admirers among both the young and the old.

"By Mrs. Brigadier-General Egbert L. Vielé" on the brightly-colored cover of a pamphlet book entitled Following the Drum, brings to mind the anecdote of the lady who when her husband was elected corporal in the old militia days discussed the propriety of herself and children associating as familiarly as before with her neighbors, "Because," as she naively asked "are we not all corporals too?" The book is advertised as a novel, but it is not one, in any sense of the word, being simply an account of a lady's life who married a soldier and followed her husband when he was ordered from one post to another—a sort of a private diary, in all probability that of "Mrs. Brigadier-Gen. Egbert L. Vielé" herself, containing nothing either of novelty or adventure, and nothing in fact to warrant its publication.

Young America, a poem by Fitz Greene Halleck, neatly published by the Appletons, were it not for the indication of the authorship on the title-page, would more likely be attributed to one of our latter-day poets than to the author of Fanny and Marco Bozarris. We prefer to base our memories of Halleck on any of his former works in preference to this last one.

Our Young Folks is the title of a new illustrated magazine for youth, lately started by Ticknor & Fields. It was from its pages that the story of "Hum, the Son of Buz" was copied in last week's issue, we inadvertently omitting to give the credit of its authorship to Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. Our New York correspondent informs us that the publication has proven a success from the start, thirty five thousand of the first number being sold. Certainly it deserves to live, for it is the best periodical of the kind that this continent has ever afforded, and we do not know where to look for its equal abroad. It is edited by J. T. Trowbridge, Gail Hamilton, and Lucy Larcom. Among its list of contributors many of the contributors to the Atlantic are remembered, and we are by no means sure that it will not prove a fatal rival to that periodical.

For a copy of The Cottage Cyclopædia of History and Biography, we are indebted to R. J. Trumbull, of 302 Montgomery street, the general agent for the work in this city. In addition to being quite a copious dictionary of memorable persons, events, places and things, it contains notices of the principal countries and nations of the known world and a chronological view of American history. In a convenient and compact form it furnishes a great deal of useful information, and proves its right to the title which the publishers have chosen for it, as the Encyclopædia Britannica could scarcely find room in a cottage, even did its price bring it within the means of the inmates. As a work of reference, the one of which we speak is very valuable, and its binding is both elegant and durable.

DINING—CORPULENCY—LEANNESS.

[For the following article, of absorbing interest to the fat and the lean, we are indebted to Harper's Weekly. A serious subject is seriously treated of, and it would seem easy enough, by simply following the plain directions, for people to increase themselves indefinitely or reduce their dimensions correspondingly. We apprehend that care must be had to follow the proper dietary prescription, for, should a mistake be made, the fat man might find himself "swelling visibly," while the lean are dwindled down to something less than a shadow. Omitting a not very important prelude, we begin where our author defines, so to speak, his position:]

BY obesity we mean that state of fatty congestion when, without the individual being ill, the limbs or members increase gradually in size and lose their primitive form and beauty. There is one sort of obesity which is confined to the stomach. This is seldom found in women. "I myself," says Savarin, "am a sufferer in this respect, yet I have an ankle, instep, and calf as firm as an Arabian horse. Nevertheless, I looked upon my stomach as a most formidable enemy; I conquered it, and reduced it to its proper dimensions." The principal causes of corpulency may be easily stated. The first is the natural conformation of the individual. Every man is born with certain predispositions, which may be traced in his physiognomy. Out of one hundred persons who die of consumption ninety have brown hair, an oval face, and sharp nose. Out of one hundred "corpulents" ninety have a round face, globular eyes, and pug nose. It is therefore beyond a doubt that some persons are predestined to be fat, and that, taking all things equally, their digestive powers produce a greater portion of fat. And here let us cite a few instances of men of weight. M. Laurent notices a Parisian boy who must have frightened his parents a little, for he weighed a hundred and four pounds at four years old. There was a boy at Winton, in Durham, about a century ago, who, at the age of ten years, measured thirteen inches round the thigh, and thirty-three round the waist; he was a queer fellow in other ways, for he had six toes on each foot, and six fingers on one hand. In 1784 died an Irish gentleman, Mr. Lovelace Love, from very fatness. So immense was his bulk that his coffin measured seven feet in length, four in breadth, and three and a half in depth. Mr. Baker, who died at Worcester in 1766, was so large a man that, in the language of the local prints, "his coffin measured seven feet over, and was bigger than an ordinary hearse, and part of the wall was obliged to be taken down to admit its passage." Six years afterward there died at Usk, in Monmouthshire, one Mr. Philip Mason, whose dimensions were recorded as follows: round the wrist, eleven inches; round the upper arm, twenty-one inches; round the chest, sixty inches; round the largest part of the body, seventy-two inches; round the thigh, thirty-seven inches; round the calf of the leg, twenty-five inches. The above instances are wanting in facilities for comparison, on account of the actual weights being, in most cases, unrecorded. We give the following as instances more specifically definite on this point. There was a Kentish farmer and inn-keeper, one Mr. Palmer, who attracted much attention in the early part of the present century by his enormous bulk. He weighed three hundred and fifty pounds. Five ordinary men could be buttoned at one time within his waistcoat. He came to London to see the famous Daniel Lambert. The two men looked at each other. Lambert was vastly the superior of Palmer in bulk, but the latter puffed so much through his fatness that Lambert pitied him, as a man to whom life must have been a burden. Palmer went home much mortified; his claim to notoriety was suddenly eclipsed by a rival, and his vexation hastened his death. A part of his inn had to be taken down to allow room for his coffin to be removed. John Love was so thin and meagre that a physician advised him to eat liberally. The advice was so well taken that John became a gormandizer: his fatness killed him at the age of forty, when he weighed three hundred and sixty-four pounds. Mr. Benjamin Bower, a native of Holt, in Dorsetshire, attained a weight of four hundred and seventy pounds. In 1774 there died in Lincolnshire one Mr. Pell, who weighed five hundred and sixty pounds. He was incased in three coffins, the united weight of which, with himself, exceeded three thousand pounds. Mr. Bright, of Essex, was a person of great notoriety in the early days of the reign of George the Third. He died at the age of thirty. His weight was six hundred and sixteen pounds. Seven men were, on one particular occasion, buttoned up within his waistcoat. When his career was ended, and his body was incased in its monster coffin, not only walls, but staircases, had to be cut through before it could be got out; twelve men drew the low carriage on which the coffin was placed; and "an engine was fixed up on the church," as the local chroniclers narrate, to lower the coffin into the grave. There was an Irishman, Roger Byrne, who died in 1804, whose bulk was so great that his admirers claimed for him the merit of being "several stones heavier than the celebrated Mr. Bright of Essex." It required thirty men to carry to the grave the bier on which his body was laid. Mr. Spooner, a Tamworth man, who was living in 1775, attained a weight of six hundred and eighty pounds. He had long been too heavy to walk, his legs being unable to bear him. He measured four feet three inches across the shoulders. It is recorded of him that "his fatness once saved his life; for, being at Atherstone market, and some difference arising between him and a Jew, the Jew stabbed him in the belly with a pen-knife; but the blade, being short, did not pierce his bowels, or even pass through the fat which defended them." But of men of weight Daniel Lambert was the king. Shortly before his death he attained the unprecedented weight of seven hundred and thirty-nine pounds. His coffin was seventy-six inches long by fifty-two wide, and contained a hundred and twelve square feet of elm. The coffin was regularly built upon axles and wheels; and not only the window, but also the side of a room, had to be taken down to afford a passage for the bulky mass. The wheeled coffin was drawn to St. Martin's church-yard, where a gradual descent was made to the grave by excavating the ground.

The second and principal cause of corpulency consists in the farinaceous substances which man eats at his daily meals. All animals that are fed upon farinaceous food become fat whether they will or not. Man is subject to the same law. Another cause of corpulency is too much sleep, and a want of sufficient exercise. A last cause of corpulency consists in excess in eating and drinking. Corpulency is detrimental to strength, because, while increasing the weight you have to carry, it does not increase the motive power. It is also detrimental because it impedes respiration, which renders impossible any labor which requires a prolonged exertion of muscular strength. Corpulency is detrimental to beauty, as it destroys the harmony of proportions established by nature; it carries with it a distaste for dancing, walking, riding, and an inaptitude for any occupation or amusement requiring a little exertion or skill. It, moreover, leads to apoplexy, dropsy, swelling in the legs, and impairs the health generally. But corpulency is not a malady; it is at most a lamentable result of an inclination to which we give way, and we alone are to blame. When we meet in society a charming little girl, with rosy cheeks and rounded arms, dimpled hands, a nez retroussé, and pretty little feet, instructed by experience, we cast a glance ten years forward, and foresee the ravages of corpulency upon those youthful charms, and sigh upon other evils looming in the future. To cure corpulency the precepts of absolute theory must be adhered to: Discretion in eating; moderation in sleep; exercise on foot or on horseback. It requires a firm will to leave the dinner-table with an appetite. As long as the craving is felt one morsel invokes another with irresistible attraction, and, generally speaking, we eat as long as we are hungry, despite the doctors, and even the example of doctors. To tell a person of embonpoint to get up early in the morning is to break his (or her) heart: they will tell you that it will ruin their health, and render them unfit for any thing during the rest of the day; the ladies will complain that their eyes look heavy; they will all consent to sit up late, but they must have a long snooze in the morning, and thereby is one remedy lost. Propose to a pretty fat girl to ride, she will consent with delight, but on three conditions: she must have a handsome and quiet horse, a well-made habit of the last fashion, and a gay young fellow to ride with. Now these three things are not always to be had, so riding is given up. Walking has many other objections. It is so fatiguing, the mud and the dust are dreadful, and the stones cut the pretty little boots, and that plan is peremptorily abandoned. But in place of this natural course of treatment, sly puss takes to drinking—yes, drinking vinegar. And here we would warn Miss Groat against the great evils resulting from a habitual use of acids. There is no doubt but they will make a person thin; but they destroy freshness, health, even life itself, as the following story of poor Louise too truly shows:

"I had a Platonic friendship for one of the most charming persons I have ever met. Louise — was a lovely girl, and had that classical embonpoint which charms the eye and is the glory of sculptors. Though only a friend, I was not blind to her attractions, and this is perhaps why I observed her so closely. 'Chère amie,' I said to her one evening, 'you are not well; you seem to be thinner.' 'Oh no,' she said, with a smile which partook of melancholy, 'I am very well; and if I am a little thinner I can very well afford it.' 'Afford it!' I said, with wrath; 'you can afford neither to gain nor lose; remain beautiful as you are,' and other phrases pardonable to a young man of twenty. After that conversation I watched her more closely, with an interest not untinted with anxiety; gradually I saw her cheeks fall in, her figure decline. One evening at a ball, after dancing a quadrille, I cross-questioned her, and she reluctantly avowed that, her school friends having laughed at her, and told her that in two years she would be as fat as St. Christopher, she had for more than a month draught a glass of vinegar every morning; she added that she had not told any body of it. I shuddered when I heard her confession; I was aware of the danger she incurred, and next day I informed her mother, who was terribly alarmed, for she doted upon her child. No time was lost. The very best advice was taken. All in vain! The springs of life had been attacked at the source, and when the danger was suspected all hope was gone. Thus for having followed an ignorant advice poor Louise was carried to her grave in her eighteenth year, her last days embittered by the thought that she herself had cut short her existence."

On the subject of reducing corpulence Mr. William Banting has given an instructing and amusing account of his own experience in a letter which he has published. Although not very corpulent, the adipose tissue had collected in those parts of the body which interfered with the circulation, and in the course of one year, by discontinuing a most injudicious and unlimited dietary for one which his medical man had the great judgment to prescribe by weight, he lost his fat and the inconveniences that attend its presence. His weight on the 7th of September, 1862, was 200 pounds; on the 12th of September, 1863, 156—loss of weight, 44 pounds. In addition to which he says that in girth round the waist is reduced 12-1-2 inches, he can tie his shoes, he has more muscular vigor, eats and drinks with a good appetite, sleeps well, and is relieved from all symptoms of acidity, indigestion, and heart-burn, with which he was once tormented. But the diet he pursued is objectionable from several points of view; and in order that our guests, the Groatoxes, may have every advantage to cure themselves of this growing evil, we have placed, as they will perceive, our own bill of fare before them.

DIETARY FOR THE CORPULENT AND THOSE WHO ARE INCLINED TO BE SO.

Corpulent persons should eat in moderate quantity any of the following articles of food:

The lean of Butcher's Meat.
Poultry—Game.
Fish, fresh or salted—Eggs—Toast for ordinary bread—Greens—Cabbage—Watercress—Spinach.

And avoid eating.

Fat or Potted Meats.
Bread—Biscuits—Rice—Arrow-root—Sage—Macaroni—Vermicelli—Puddings and Pastry of all kinds—Custards—Cheese—Butter—Cream.

Sugar in any form.
Potatoes—Parsnips—Turnips—Carrots.
Fruits of all kinds, fresh or preserved.

They may drink.

Tea and Coffee, without sugar or cream.
Acid Wines—Claret—Dry Sherry, schizer, or soda water.
Unsweetened spirits in great moderation.

And avoid drinking

Stout—Porter and Ale of all kinds—Milk—Sweet and Port Wines—Liqueurs—Cocoa and Chocolate.

A few words now to the Lankys.

Leanness is the condition or state of an individual whose muscular flesh, not being sufficiently provided with fat, betrays the forms and angles of his bony conformation. Leanness is not a disadvantage to men. Their strength is not affected by it, and they are even more vigorous. But leanness in the fair sex is a dreadful evil, for with them beauty is more than life, and beauty consists especially in the rounded limb and the graceful curve. The most recherché toilet, the best dress maker in the world, cannot conceal certain "absences," or disguise certain angles; and it has been not wrongly said that every pin which a thin woman takes out, no matter how beautiful she may have appeared, lessens her charms. But women who are born thin and have a good stomach may be fattened like fowls, (the Miss Lankies will please forgive us for this comparison, but it is the mildest we could hit upon;) and should a little more time be requisite, it is because the stomach of a woman is comparatively smaller, and they can not be subjected to a rigorous régime, punctually enforced. Persons destined to be thin are constructed in an elongated shape. They generally have thin hands and feet, skinny legs, not much flesh about the lower part of the body, their ribs visible, an aquiline nose, almond-shaped eyes, a large mouth, pointed chin and brown hair. Such is the general type. Some portions of the body may escape this description, but rarely. Some lean persons have voracious appetites. But every thin woman wishes to be stouter. This is a wish we have heard expressed a thousand times. Now the whole secret for a thin embonpoint lies in a nutshell. It consists in a suitable régime. She must learn how to select and how to eat her food. We shall therefore endeavor to point out the system which ladies ought to follow who wish to become more plump, or, to use the more elegant term, who are desirous of acquiring "the rounded limb and the graceful curve."

GENERAL RULES.

Eat a quantity of fresh bread—the same day's baking—and do not throw away the crumb.

Before eight A. M., when in bed, take a basin of soup, (potage au pain or aux patés), not too much, or, if you prefer it, a cup of good chocolate.

Breakfast in eleven. Fresh eggs, boiled or poached, petits patés, cutlets, or anything else; but eggs are essential. A cup of coffee will not hurt.

After breakfast take a little exercise. Go shopping, or call on a friend, sit and chat, and walk home again.

At dinner, eat as much soup, meat and fish as you like, but do not omit to eat the rice with the fowl, macaroni, sweet pastry, creams, etc.

At dessert, savory biscuits, babas and other farinaceous preparations which contain eggs and sugar.

This diet may seem limited, but is capable of great variation, and comprises the whole animal kingdom.

Drink beer by preference; otherwise Bordeaux, or wine from the south of France.

Avoid acids, except salad, which gladdens the heart. Eat sugar with your fruit, if it admits of it. Do not take baths too cold; breathe the fresh air of the country as often as you can; eat plenty of grapes when in season; do not fatigue yourself by dancing at a ball.

Go to bed at eleven o'clock; on extra nights be in bed by one.

If this system is boldly and exactly adhered to, the failings of nature will soon be supplied; health and beauty will be the result.

Lean persons should be well-clothed, according to the season, and regulated by their feelings; taking care to have their extremities kept warm, and to avoid being chilled.

We now place before our lanky guests a bill of fare for their guidance, and may they feel ever grateful to the All-Wise for his increasing bounties!

DIETARY FOR LEAN PERSONS.

Lean persons may eat

Fresh Butcher's meat, of all kinds, because it contains the largest amount of nourishment.

Game—Poultry.

Fish of all kinds.

Soups, Broths and Beef Tea, thickened with Bread or any farinaceous or vegetable substance.

Eggs—Butter—Cheese—Cream.

Sweetened Jellies—Custards—Blanc-mange, etc.

Ripe Fruits, fresh or preserved.

Sugar, in almost any form—Honey.

Farinaceous Substances, such as bread, biscuits, arrow-root, sago, tapioca, rice, potatoes.

Saccharine Roots, as parsnips, carrots, turnips, beet-root.

Vegetables, as cauliflowers, asparagus, sea-kale.

They should avoid eating

All kinds of salted meats and fish.

Pickles, lemons.

They should not drink

Sour Wines, acids, vinegar.

They may drink

Cocoa, chocolate, coffee, tea, and milk.

Generous Wines, ale, stout, liqueurs.

Cod-liver Oil is a most nutritious substance, and a table-spoonful twice or thrice a day has in numerous cases proved highly beneficial.

But oh, Groatoxes and Lankies! we do not live upon what we eat, but upon what we digest. Digest well, therefore, the words we have spoken, and then to dinner with what appetite you may.

BREWSTER & CO.'S Carriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA, will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE, and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES, and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of Broome street,

The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,
Of No. 372, Broome street,

del7-5m

NEW YORK.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with movable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,

Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets
San Francisco. del7-5m

CALIFORNIA Collegiate Institute, FOR YOUNG LADIES.

64 Silver street, between Second and Third streets.

PRINCIPAL—MISS M. LAMMOND.

ASSISTANTS—Miss M. P. Hastings, Miss De Torrey, Miss H. E. Martin, Mrs. S. A. Gregory.

FRENCH—Mme. Villimere.

SPANISH—Senor A. Vallejo.

MUSIC—Professor E. Hartman, Piano; Mrs. S. A. Gregory, Piano; Professor J. B. Bentler, Vocal.

OIL PAINTING AND DRAWING—Mr. Frederick A. Butman.

DANCING—Mons. Galavotti.

The friends and patrons of this Institution, and those interested in the cause of Education, are cordially invited to visit during the hours of Recitation, from half-past 9 o'clock, A. M. to 3 P. M.

Jan 4-1m

M. LAMMOND, Principal.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
Fine Clothing
—AND—
Gentlemen's
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

GOODWIN & CO., HAVING RECEIVED AT THE LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,

First Premium,

FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES.

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such

Consisting of

Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,
DINING ROOM AND
OFFICE FURNITURE.

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,
No. 528 Washington street
no12

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!

CANTY & WAGNER,

(SUCCESSORS TO J. REGAN.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS.
113 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Between Bush and Sutter, San Francisco.

N. B.—ALL CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.
Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to. de3-3m

PHINEAS BANNING,
FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT
WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

an27

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR
DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

au27

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION

FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND

DRESSING

THE

Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicate dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Fetridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents, San Francisco.

ja25-1f

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere

ja25-1f

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATED Salt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers,
Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, FIFTY CENTS.
Directious and Certificates within.

Prepared by

MRS. A. GRIDLEY,

Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,
AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.
TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,

Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,

ja25-1f

SAN FRANCISCO

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!

DE GRATH'S GENUINE

ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES.

Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Pulpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetters, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,

ja25 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN:

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roseate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,

416 418 Front street,

ja25-1f

San Francisco.

LOCAL ITEMS.

The First Unitarian Church, on Geary street, last Sunday collected for the Protestant Orphan Asylum, $1,017 85.

Edward Riley, a fireman from the U. S. steamer Saginaw, was found dead at the Commercial Lodging House, Sunday. Cause of death unknown.

The Jefferson Park Homestead Association have purchased of J. C. Beideman, for $13,000, a block in Western Addition, bounded by Ellis, O'Farrel, Webster and Buchanan streets.

Dupont street, from Broadway to Green, is being paved and curbed. N. Conniff has contracted to plank Stevenson street, between Fifth and Sixth.

Company F., Capt. Grant, and Company I, Capt. Burton, (Eighth Regiment,) numbering over eighty men each, were organized at the depot on Harrison street, Monday, and mustered into service.

The bridge from the foot of Fourth street across Mission Bay to Kentucky street, on the Potrero, commenced on Monday, will be one mile in length and thirty feet wide; the cost is estimated at $60,000; it is to be completed within sixty days.

Selby & Co. have commenced building a shot-tower at the southeast corner of First and Folsom streets. The frame superstructure will be octagonal, 28 feet in diameter at the base, 10 feet 8 inches at the top, 180 feet in height, surmounted by a cupola.

A fire occurred at the intersection of Market and Sacramento streets, Feb. 4th, destroying over 200 tons of hay belonging to Holmes & Chadbourne, Rider & Somers, and A. P. Jewett & Co., and also burning fatally twelve horses owned by the firms named. Fred. Shauman's restaurant and George Smith's butcher-shop were burned. The aggregate loss is placed at $20,000. Incendiarism is alleged.

At the last meeting of the Society of California Pioneers, W. J. Miller, David Dick, W. L. Bryant, Richard Finley, G. Sawyer, David Bowyer, G. Craig, W. B. Craig, J. W. Bell, D. O. Mills, Robert Vandercook and Morris Shloss were elected members. The deaths of Dr. McNaughton and F. A. Woodworth were announced, and eloquent tributes of respect accorded.

The benefit recently given to the St. Andrew's society, at the Hippodrome, netted $719. The Society has ministered to the wants of the poor of Scottish origin; it maintains a reading-room and library, free of access to members and their friends, at No. 522 Market street, and has established itself with the public as an institution which deserves encouragement.

Wm. A. Groves, who has been dealing in jewelry at 413 Montgomery street, is suspected of having lost one of the most valuable (shall we say costly?) jewels man may possess—honesty. Groves is absent; his shelves are bare, and his safe is empty. His creditors are of opinion that he has gone east on the Golden Age, (which left on Friday last,) and that their silver has adhered to him.

Caroline Lewis, a mulatto woman, on Greenwich near Jones street, met with death in a manner not without many precedents, but none the less shocking, Sunday evening. She laid down, and after reading for some time by a candle, fell asleep; the candle set fire to the curtains and other articles in the room, and when the alarm was raised the poor woman was found suffocated. Caroline had been noted for deeds of charity, and it is said her last act before retiring had been the purchase of bread to be given a poor Spanish neighbor in the morning.

Mrs. S. Siegel, a New York graduate in the school of crime, who has during the past year been very successful in relieving our citizens of spoons, clothing and other articles deemed essential to her comfort, was arrested by officer Rose at her rooms on Market street. When arrested, she had in her possession four trunks filled with articles (evidently borrowed) of every description.

Gen. Sickles did not arrive on Sunday last; it seems he started not for California but for Bogota, whither Government has sent him on official business. There is an approach to a parallel in this case with that of several thousand citizens who did not go to see the General land at the wharf—they merely "had business down that way." The Reception Committee, however, could not deny their mission; they were there, after many days of preparation and nights of sleepless responsibility, to receive a wooden legged hero, and they didn't get so much as a splinter. Who wouldn't be a Committeeman, and "pay all the expenses," and get beautifully sold by a silly telegraphic despatch, just for the honor of the thing? And then, wicked people will laugh, and make horrid puns on the affair, as if it were anybody's business but the Committee's whether embryotic speeches were spoiled and willing lips cheated of welcoming champagne. We extend our sympathies. When Gen. Sickles cannot render farther assistance in crushing the rebellion, we may see him here, but he is not the man to come expressly to receive an ovation while he can be of use to the Government in any capacity.

The movement to widen Kearny street is likely to be successful, and to be attended with but little litigation.

Gen. Mason has been dangerously ill from congestion of the lungs, but is much better; he left for Los Angeles, by advice of physicians, Friday.

Captain Robert Haley's son, aged six years, fell from the second story of the Tehama House to the sidewalk, Thursday afternoon, striking head first. He was very badly hurt, but it is thought his life is not in danger.

Tuesday next will be Valentine's Day, and Appleton—whose advertisement, announcing his various depots for the sale of Valentines, will be found in another column—has made great preparations for the anniversary.

Charles Hanson, four years of age, living on Main between Harrison and Folsom streets, was left alone in the house for a few moments, Wednesday afternoon, and while playing about the fire his clothing ignited, burning him so badly that he died a few hours afterward.

Father Buchard, whose labors in the cause of temperance have rendered his name familiar and agreeable to our citizens generally, is becoming famous as an eloquent speaker and earnest divine; he lectured at St. Ignatius' Church, Thursday evening, for the benefit of the German Church on Sutter street, with a result in receipts which must have materially assisted the congregation referred to.

A splendid six-story brick building will soon be erected on the southeast corner of Third and Market streets, in place of the wooden structures which lately occupied the lot. There seems to be no rest for clapboards in that part of the city. The order is to "move on." Houses on wheels are seen every day on Market street, tending westward.

Forger Shotwell was taken to San Quentin, Friday, the Supreme Court not having been able to detect the error committed by the local authority in adjudging him guilty of a slight indiscretion or forgetfulness in writing a check and drawing a few thousand dollars from Ralston, several months ago.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

Thos. McCann, a Greenhorn-creek (Siskiyou county) grocer, was robbed, lately, of $700.

James Sargent has sold his ranch, five miles from San Juan, (south,) for $150,000. It cost him about $5,000. Petroleum.

The track of the Encinal and Alameda Valley Railroad is nearly finished from the Encinal wharf, opposite San Francisco, to San Leandro.

There is a mining claim in Yuba county, (says the Appeal), with a capital stock of $20,000, which divided at one time $40,000. Rather a healthy claim that!

J. B. Robbins, one of the employes on the new stage road over the Blue Mountains, (Boise River,) was killed recently by a falling tree. His neck was broken.

Recently, in Sierra county, an avalanche of snow buried eleven men and five animals. One of the men, with the animals, was killed.

Tuesday night last, (says the Pajaro Times of the 4th inst.) we were visited by an unusually heavy shower of rain, accompanied by severe thunder and flashes of lightning.

Wilson Flint has applied to the Sacramento County Court for a discharge from his debts and liabilities. Indebtedness $5,974 75; assets $3,759.

The bodies of Edward Rippie and R. L. Slaughter were found in Sierra Valley, a few days since. They had been missing since Nov. 26th, and it is thought perished from cold.

An old miner at Grass Valley, who has been in bad luck for several years, recently sold an interest in a quartz claim which has suddenly become valuable in consequence of discoveries made by him, for $36,000.

New Post Offices have been established at St. Johns, Colusa county, and Longworth, Stanislaus county, Cal.; those at Highland, Lewis county, W. T., and Minerville, Trinity county, Cal., are discontinued.

William Fowler, Sr., who emigrated from Massachusetts to Oregon in 1843, and afterward removed to California, where he has lived for many years, died at Napa on the 3d inst. He was a useful citizen, ready in every good word and work to promote the welfare of the country.

Frank Taylor, the young man who killed Johnson at Saucelito Ranch last week, was discharged by the Grand Jury of Marin county after a full examination, the fact of his having been pursued, assaulted and shot by Johnson before using his own gun on his assailant, being made evident.

Eddy & Co., of French Corral, Nevada county, Cal., recently cleaned up from two weeks' washing of dirt from their hydraulic claims, $32,000. Such items as this bring thousands to California, most of whom find it easier to get "cleaned out" than to clean up anything. Still the chances are here, and every one has a perfect right to seek them. Of course every man can't expect to be struck by lightning.

The Lewiston Golden Age has been discontinued. The material will be removed to Boise City.

Angel alias Hoffman, who a few weeks since attempted to hang himself in jail while awaiting trial on a charge of burglary, and was afterwards sent to Stockton for insanity, recovered in a very short time and has taken passage for Mexico.

Wells, Fargo & Co. received Feb. 6th, the largest amount of bullion ever brought over the mountains in one day. It consisted of fifty-four sacks, weighing three thousand seven hundred and sixty-three pounds, and worth $111,677.

The Shasta Courier of Feb. 4th says: "The Highland Mill holds its grip. The last clean up of a ten days run, resulted in the nice little sum of $3,685 33, and still the lode presents the same beautiful face."

The miners who have been at work for the Wide West Company, at Aurora, recently took forcible possession of the mine for the purpose of paying themselves, from its proceeds, wages due them.

The Union Company, near Nevada, cleared up lately, after a week's run, and took out $8,640 in gold. This is a new lead, according to the Transcript, which has only been worked a few months. It is said to have an inexhaustible supply of the same kind of rock as that crushed.

John H. Gass is said to be in Victoria, practicing law under the name of John H. Gaston. He will be remembered as the person arrested for attempting to defraud ex-Governor Burnett, and who made his escape from the city prison in Sacramento while in confinement on that charge some time in 1863.

Much apprehension is entertained among farmers in Napa Valley, (says the Reporter), that the late severe rains have drowned all the grass planted on low lands which had not germinated at the time of their commencement. A large area of soil has been planted, much of which likely will have to be re-sown.

Mason and Henry, the notorious highwaymen (says the Monterey Gazette), are again at work. Some days since the sheep camp of Harmerhouse, near the Panoche mines, was burned to the ground. Mason had sworn he would kill Harmerhouse before leaving for the Confederacy, but failing to find his man he has taken his revenge on his property. A detachment of twelve men from Major O'Brien's command at San Juan, hunted the villains five days without success.

The Stockton Record states that the rise in the San Joaquin has had the effect to make wood plentiful in that city. We trust the advantage will not stop there. In this town a man has no sight for his pile at less than about two bits per stick, and frequently cannot see it at all. We seldom encroach upon the province of the professional punster, but in this instance may be pardoned for being a little facetious.

The Jacksonville (Oregon) Sentinel of recent date says: "From every mining camp in Southern Oregon comes cheering, golden news. Water is abundant, and all hands are at work. Take the mines in the aggregate, and they will yield, this winter, at least $5 per day to the man. There are at the present time, exclusive of Chinamen and Kanakas, from 500 to 800 men employed in the mines of this county; there are probably 1,000 Chinamen at work."

The Washoe Times says that according to the terms of the Nevada Specific Contract Law, it is only necessary for merchants to have "signs" posted conspicuously, notifying customers that coin only will be received in payment for goods. We will not mar the article in the Times by omitting the concluding sentence: "Business men desiring such signs can procure them at this office, neatly printed on very fine card paper, for a very trifling sum; every merchant should get one of these signs, and insure himself against loss by being paid in a depreciated currency." There is little difference between the Specific Contract Laws of California and Nevada, but modesty forbids a reference to THE CALIFORNIAN's job-printing facilities, low prices, etc.

A Chinaman killed himself, recently, at Whisky Diggings, Placer county, to escape the oppression to which he had been subject at the hands of a white rascal who has been extorting money from the Chinese in that locality under threats of murder in case of non-compliance with his demands. John's method of "escaping" was most effectual, but as regards getting even with his oppressor, he would perhaps have done better to have stood his ground: Celestial ways are indeed queer ones.

Mrs. Boot died suddenly Tuesday evening, apparently without anything being the matter, says the Washoe Times of the 5th inst., and many of her friends queried whether or not she was really dead. All day Wednesday portions of her body were comparatively warm, and on holding a looking-glass over her mouth signs of respiration could be seen. She was buried on Thursday afternoon. This lady has frequently remarked to a friend in Washoe City that she was afraid she would some day be buried alive. It seems that when quite young she was at one time supposed to be dead, and remained in a state of trance two days.

BOOK-KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete BUSINESS EDUCATION, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4-3m

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-nathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
645 Washington st., San Francisco.

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charriere of Paris, Surgical Mechanist of the French Bencvolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

Bigelow & Bro., Agents,
Over Parrott's Bank.

PRINTING! PRINTING!!

DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,
Between Sansome and Montgomery, - - San Francisco

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city.

fe4-1f

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
337 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
de31 3m

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,
IMPORTERS OF
STOVES AND METALS,
Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,
SAN FRANCISCO.
jy2

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S
PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Miaturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit.

Stephen Cuiverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shifts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintu, builder; Philip Caduc, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN,
No. 28 Third street, San Francisco,
Who will give all information about them. de17-3m

ATKINS MASSEY,
UNDERTAKER,
(At the Old Stand.)
No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,
First house below Kearny street.
Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases. Office of the City
de3-1f and County Coroner.

NATHANIEL GRAY,
UNDERTAKER,
CITY AND COUNTY SEXTON,
641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,
Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC
BURIAL CASES AND CASKETS.
de17-3m

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFFERED by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRETIEN PFISTER,
oc15-1f No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;
JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;
STEAMBOAT GIN;
OLD TOM GIN;
IRISH WHISKY,
from Bond direct.

For sale by V. SQRZA,
ja28-1f 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

P. J. WHITE & CO.,

SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN..

BUTTER, LARD, HAMS, BACON, PORK,
SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,

And a general assortment of

GROCERIES,

Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Battery, San Francisco.
Your trade is respectfully solicited. de10-1f

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.
Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my25 F. MCCOPPIN, Superintendent.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. y2

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, and JOHN COLLNER.

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN," Office, No. 328 Montgomery street, SAN FRANCISCO.

THESE PLASTERS have the compactness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove. They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly hump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms. For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALCOCK & CO.,

"Brundeth Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

San Francisco.

Sold by all Druggists. de17 3m

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

401 Battery, cor. Clay,
ja25-1f San Francisco.

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other malpractices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
401 Battery, corner Clay,
ja25-1f San Francisco.

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGURY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents for the Pacific Coast,
401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,
San Francisco.

Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-1f

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.
PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my25

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING

HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

CALIFORNIA

Home Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Deering, A. B. McCreery, C. Duisenberg, C. J. Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heyemann, R. G. Sneath, C. F. MacDermot, J. C. Wilmerding, Levi Steveson, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Thibault, S. Hemenway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.

B. F. LOWE, President.

JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5 3m

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs. Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent. no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $750,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $600,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Kelly & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
206 Front street, corner of California.

LOCKE & MONTAGUE, IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,
Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

jy2

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE,
San Francisco.EUGENE KELLY,
New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,

NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON,
BANK OF IRELAND.

London.
jy2

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern my25

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purgative of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal Office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S
no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in any style, or on any basis desired—Gold, Platinum, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anæsthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House ball door. de10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL!

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. de3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. juf8

CARPETS.

We have just received and are now opening
NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF WILTON

—AND—

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets.
no12

RUPTURE.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club-feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street,
Between Montgomery and Kearny.
Manufactory, 232 Sutter street. de3

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,
SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO., Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office.)

SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz.: Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols, Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballards, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. juf-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, ETC.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

WILSON & EVANS,
No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco,
And 122 J street, Sacramento.

de3 3m

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 17

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my23 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

ALTA MILLS,

STEVENSON STREET,

Near first street, SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large: Hominy, Small: Oatmeal, Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order.
de17 3m

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of FEBRUARY, 1865:

FEBRUARY 13, CONSTITUTION

FEBRUARY 21, SACRAMENTO

From Folson-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,

Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

OPPOSITION STEAMER-DAY,

FEBRUARY 13th!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK!

VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE!!!

THROUGH IN 21 DAYS!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. H. BLETHEN, Commander,

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13TH

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely,

Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid

Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 Tons, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit of the Isthmus is a pleasant trip. Meals furnished free by the Company while crossing. A baggage-master will be sent through by each steamer. Insurance on Treasure at the lowest rates.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,
Up stairs, San Francisco.

ja21

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5-1f

J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY, Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.
jn25

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff: vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Tut. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By G. C. LITCHER, Deputy Clerk.
Chas. McC. Delany, Plaintiff's Attorney. de24 3m

THE GREAT SEWING MACHINE
WAR!

THE FIRST GUN!

(October 5th, 1864.)

AHEAD, AS USUAL!

TWO FIRST PREMIUMS

AWARDED TO

GROVER & BAKER,

AT THE

Oregon State Fair,

JUST CLOSED AT SALEM,

FOR THE BEST SEWING MACHINES

—AND—

BEST MACHINE WORK!

OVER THE

Wheeler & Wilson,

FLORENCE,

And all other Machines on Exhibition!

(October 6.)

The Florence Sewing Machine

—AND—

Work done on the FLORENCE have taken all the First Premiums awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine work at the Fairs of California in 1864.

Read the report of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the great Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute:

THE FLORENCE.—We have given this new Sewing Machine a careful and minute examination. Its simple and finished mechanical construction, and the obvious adaptability of each part to its work, has been to us an interesting study. It differs essentially from other Sewing Machines, having many new and peculiar features. It makes four kinds of stitch, each alike on both sides of the fabric, has a reversible feed motion, and sews any thickness of goods without change of tension. We consider the "FLORENCE" a decided improvement in sewing mechanism.

COMMITTEE.

S. O. BRIGHAM, Pioneer Sewing Machine Agent on the Pacific Coast, and five years San Francisco agent for the Grover & Baker Machine.

O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California.

A. F. HITCHCOCK, Practical Machinist, eleven years in the employ of the Grover & Baker Co., the past five years as adjuster in their San Francisco office.

MRS C. M. BLAIN.
MRS A. J. TURNER,
MRS H. ROSEKRAUS.

(October 10.)

AN UNMITIGATED HUMBUG!

The Agent of a certain Sewing Machine evidently intends, by humbug and deception, to foist his wares upon the public, instead of endeavoring by the merit of the article (if it possesses any) to attain an honorable position among those so well and favorably known. He advertises thus:

"The FLORENCE Machine, and work done on the FLORENCE, have taken ALL THE FIRST PREMIUMS awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine Work at the Fairs of California in 1864."

That the ambiguity of the insinuation contained above may deceive no one, we would say that ALL the Fairs in California in 1864, at which ANY premium has been awarded, is ONE—the Mechanics', just closed, whose official Report reads thus:

"Sewing Machines—Premium to the Florence, no competition. This is the OVERWHELMING success which has attended the FLORENCE Machine at ALL the Fairs in California in 1864."

And again the Report reads thus:

"Machine Sewing.—Premium to Mrs. Nancy Barton."

As the FLORENCE Machine claims the first premium on Machine Work, and we do not "see it in that light," we publish the following from Mrs. Barton:

SAN FRANCISCO, October 7th, 1864.

The Machine Sewing for which I received the First Premium at the Mechanics' Institute Fair was executed on the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE, which style I have had in constant use for five or six years, and consider superior to all others.

MRS. NANCY BARTON.

So the FLORENCE Machine, with NO COMPETITION, did obtain a Premium on the Machine, and DID NOT obtain ANY Premium on Machine Work as claimed. Even the "Card" published as a COMMITTEE REPORT loses in a slight degree its importance, as follows:

Extract from the signatures on "Committee Report," published by the FLORENCE Agent.

"O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more SEWING MACHINE Committees than any other person in California."

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

Mr. Wheeler writes thus:

"* * * A gentleman called at my office at a time when I was exceedingly busy, and asked me to append my name to a report which he held in his hand on Sewing Machines, then exhibiting at the 'Industrial Fair of the Mechanics' Institute' in this city. I said, 'I have no knowledge of being on a Committee, and have made no examination.' He informed me that as the FLORENCE was the only Machine on exhibition, and had no competition, an examination was unnecessary. I then wrote my name and he left."

I WOULD NOT have served on a Committee or signed any report had there been any competition, for the reason that my family have used the GROVER & BAKER Machine for several years, and would be unwilling to change it for any other.

I do not remember having ever served on a Committee or signed a report on Sewing Machines before. The statement that I have "served on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California" is therefore untrue and wholly unauthorized. O. C. WHEELER.

San Francisco, October 7th, 1864.

Thus the advertisement of the FLORENCE agent from first to last, is a humbug, and nothing else.

The only Fair on the Pacific Coast where the FLORENCE Machine has been exhibited in competition for a Premium against others was at the Oregon State Fair, in September, where it was essentially defeated, and two First Premiums awarded GROVER & BAKER for best Sewing Machine and Machine Sewing.

R. G. BROWN, Agent,
329 Montgomery street.

(October 19.)

REPLY TO

THE UNMITIGATED HUMBUG!

CARD OF R. G. BROWN.

A new Sewing Machine, recently introduced on this Coast, having taken all the honors awarded to Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work by the Fairs of California in 1864, an agent for one of the old established Machines, evidently worried, endeavors by ridicule and the charge of humbug to hide from the eyes of the public the magnitude of the victories achieved by this new comer.

The FLORENCE and the Work done on the FLORENCE, have taken five First Premiums instead of one, as would be inferred from the statement of the agent of the Grover & Baker Machine, and no greater triumph could be desired for the FLORENCE than the fact that it had "no competition" at a Fair like the Grand Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute just closed, held, too, in San Francisco, where nearly every description of Sewing Machine in the known world is represented.

If Mrs. Nancy Barton intends in her note to claim the Premium on Machine Sewing at the late Mechanics' Fair, she has made a great mistake, as the Premium was awarded to work done on the FLORENCE.

The "Sun Bonnet" on which she took a Premium was classed with Fancy Needlework, and was not examined by the Committee on Sewing Machine Work.

From Mr. O. C. Wheeler's statement some have incorrectly inferred that his signature was obtained by some party interested in or connected with the FLORENCE. The Committee were chosen in the usual manner, and we supposed Mr. Wheeler, as one of them, did his duty properly. If his time would not admit of this, it would have been more satisfactory to all concerned had he declined to serve.

From the above, which we are prepared to substantiate to the letter, it will be seen that the FLORENCE advertisement, which the Grover & Baker agent calls an unmitigated humbug was true in every particular, excepting the statement that Mr. Wheeler had been on other Sewing Machine Committees. His connection with the State Fairs as Secretary making it necessary for him to have much to do with Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Committee reports, led to this very natural mistake; while the notice of the Grover & Baker agent, to which he gives so appropriate and ambiguously worded "Cards" that are liable to be misconstrued.

SAMUEL HILL,
General Agent Florence Sewing Machines,
111 Montgomery Street, S. F.

(October 22.)

THOSE

SEWING MACHINE PREMIUMS

AGAIN!

The "Reply" of the Agent of the FLORENCE Machine is fluent with such aspiring words as "Triumphs," "Victories," "Honors," and the like, which, as applied to any events in the history of that Machine, are simply ridiculous.

The "magnitude" of the "victories" attained by the FLORENCE is apparent to none but himself.

Show them up, Mr. Hill; give the public an opportunity of realizing the vastness of "all the honors" conferred in so lavish a manner.

Show them if you can, and name any premium your Machine has ever received at any Fair over any first, second, or third-class machine in existence! Perhaps it was an "honor" to exhibit against the GROVER & BAKER Machine at the Oregon State Fair, just closed, where Two First Premiums were awarded the GROVER & BAKER over the Florence. Will Mr. Hill name any first premium his Machine has ever received for Sewing Machine work in competition with others?

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

The unequivocal "triumph" of the Florence Machine at the Mechanics' Institute Fair, and its single specimen of sewing at the Stockton Fair—without competition in either case—is certainly tremendous.

"A contented mind is a continual feast." As you say you desire no greater triumph for the Florence than the fact that it had no competition at the Mechanics' Fair, allow us to congratulate you on so readily attaining your desires. All the honors of this bloodless "Victory" undoubtedly are yours, and, as we do not deny it, we trust your laurels may rest easily on your triumphant brow.

Your complete satisfaction in such a result, where there was no competition, and by the rules of the Society the Exhibitors were allowed to select their own Committees, will be more fully appreciated by a sympathizing public in consideration of the immense risk and great danger in which you stood of being defeated (!) by your selected Committee of interested friends and owners of the Florence Machine. Advertise your single-handed "Victories," proclaim your undivided "Honors"—make much of your one-sided "Triumphs," unequalled in their overwhelming (!) "magnitude," but until you can strengthen them by a conquest over some third, second, or first-class Machine, they will be but as sound and fury—signifying nothing.

The Grover & Baker is the only First Premium Sewing Machine, having received every First Premium awarded any Sewing Machines when in competition, in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864.

R. G. BROWN, Agent,
329 Montgomery street.

(December 28.)

THE GREAT

SEWING MACHINE WAR!

A SLIGHT MISTAKE

ABOUT

THE PREMIUM

—AT THE—

Oregon State Fair!

THE COMMITTEE DECIDE

—IN—

Favor of the Florence!

COMPLETING

THE TRIUMPH OF THIS NEW MACHINE!

IT HAVING TAKEN

EACH AND EVERY

FIRST PREMIUM

AWARDED TO,

FAMILY

SEWING MACHINES!

—AT THE—

FAIRS

HELD ON THE PACIFIC COAST

In 1864.

READ THE FOLLOWING:

Having heard to-day for the first time that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company claim

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

the First Premium on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at the Oregon State Fair, held in Salem, September, 1864, and being one of the Committee on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at said Fair, I feel it my duty to make, and take pleasure in making the following statement:

Three (if not all) of the Committee were selected by a Mr. Johnson, (an employe of the Grover & Baker Company,) and after a careful examination of the Sewing Machines and Machine Work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was finally decided and agreed by the Committee, to award the First Premium to the FLORENCE Machine as the best Machine for doing all grades of work, and a Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the Committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the Committee and their final decision.

MARY A. HOWE.

STATE OF OREGON,
County of Multnomah, } ss.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, Mary A. Howe, who, being first duly sworn, says the above statement is true, as she verily believes.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, this 4th day of November, 1864.
(Notarial Seal.) J. N. DOLPH,
Notary Public, Multnomah County, Oregon.

STATE OF OREGON,
County of Linn, } ss.

I have read the above statement, (I being one of the Committee mentioned,) and the same is true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

EMILY C. GRIFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of December, 1864.

JAMES ELKINS,
County Clerk, Linn County, Oregon.

I was one of the five ladies comprising the Committee for the examination of Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and am the party referred to above as having been called away before signing our Report. I hereby say that the above statements are true as to the decision of the Committee.

MARY MILLER.

Albany, Oregon, December 13th, 1864.

Copy of the Bogus Report which was fraudulently substituted in the place of the Real Decision of the Committee, and which they signed without reading:

SEPTEMBER 29th, 1864.

We, the undersigned, a Committee appointed at the Fourth Annual Fair of the Oregon State Agricultural Society to examine and report upon the merits of different Sewing Machines on exhibition, have endeavored to perform the duty with care and impartiality. In view of all the facts, we have decided to award the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second to the Florence. The principal fact influencing our decision in awarding the First Premium to the former, was the circumstance that it embroidered, while the other does not. We have, however, no hesitancy in saying that both have great merits, and we recommend them both to the patronage of the Oregon public.

MARY S. SMITH,
MARY A. HOWE,
EMILY C. GRIFFIN,
MARY ANN S. KNOX.

Committee.

The FLORENCE Machines are for sale by

L. L. Polhemus.....190 J street, Sacramento
Geo. Vincent.....Stockton
F. Terstege & Co.....Marysville
T. Fogg.....Oroville
J. R. Cleaves.....Placerville
R. B. Handy.....Yreka
P. Reichling & Sehlund.....Mokelumne Hill
Mrs C. Grove.....Santa Cruz
Henry Jackson.....Watsonville
Geo. Gillis.....Carson City, Nevada
J. L. Parrish & Co.....Portland, Oregon
N. O. Parrish.....Salem, Or.
Mrs. C. Monell.....Dulles, Or.
M. Wollheim.....Gnaysmas, Mex

SAMUEL HILL, General Agent,
Jal4-1m No. 111 Montgomery street, San Francisco

HOW DID HE DO IT?

When we see a man building a large block of stores who we knew but a few years ago was working with his hands only, the question naturally comes up, How did he do it? So, when we see a man like D. E. APPLETON running four stores chock full of Goods, and not only full of goods but full of customers, when, but a few years ago, he had a little bit of a place on Montgomery street, hardly big enough to swing a cat round by the tail, we cannot help asking, How did he do it?

We saw him once, not big nor strong,
But bound to work himself along;
Now he's a giant in his might,
And means the world shall see his light.

The story is very simple: he has stuck to it, always had the best stock—everybody knows that!

As John met Richard on the street
On Valentine's Day, both very neat,
And bound to give their ladies fair
A Valentine treat, both rich and rare.

Says John, "Now, Dick, where shall we go?
All through this city, to and fro!"
"Oh, no," says Dick, "there's only one—
I'm bound to buy of APPLETON."

His stores can be found at 508 Montgomery, 620 Market, Stockton near Washington, and south-east corner of Third and Mission streets. fell-1f

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

CREATE A HEALTHY APPETITE!

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Cure Dyspepsia, Diarrhoea and Constipation.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Invigorate the System and enliven the mind.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Overcome the effects of Drunkenness and Late Hours.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Cure all Diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Are Palatable to the Taste.

They are the

BEST BITTERS IN THE MARKET.

And when once used will always be called for again.

They are made in the most careful manner
From Pure Old Wheat Whisky, Medicated from
Roots and Herbs
Especially adapted for the cure of all Stomachic Diseases
and Liver Complaints.

Try Them and You will be Satisfied.

For sale everywhere by Druggists and Liquor Dealers,
or by

N. B. JACOBS & CO.,
423 Front street,
San Francisco.

fell 6m

VANDALL, CARR & CO.,
BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,
NO. 410 CLAY STREET,
(North side, between Sansome and Battery.

Particular attention paid to the printing of Briefs
and Records. fell-1f

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES,
adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY
& VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of
SUPERIOR CARRIAGES, ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

jal5 316 California street, San Francisco.

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of

GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

S. W. H. WARD & SON,

NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
387 Broadway. } San Francisco, Cal.
de31-3m

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

MISS MATILDA HERON,

Supported by

THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, February 11th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

The Farce of

THE LITTLE SENTINEL,

And a Musical Melange by

The Eureka Minstrel Troupe.

This Saturday Evening, February 11th, 1865.

Will be presented the tragedy of F A Z I O.

MATILDA HERON, as Bianca

In active preparation: GAMEA.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Pine street, below Montgomery.

THOMAS MAGUIRE, - Proprietor.
LEW RATTNER, - Manager.
C. F. SHATTUCK, - Musical Director.
J. L. SCHMIDT, - Leader of Orchestra.

G R E A T

COMBINATION OF MUSICAL TALENT,

BY THE STAR TROUPE OF

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

D. S. WAMBOLD,

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
P. B. Isaacs, W. Bernard,
Lew Rattner, Mons. Charles,
C. F. Shattuck, M. Lewis,
Sig Pinto, S. Wasburg,
W. Sheppard, Tommy Peel,
Frank Medina, H. Grob,

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL

Sacred Concert!

Every Sunday Evening, by the Troupe,

Messrs W J Hill, John Gregg, J. Schlotte, and

50 INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Dress Circle and Parquet, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 25
cents extra; Private Boxes, $5.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock,
precisely.

Saturday afternoon performances by the Minstrels, at
the Opera House.

THE CALIFORNIA ART UNION,

OVER THE STORE OF

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,
No. 312 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Is Now Open,

And will continue to receive Visitors DAILY from 10 A M
until 10 P M.

Terms of membership - Five Dollars
Single Admission - Twenty-five cents

Annual Subscriptions, Five Dollars, which entitles the subscriber to free admission to the Gallery; also, to an Engraving or Photograph of some Picture in the exhibition and a chance in the distribution of the property of the Association at the close of the season, according to the plan of the various Art Unions of Europe and the Atlantic States. ja28-1f

CATHOLIC GIFTS,

IN GREAT VARIETY!

Consisting of—

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,

STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,

MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES!

And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

For sale by

MICHAEL FLOOD,

Catholic Bookseller,

de17-1f No. 428 Kearny street, San Francisco.

THE REASON WHY

EVERYBODY USES

THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED

ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,
OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.

Second—It is more effectual.

Third—It saves labor.

Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white
and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally.
Manufactory, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco. ja7-3m

WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY.

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander H. H. M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Bountrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH
W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass., and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of
"J. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WIS-TAR, M. D."

WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY

Is for sale by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,

San Francisco.

And by all Druggists.

ja23-1m

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PIC-
TURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, Etc.

Especial attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDS

ENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

ja23-1f

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,

ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,

No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below
California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKY.

Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge.

fe4-3m

I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY!

MARY'S VALENTINE.

Bright flowers shall bloom wherever we rove,
A voice divine shall talk in each stream,
The stars shall look like worlds of love,
And this earth be all one beautiful dream,
In our eyes—if thou'lt be mine.

KATY'S VALENTINE.

Among the many fair and bright,
My fancy early singled thee;
Then bend on me thine eyes of light,
And all my love shall flow to thee.

MAGGIE'S VALENTINE.

Yes, I'm happy while fate leaves me
One kind heart to warmly prize,
While the light of pure affection
Beams within thy gentle eyes.

ALLIE'S VALENTINE.

May'et thou live in joy forever!
Nought from thee true pleasure sever;
From thy heart arise no sigh,
And no tear bedew thine eye;
Joys be mine, cures be few,
Smooth the path thou shalt pursue;
And Heaven's richest blessings shine,
Ever on both thee and thine.

NETTIE'S VALENTINE.

Oh, speak not of daisies or rosebuds of Spring
Or bright pearly dewdrops, or any such thing,
For thy worth and virtues much more do combine,
And gladly I'd take thee for my Valentine.

VALENTINES in extra fine French Boxes—also in solid Rosewood and Mahogany cases. Sold with or without Jewelry.

VALENTINES of every conceivable variety—
Valentine Cards, Valentine Mottoes.

SEVENTEEN new and original California
Comics, ye Copperheads, etc.

NEW CALIFORNIA VALENTINE WRITER,
and other kinds, comic and sentimental.

APPLETON'S VALENTINE EXPRESS—with Eight Horses, will deliver Valentines every hour on Valentine's Day in every part of the City.

D. E. APPLETON & CO.,

508 Montgomery street, and

620 Market street,

Opposite the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum.
Jan 14-41

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.

A. Roman & Co.,

TAKE PLEASURE in announcing the following
list of NEW BOOKS just received from the East:

Enoch Arden. 1 vol. small quarto, elegantly illustrated.
Blue and Gold edition.

Clever Stories of many Lands, by John G. Saxe. 1 vol.
4to, illustrated.

The Queens of Song. Being memoirs of the most celebrated female vocalists. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portraits. All lovers of the Opera will be delighted with this charming volume.

The Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, with a memoir.
2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, tinted paper.

Doran's Complete Works. 9 vols., cloth and half Turkey,
with the "Annals of the Stage."

Arctic Researches and Life Among the Esquimaux, by Charles F. Hall. 1 vol. 8vo, illustrated. Ranks next to that of Dr. Kane.

Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. 1 vol. 12mo.
The latest contribution to the great Theological Controversy in England.

John Godfrey's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor. 1 vol. 12mo.
An absorbing story of American life.

Golden Leaves from the American Poets. 1 vol. 16mo., velum and morocco. A tasteful selection from our most popular Poets.

The Gentle Life. 1 vol. 16mo. An elegant series of Essays on the Formation of Character.

Following the Flag, by "Carleton." A fascinating juvenile.

Eliana, by Charles Lamb. 1 vol. 12mo. Being the heretofore uncollected writings of "Elia."

Autumn Holidays in the Country, by the "Country Parson." 1 vol. 12mo.

The Queen of the County, by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids. 1 vol. 12mo.

A New Atmosphere, by Gail Hamilton. 1 vol. 12mo.

Looking Towards Sunset, by L. M. Child. 1 vol. 4to.

Love and Duty. 1 vol. 12mo.

Lost Love. 1 vol. 12mo.

Margaret Denzil's History. 1 vol. paper.

Bohemians of London. 1 vol. 12mo.

Autobiography of Gen. Scott. 2 vols. 12mo.

Woodcliff, by Harriet B. McKever. 1 vol. 12mo.

Hymns of the Ages. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

Old Merchants of New York. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

In addition to the above we have a large list of other
NEW BOOKS, together with a complete stock in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

All are cordially invited to call and examine.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

ja23-1m

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER
AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II., No. 12.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 18, 1865.

TERMS $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

Things—by "Inigo,"
A Plea for a Cotemporary.
The Wer-Wolf.
Napoleon's Three Warnings.
A Modern Romance of Real Life.

ONLY A CLOD—Miss Braddon's New Novel, Chapter XVI.

EDITORIALS:

Gen. McDowell and his Record.
The Wires Working.
Paragraphs on Minor Topics.

CITY AND INTERIOR ITEMS:

The News at Home and Abroad in Brief.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

The Song and the Sea—By C. W. Stoddard.
No Baby in the House—By Clara Clyde.
Lines for Music.
Sonnet to Miss Heron.
"I have always Covered Mother."
The Unseen Battlefield.

NEW BOOKS:

Notices of New Publications.

DRAMATIC MENTION:

The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, February 18th, 1865.

THE clouds that have hung so heavily over head during the week are breaking away as I write, and the golden sun looks through them with a complexion decidedly improved by the veil he has worn of late.

Some one remarks that were it not for clouds we would never know when it is sunshine. The same idea is rendered, though in a different way, by the proverb which tells us that a monkey never knows the value of his tail until he loses it. And the relation between the monkey and his tail applies with great aptness to young ladies and their lovers. For the young lady like the monkey becomes so accustomed to having something to wag and swing by and brush off flies with, that she fails to appreciate the convenience or bless it in her dreams until she some day makes an effort to wag and finds the appendage gone—then she would give her ears to have it back again.

As a friend of mine is accustomed to remark in his moments of philosophic and contemplative inebriation, "Human nature is full of inconsistencies!"

It is an incontestable fact that the more you do for people the more you are expected to do, and that you become estimated and valued not for past kindnesses but for prospective usefulness. This may seem like rather a cynical conclusion, but it suggested itself to me as a rational one some years ago and all my experience in life since has gone to confirm it. I have an idea that there isn't a bald-headed young man at the clubs or about town who would not put his willing signature to that opinion of mine saying—I concur.

It has several times been my fortune to do kindnesses to people, almost strangers to me and to whom I was under no obligations, and in the end they proved very much like that Old Man of the Sea whom Sinbad took upon his back and carried across a brook in kindness, to be nearly ridden to death and find it impossible to persuade his burden to dismount.

Very frequently I have gone out from my way to do a kindness which perhaps surprised the recipient and certainly surprised myself, for I am neither tender-hearted nor good-natured habitually, though subject to moments of weakness. Having volunteered on several occasions to do something which involved sacrifice on my part, and continued it for the self-discipline it brought after the pleasure of surprise and the novelty of doing a good deed vanished and the thing became irksome to me—as all duties are—I have had further requests or rather demands made of me, a compliance with which would not only involve an utter sacrifice of my own convenience, and possibly reputation, but a compromising of others as well; nevertheless, let me set forth the reasons for my non-compliance as plainly and as forcibly as I might, it invariably turned out that my refusal made a bitter enemy for me from that time forward.

I suppose the "tablet of the heart" so much talked about is a kind of a slate, upon which kindnesses are written down in pencilmarks, that the first dampening obliterates, while the record of that dampening and all future impressions of hate towards you are written down with a graver's steel in characters which neither time nor tears can efface.

By a transposition of that scriptural inculcation which teaches you when a man asks you for your coat to give him your cloak also, the majority of men if you give them your coat unsolicited will ask you in the next breath for your cloak and feel highly indignant if you hesitate in stepping out of it, though it be raining at the time.

Selfish as it may appear, if I had to go through life again and aimed at success in it, I do not know but that I'd make it a rule to do kindnesses only to those who had some palpable claims upon me and never volunteer to appear as "an angel in disguise" except to those who had the power and had manifested an intention to pay me back ten-fold. For I really do not think it would be safe for an angel to visit most cottages, even bearing "healing on his wings," for the rheumatic would spring from their beds as soon as they were able, and pluck the visitant, even to his tail-feathers, leaving him to fly out of the window as best he might, bare as a badger.

I remember an instance when I found a literary man lying on what was supposed to be his death-bed, without money and seemingly without friends. The doctor, who through charity attended him, thought he might not live until morning, and no one could be found to sit up and watch with him. The man was an utter stranger to me, but the experiment of doing one good and unselfish thing suggested itself to me as so well worth trying that I sat the night through in the close, sick chamber, playing the part of a Sister of Charity or a Brother of Benevolence, or, more probably of a Bull in a China Shop, for I scarcely think I was cut out for a nurse. If cut out for a nurse at all, it certainly was for a very dry one.

To become voluntarily the slave of a sick man's whims, scolded at and ordered about from one end of the chamber to the other, besides breathing the air which I there encountered, is scarcely an experiment I shall undertake again so long as I have a broad piece in my pocket to buy a substitute, or, failing that, enough strength in my legs to carry me out of temptation's way. The next morning my nerves were scarcely in a condition for the performance of my regular day's work, let alone the imposition of any extra task. But I had heard of a proverb about never turning back from the plough and all that, and so started out and raised a subscription among my personal friends to make the sick man comfortable; paid his bill at a hotel where his baggage had been left in pledge, took his watch out of pawn, for he said it was company for him, and, with the good Doctor who was attending him gratuitously, made arrangements for his admission as a paying patient to an excellent hospital—to which he obstinately refused to go. In the meanwhile he, lying on the verge of the grave and expected to drop into it every moment, had ordered a pair of beaver fur gauntlets and beaver-boots, of a cost which would more than exhaust the money remaining and leave nothing for the purchase of medicines and lodgings. On consultation, the Doctor and myself thought it best not to disturb on that occasion, and the consequence was one of the most abusive letters it was ever my fortune to receive, together with several rather uncomplimentary paragraphs in a paper with the editors of which I was wholly unacquainted and which must have been inspired by my sick friend.

That let me out. Ever since I have had a profound respect for the Priest and the Levite who "passed by on the other side," and a corresponding contempt for the Good Samaritan who didn't pass—and probably got euchred for his pains. For I haven't a doubt that if the police records of that day could be examined it would be found that he was arrested by some special officer of the precinct, and charged with being one of the thieves who waylaid and robbed the man, the special officer taking the witness stand and swearing that he found him bending over the victim and "going through his clothes," under the pretence of pouring oil into his wounds.

All this—my adventure and not the Good Samaritan's—happened in Kamschatka, many years ago, but the lesson is not lost upon me yet, nor is there any probability that the recollection will very soon die out. Even though it did, I am confident that not a week would pass before something occurred to revive it and confirm my present impression of the folly of ever attempting to play the Good Samaritan unless your income is unlimited, and your patience and good-nature unbounded. For I do believe that if a man, by way of penance, stood in the streets and volunteered to black a beggar's boots—first giving him the boots—that beggar, when the operation was concluded and a nice polish put on, would give him his rags to brush, and curse him when all was finished if he declined to admit him to the privilege of his dressing-room and the use of his toilet apparatus.

All of which only proves, as my friend before referred to occasionally remarks by way of changing his phraseology but not his proposition: "How inconsistent is man!"

To my shame I find that I have been guilty of a slight digression from the subject which occupied me when I sat down to write. It was my intention then to have expatiated upon the weather, and blessed it, and to have told how charming mornings like these are at the Bay View Park, and how a breakfast relishes there, and how a ride to the Cliff house in the afternoon, a gallop along the beach, a communion with the seals, and an interview and a dinner with the amiable proprietor of the seals and the Cliff House, cultivate the intellect, and expand the soul, and prepare one to take more cheerful views of human nature notwithstanding its inconsistencies already spoken of. But a strange interruption in the very outset of this letter threw me off the track, or at least off the road, jangling all my sweet bells sadly out of tune. Hence the verjuice and bottled vinegar with which my readers have been entertained. But another time we will attempt a better view, for the credit both of human nature and of INIGO.

(For the Californian.)

NO BABY IN THE HOUSE.

NO baby in the house, I know—
'Tis far too nice and clean;
No toys by careless fingers strewn
Upon the floors are seen.
No finger-marks are on the panes,
No scratches on the chairs,
No wooden men set up in rows,
Or marshalled off in pairs;
No little stockings to be darned,
All ragged at the toes,
No pile of mending to be done,
Made up of baby clothes;
No little troubles to be soothed,
No little hands to fold,
No grimy fingers to be washed,
No stories to be told;
No tender kisses to be given,
No nick-names—"Clove" and "Mouse";
No merry frolics after tea—
No baby in the house.

CLARA CLYDE.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 18th, 1865.

LET a man gaze earnestly as he will on beautiful prospects, all nature is composed—for him—of but two or three points, for which his whole soul yearns. Take from life the hearts that loved you—efface from it the home and scenery your thoughts dwell on most tenderly, and nature becomes a frightful void in which your glance falls wearily, finding neither rest nor peace.

EVERYTHING has its use; life teaches us the contempt of death and death the contempt of life. We cannot conquer fate or necessity, yet we can yield to them in such a manner as to be greater than if we could.—Imaginary Conversations, by W. S. Lander.

"I ALWAYS COVERED MOTHER."

THE DAUGHTER AT THE GRAVE.

I HAVE always covered mother,
Since the pain came to her brow,
And she said I did it gently—
None else shall do it now.

I have always smoothed her pillow,
And drawn the curtain-fold;
And I'll not forget thee now, mother,
When thy limbs are all so cold.

'Neath the willows, deep and narrow,
They have made thy bed I know,
Yet they shall not soil thy robes, mother,
With the damp earth mould below.

See, I've plucked some wild flowers, mother,
And I'll strew them on thy breast;
And the buds shall fall so gently
That they may not break thy rest.

I'd bring thee brighter flowers, mother,
But the roses fled with June,
And the daisies and anemones
Went with the sweet May moon.

But the buds fell from the stem, mother,
To be caught by hands on high—
Now they blossom in God's garden,
Pale lilies of the sky.

And 'tis thus with souls like thine, mother,
For they pass from life to love;
And they leave this dark earth-garden
For the golden walks above.

Oh, the sweet star-lilies blossom
Where no hand may pluck them down,
Or I'd weave, to grace thy brow, mother,
A purer, fairer crown.

But the angels' wings are free, mother,
And you can wander there,
Where the flowers are blooming ever,
With a fragrance like to prayer.

Now the counterpane is spread, mother,
You'll wake to morning light—
God's hand has drawn the curtain,
So, mother, sweet, good-night!

C. H. WEBB.

MISS. M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XVI.

A DRAMA THAT WAS ACTED BEHIND THE SCENES

MR. HILLARY escorted his daughter and Julia Desmond back to Twickenham upon the day following that night-scene of anguish and terror. They left Brighton rather late in the day, and arrived at the Cedars when the early winter evening had closed in upon the leafless avenues and groves about the old house. Lights were burning cheerily in the long range of lower windows, and in the vestibule and inner hall, and rare groups of stainless marble gleamed white against a background of bright hothouse flowers. Deferential servants came hurrying out as the carriage drove up, and Miss Hillary, seeing her home in all its accustomed brightness and comfort, felt a painful sense of bewilderment. It was so difficult to realize the force of that calamity which had been so lately revealed to her: it was so difficult to believe that all this splendor was so much rottenness, from which there was only one step to poverty and disgrace.

Mr. Hillary had visited his daughter's room very early upon the morning after the terrible confidence between them, and had impressed upon her the necessity of suppressing every evidence of the knowledge that had come to her.

"I have been compelled to trust you, Maude," he said, "and you must prove yourself worthy of my confidence. Heaven only knows how difficult it has been to me to keep the secrets of my business during three years of reverses and misfortunes such as rarely fall to the lot of a speculator. My only chance of floating over this crisis lies in the meeting with some friend who will lend me the money I want, without looking too closely into the nature of the security I have to offer. But let the state of my affairs once get wind, and all hope of retrieval would be lost. Remember this, Maude, and, if you love me, show a bright face to the world; and above all, beware of Julia Desmond. That young lady is a dangerous person, my dear, and the day may come when we shall have reason to regret having given a shelter to old Desmond's destitute child."

"But Julia is a dear good girl, papa; she would be very sorry for us, I am sure," Maude pleaded, innocently.

"Julia has contrived to feather her own nest so remarkably well, that she would be very indifferent to any calamity that could come to her friends," answered the practical man of the world, who had been by no means pleased with Miss Desmond since that young lady's conquest of Francis Tredethlyn.

Maude kissed her father—ah, how passionately! She clung to him as she remembered that long feverish dream of the previous night, and the glittering something lying in the drawer; she kissed him, and promised that his secrets should be guarded more carefully than her own life.

"And the miracle may be accomplished between this and the tenth of January, papa," she said.

And then, as Lionel Hillary was about to leave his daughter's room, she placed herself suddenly between him and the door, and turned the key in the lock. He looked at her, surprised and perplexed.

"Maude!"

"Dearest father, you have trusted me, and you have exacted a promise from me," said Miss Hillary, with a quiet calmness that was more impressive than any vehemence of manner; "and now I want you to give me a promise, a very solemn promise, my own dear father."

She put her hand upon his shoulder and kissed him once more, clinging to him fondly, looking tenderly upward to his pale, careworn face. Then she took a bunch of keys from her pocket and held them out before him.

"You remember those keys, papa; I am going to return them to you; but I want you to kneel down with me here, now when all that feverish excitement of last night has passed away; I want you to promise me, as you hope for mercy and happiness in a better world when this life is all gone by and done with—I want you to promise me that you will never again, under any circumstances, in any hour of trial or temptation, think of that dreadful alternative of which you thought last night. Oh, papa! remember it is such a terrible sin even to think of it; for we can never do so until we have ceased to trust in God."

The simple words went straight to Lionel Hillary's heart, that world-weary heart, in which there was but this one tender quality of paternal love still left. No subtle arguments of theologian or philosopher could have so deeply influenced him as his daughter's gentle pleading. He knelt by her side, close to a little table, on which an open Testament was lying, and pressing his lips on the sacred page, swore that he would never again contemplate the sin which he had so nearly committed only a few hours before.

"It is a coward's remedy at the best," he said presently; and then he took his daughter in his arms and looked down at her tearful face with a mist before his own eyes, which made that bright young beauty seem blotted and dim. "My Maude, my darling, surely Heaven must have created you to be my guardian angel. I have not been a good man; I have been too much of a speculator for the last few years—a reckless speculator, perhaps; but when the demon of commercial hazard had his grip strongest upon me, your image was always in my mind. I wanted to leave you rich, secure from all the troubles of this world. I was a poor man in my young days, Maude, and perhaps the bitterness of that early time may have taught me to set too high a value upon wealth. Fortune came to me afterwards, almost as wonderfully as it comes to a prince in a fairy tale, and some recklessness of spirit may have been engendered in me by my own successes and by the times in which I have lived."

"But, dear papa, you need not fear poverty for my sake," said Maude; "only trust in me, and when the time comes you shall find me ready to face it. My life has been very pleasant—too pleasant, I dare say—I have always felt that it was so when the thought has come to me of all the people who suffer in this world. But you know how the princess in the fairy tale, who has never known a sorrow, goes out all at once into the great forest, more helpless and lonely than the poorest woodman's daughter, and yet no harm ever comes to the princess, papa. If it will only please Heaven to spare your good name, poverty will have no sting for me; and if disgrace should come, I will bear it for your sake—I will bear it without a murmur for your sake, papa."

She broke down just a little as she said this; she could not speak quite calmly of that most terrible loss of all—the loss of her father's commercial honor. She remembered, very dimly, long prosy discussions that she had heard at Mr. Hillary's dinner-table, about men who had failed, and who had failed through some dishonesty or recklessness of their own, and whose downfall had involved the hard-won fortunes of others, making a vast circle of ruin, spreading as the watery circle spreads when you drop a pebble into a tideless lake.

From this time it almost seemed as if a new life began for Maude Hillary. No more careless idling over new music, no more eager commencements of expensive fancy work that was never to be finished! After Miss Hillary's return to the Cedars, any one taking the trouble to watch her closely might have perceived a wonderful alteration in her conduct—a change that was almost a transformation in her very nature. When she opened her piano now, it was for no idle trifling with fashionable difficulties, no coquetting with shakes, and skipping of arpeggios. She practised steadily, and for hours together. Might not the time be very near at hand in which she would be called upon to gird on her armor, and join the ranks of bread-winners? She thought of herself in a dingy London street, somewhere in the dreary region between Holborn and the New Road—the region which was once a fair expanse of pleasant meadow-land. She thought of herself toiling as so many women toiled, leading the same dull life from day to day; and her courage did not fail her even before that dismal picture. It was not likely that this change in Maude Hillary could escape the notice of so observant a young lady as Miss Desmond. Julia saw and wondered, but she was far from guessing the real cause of Maude's unusual gravity.

"I suppose she is making herself unhappy about Harcourt Lowther," thought Miss Desmond. "These fortunate people always contrive to find one crumpled leaf in their beds of roses. She is making herself miserable about that handsome, worthless soldier, and she thinks herself hardly used because she cannot play at love in a cottage, with a rich mercantile father to pay the expenses of the idyllic ménage."

This was how Julia Desmond accounted for Maude's long intervals of absent brooding, and that melancholy shadow which settled on her face whenever she fancied herself unnoticed, and for a while relaxed the heroic effort with which she tried to keep her promise, and guard her father's secret. It was a very hard struggle. All the young idlers, the government clerks, the briefless but literary barristers, the rising artists who had narrowly escaped making palpable hits at the Royal Academy, or at a temple of art which they irreverently alluded to as the "Brish Inst"—all the accustomed Twickenham loungers flocked down to the Cedars to keep their Christmas holidays in the house of a gentleman whom they regarded as a sort of commercial Midas—a Moorgate street Fortunatus, from whose inexhaustible coffers flowed the golden waters of perpetual prosperity; and Maude received all the old incense, and was fain to smile something like the old smiles upon her worshippers, while her heart ached with an unceasing pain and a hidden dread that was like a palpable burden weighed forever on her breast.

"Oh, if they knew—if they only knew!" she thought. "They court me because they think I am rich, perhaps; but if they only knew what an imposture all this splendor is—these lights and flowers, and grapes and pines, and Sévres china and Venetian glass, and all this long parade of dinner; if they knew that poverty and disgrace may come to us before the new year has well begun!" Sometimes, in her bitter weariness of spirit, sometimes when the social comedy seemed almost too hard to act, Miss Hillary felt suddenly tempted to turn around upon her admirers, and cry to them:

"Why do you torment me with your hackneyed compliments? I am not the daughter of a millionaire; my father is only an imprudent speculator, who is hovering on the verge of a black abyss of bankruptcy and ruin. Go and offer your worship in some solvent temple, and leave me alone with my father and his sorrows."

This, or something akin to this, Miss Hillary was at times sorely tempted to utter. But she kept her promise. She had promised that no word or action of hers should betray the rottenness of her father's position, and she kept a close watch upon herself. Her adorers—who were by no means so mercenary as she thought them—perceived that something was amiss with their goddess, but were far from associating anything so vulgar as the state of the money market with the lessened lustre of her smiles.

"She's engaged to some fellow in the army, and her father won't let her marry him, and the fellow writes her worrying letters; Miss Desmond told me as much," the loungers said to one another, when they confided in each other about Miss Hillary.

The brilliant Julia had taken care to let Maude's admirers know that her heart had long been bestowed upon a remote object; but she did not go so far as to reveal the name of Miss Hillary's chosen lover; and Francis Tredethlyn had no suspicion that Maude Hillary and the beautiful heiress of whom his master had so often spoken, were one and the same person. He knew nothing of this; he only knew that Maude seemed as remote from his sphere as the distant stars that shone coldly upon him out of a steel-blue winter sky when he looked from his window at the Cedars. He spent his Christmas at the Cedars—for Mr. Hillary had been specially cordial and hospitable to him of late, and had resumed all his old graciousness of manner to Julia.

And the private theatricals, the elegant drawing-room exhibition of amateur histrionics, which Maude had planned so merrily in the autumn, were to take place on the first night of the new year—now, when the poor girl's heart was sinking under the dull pain of that perpetual burden, that dreary terror of the disgrace which might be so near.

She had told her father that a miracle might be wrought before the 10th of January. Of what had she thought or dreamed when she held out that hope? What daring fancy had been engendered out of the excitement of the moment?

There are times when a woman feels capable of becoming a social Joan of Arc, a bloodless Charlotte Corday; but then the enthusiasm, the exultation of the moment is so apt to pass with the moment. There had been a vague but desperate intention lurking in Maude Hillary's mind when she had encouraged her father by those hopeful speeches; but the days were creeping fast, the new year was close at hand, and nothing had been done. Nothing had been done, and now Miss Hillary was tormented all day long about those wonderful private theatricals, which were to surpass every drawing-room performance since the days when the unhappy daughter of the Cæsars played a soubrette for the delight of that taciturn king and grandfather-in-law who did not like to laugh.

All arrangements for the grand entertainment had been made before Mr. Hillary's household removed to Brighton. The play had been selected, the characters allotted to the individuals who were supposed, or who supposed themselves, to be most fitted to play them, but not without as much shuffling and changing as the kings and queens undergo in a game of cards. The drama finally chosen was the Lady of Lyons, selected no doubt on that grand principle in accordance with which all amateurs go to work, i. e., because it is a play which specially requires accomplished actors in every one of its characters. Of course Maude was to be the "Pauline." Was she not sole daughter and heiress of the master of the house, at whose expense all the business was to take place? If she had been red-haired, or hump-backed, or lame, the amateurs could scarcely have done otherwise than choose her as the representative of the lovely Mademoiselle Deschappelles. But as she was one of the fairest daughters ever spoiled by a wealthy merchant, she was really created for the part, as it seemed; and she had only to order her dresses and let down her sunny hair in the classic disorder of the period, and she would be the loveliest "Pauline" that ever won the simple heart of an aspiring young gardener. But how about "Claude?" At first every one of the amateurs had desired to play "Claude," and nothing but "Claude." To wear that impossible velvet coat, with its lavish embroidery of gold and spangles; to snub "Beauseant," and to patronize "Damas;" to flourish diamond snuff-boxes and rings, and filmy ruffles of point d'Alençon, which are so becoming to the unhappy amateur, whose hands are apt to assume the rich purple hues of raw beef under the influence of extreme terror; to hold Miss Hillary in their arms, and cry, "Oh! rapture!" in a ponderous bass voice apparently situated somewhere in those martial jack-boots without which "Claude" would be less than "Claude"—to do all this seemed to the young men at the Cedars a glory and delight which would be cheaply won by the cutting of one another's throats in a champ clos.

And then to what base hypocrisies these amateur actors descended! declaring to one another that, after all, "Claude" was not such a great part! Nay, indeed, was not the heroic gardener something of a spoon, liable to provoke laughter if his velvet coat failed to fit, or his humble blouse looked too much like a little boy's pinafore? "Claude" might be a very fine part, the amateurs argued to each other, in a regular theatre, where there were the gallery fellows to applaud the long speeches, and to stamp their hob-nailed boots in the great situations, and all that sort of thing, you know; but your drawing-room audiences are apt to laugh at strong sentiment; and, in short, for a private performance, "Damas" or "Beauseant," or "Glavis" were the great parts.

So there was a good deal of chopping and changing, with vengeful feelings attendant thereupon; and at last, after almost all the privileged guests at the Cedars had made themselves hoarse in the endeavor to cultivate that bass voice and peculiar melodious gurgle so often heard on the stage, and so rarely heard off it—after innumerable tryings on of velvet coats and cocked hats before cheval glasses—it transpired all at once that nobody wanted to play "Claude Melnotte." The noblest hearts sank with a sickly terror before the thought of all Twickenham assembled in solemn conclave to listen to those long speeches with which the peasant husband endeavors to appease the natural anger of his bride. One by one the amateurs had made the awful discovery that after all there is some touch of art, not to be learned in a day, even in the actor's trade. One by one they had discovered that they lacked physique for the leading character; and that after three acts or so of blank verse, they were apt to become hoarse and roopy, and to break ignominiously from that melodious bass gurgle into a treble squeak. So it came about that there was no one to play "Claude," and Miss Hillary clasped her hands in anguish, and demanded what was to become of her. All Twickenham and Hampton Court, Richmond and Ham, and all sorts of people from town invited to witness the Lady of Lyons, and no "Claude Melnotte!" One of the Government clerks, who fancied himself an embryo Buckstone, timidly suggested Box and Cox as a fitting substitute for the drama; but Miss Hillary turned from him with disdain. "Box and Cox!" she exclaimed, contemptuously; "why, my dresses are all ordered, and the white satin for the wedding dress is to be five-and-twenty shillings a yard. I must have some one for 'Claude.'"

(To be continued.)

BON MOTS OF OTHER DAYS.

[By bon-mot is literally signified a good-word, or, as we may translate it, a happy saying, at once witty and to the point. Some nations excel in uttering bon-mots, but none more so than the French and Irish, both of whom possess that liveliness of fancy that carries them on to cleverness of repartee, perhaps with little regard to consequences. The English are poor at this species of jocularly, and the Scotch more so. Among the ancient Romans there were many clever utterers of bon-mots. The following are a few tolerably good ones, along with some of a later date, collected from an old book in the French language, which has chanced to come into our hands.]

ONE day, the philosopher Bias found himself in the same vessel with a crowd of sorry scoundrels. A tempest came on; and instantly the whole band began to invoke the succor of the gods. "Be quiet, you wretches!" said the sage; "if the gods perceive that you are here, we are gone!"

A MUSICIAN complaining that the tyrant Dionysius gave him nothing, after promising him much, for the exercise of his art—"You fool, we are quits," said the tyrant; "you tickled my ears, and I did the very same by yours."

ANTIOCHUS, King of Syria, caused the numerous army which he had assembled against the Romans, to defile before Hannibal, and pointed out with pride to the Carthaginian hero the arms of the infantry, glittering with gold and silver, and the cavalry, whose horse trappings, bits, and saddles, as well as their armor, were loaded with golden ornaments. The elephants were decorated in a similar manner. Having shown all, Antiochus triumphantly asked the Carthaginian if he did not think that all this would do for the Romans? "Oh, yes," returned Hannibal, "even if they were more greedy than they are."

A ROMAN captain, having gone over to the camp of Pompey from that of Cæsar, declared to Cicero that he had come off so hurriedly that he had not even thought of bringing his horse with him. "You have provided," replies Cicero, "much better for your horse's safety than for your own." After the defeat (thus foreseen) of Pompey on the plains of Pharsalia, the captain Nonius said to Cicero, "Be of good heart; we have yet left seven eagles." "An excellent thing, if we had to fight with jays," replied the orator.

THE Emperor Domitian was accustomed at his leisure hours, to shut himself up alone in his chamber, and there indulge in the amusement of sticking flies with a pin. A courtier inquiring one day if there was any one with the Cæsar, "No one," said Vibius Crispus; "not even a fly."

CHARLEMAGNE studied to bring around him, by liberal donations, all the most learned men of his age. He was less successful, however, than he could have wished, and complained of this, one day, to the learned Alcuin. "Would to heaven," said the monarch, "that I had about me twelve such men as Jerome and Augustin!" "What, sire!" replied Alcuin, "hath the Creator of heaven and earth but two men of such merit, and you would have twelve?"

THOMAS AQUINAS entered the chamber of Pope Innocent IV. whilst large sums of money were being counted there. "You see," said the pontiff to him, "that the church has been blessed, and is no longer in the state in which she was when it was said, 'Silver and gold have I none.'" "It is true, holy father," said Aquinas; "but neither can she now say to the paralytic, 'Take up thy bed and walk.'"

HENRY IV. of France one day reached Amiens after a long journey. A local orator was deputed to harangue him, and commenced with a long string of epithets. "Very great sovereign, very good, very merciful, very magnanimous"—"Add, also," interrupted the king, "very tired!" A famous physician having quitted Calvinism for Catholicism, Henry said to his Protestant minister, Sully, "My friend, your religion is surely very ill. The doctors give it up." The same monarch was one day harangued by a speaker in a small country town, during whose discourse an ass brayed at a short distance. "One at a time, gentlemen," said the king.

ONE of the kings of Spain had been unsuccessful in war, and had lost several provinces; yet he received, notwithstanding, the title of the Great from his courtiers, and, the more unfortunate he grew, was the more rigid in exacting such honors. "Yes, he is Great," said a wit, "just as a ditch is great. The more earth you take from it, the bigger it becomes."

THE Duke of Roquelaure was any thing but beautiful. Meeting one day a very ugly country squire who had business at the court, the duke introduced him to the king, saying that he lay under the weightiest obligations to the gentleman. The king graciously accorded to the squire the desired favor, and then asked Roquelaure what was the nature of his obligations to the other. "Ah, sire, without this dog, I should be the ugliest man in your majesty's dominions," was the answer.

THE judge Le Coigneux desired his macer of the court, named Maillard, to keep the auditory silent at a trial. The macer accordingly bawled out "silence" every instant, though no voice was in action but his. The old judge at last cried to him testily, "Macer, make Maillard be quiet."

THE celebrated Malherbe dined one day with the Archbishop of Rouen, and fell asleep soon after the meal. The prelate, a sorry preacher, was about to deliver a sermon, and awakened Malherbe, inviting him to be of the auditory. "Ah, thank you," said Malherbe; "pray excuse me; I shall sleep very well without that."

THE Abbé Regnier, secretary of the French Academy, once made a collection of money among the members for some common purpose. He went round at a meeting with his hat, receiving the contributions. Not perceiving that the president Rose, a very miserly person, had dropped in his share, the abbé presented the hat again to him. The president declared that he had made his contribution, and Regnier said, "I believe it, but I did not see it." "And I," says Fonteuille, "saw it, but could not believe it."

A PEASANT went into a large city, and, among other objects that struck his fancy, was arrested by a banking office, where he saw people go out and in, without getting any goods, apparently, as in other shops. He ventured to enter and ask the teller what was sold there. "Asses' heads," was the sneering answer. "What a business you must have!" said the rustic; "I see you have but one left."

IT would often be better not to attempt to reward a brave action, than to reward it ill. A soldier had his two arms carried off at the wrists by a shot. His colonel offered him a crown. "It was not my gloves, but my hands that I lost, colonel," said the poor soldier reproachfully.

A MAN of genius was one day told that he would be introduced to a person worth knowing—"a person," said the intending introducer, by way of particular commendation, "who has actually got by heart the whole of Montaigne." The man of genius coldly replied, "I have the work here."

A PRELATE had gone to Rome, in expectation of a cardinal's hat. He returned home, however, without obtaining the object of his wishes. Soon after, he went to court and paid his compliments to the king, but was so hoarse with a cold, that he could scarcely make himself intelligible. The king afterwards chanced to express his surprise that the prelate should have so exposed himself as to catch cold. "Ah, your majesty need not wonder at that," said a wit, "since the prelate came from Rome without the hat."

STAGE COMBATS—ABSURDITIES.—Chief among the oddities which seem to have become ineradicable upon the modern stage, is the stereotyped mode of fighting combats at the end of tragedies and in the progress of melo-drama. Does anybody in his senses really believe that "Richard" and "Richmond," "Macbeth" and "Macduff," "Harry Monmouth" and "Harry Percy," ever fought such ridiculous fights on Bosworth Field, and Dunsinane, and on Shrewsbury Plain? And yet this is always looked upon, nay, impatiently waited for, by a large proportion of the audience, as the cream of the play—the only thing, indeed, worth going to the theatre to see. Dickens, in his Nicholas Nickleby, touches off this absurdity with one of his most trenchant lunges of satire. "The two combatants," he says, "went to work and chopped away until the swords emitted a shower of sparks, to the great satisfaction of Mr. Crummles, who appeared to think this a great point indeed. The engagement commenced with about two hundred chops administered by the short sailor and the tall sailor alternately, without producing any particular result, till the short sailor was chopped down upon one knee; but this was nothing to him, for he worked himself about on one knee, with the assistance of his left hand, and fought desperately until the tall sailor chopped his sword out of his grasp. Now, the inference was, that the short sailor, reduced to extremity, would give in at once, and cry quarter; but, instead of that, he, all of a sudden, drew a large pistol from his belt and presented it at the face of the tall sailor who, not expecting it, was so overcome by this that he let the short sailor pick up his sword and begin again. Then the chopping recommenced," etc. Now, funny as this may read, it is, after all, no great caricature of the fights in Richard, Macbeth, and Henry IV., as usually performed upon the stage. If there were nothing in the positive absurdity of the thing to deter an actor of a reflecting turn of mind from presenting himself in it, one would think that an ordinary degree of the instinct of self-preservation would have that effect.

THE following persons are requested, by a country paper, to keep away from the next Lyceum lecture: the man who wears creaking boots, the lady who faints, the boy who brings peanuts, the girl who giggles, the girl who tosses confectionery about the hall, the man who goes out before the lecture is ended, the boy and girl who are under 15 years of age, and the man who always applauds in the wrong place.

"Ich habe es gelhan" were Muller's "reported" last words. He might have said (and been misunderstood by the minister) "Nich habe es gelhan," which would have meant the exact contrary.

A SOLDIER, who was being led to the gallows, saw a crowd of people running on before. "Don't be in such a hurry," said he to them. "I can assure you nothing will be done without me."

(For the Californian.)

LINES FOR MUSIC.

FOR the past, in garbs of sorrow,
Mourning thoughts are gliding on,
While the inward grief we're shedding
Wears away our hearts of stone—
Wears, but changes not their natures,
Bends, but fails to break the will;
Like unto rebellious Ephraim,
We are idol-wedded still.

In the future stretch before us
Many a hill and valley green,
Flowery meads and tempting shadows
Whereunto our passions lean;
But the path which hath no verdure,
And which seems a gloomy road,
Though it openeth dark and dreary,
Terminates with Heaven and God.

When our years on earth are numbered
And we lay us down to die,
When from out our breasts is stealing
Nature's faint expiring sigh,
May our thoughts like peaceful rivers
Float along their happy way,
While we sink as calm to slumber
As the Christian bows to pray!

W. R. B.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 18th, 1865.

A MODERN ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

IN explanation of the subjoined narrative, found in the columns of an old newspaper, it is necessary to remind the reader that the island of Mauritius, appertaining at this day to the English, was originally colonized by the French, and that the population yet consists in a great measure of persons of that nation, to whom, by a formal treaty between the powers concerned, their ancient laws and usages were preserved without any material alterations:

About ten or twelve months ago, the Sieur Clodomir Frenois, a rich merchant of the island, was found dead and frightfully disfigured in his own habitation. His body was discovered lying on the floor, with the head and face mutilated by means of a pistol, and all doubt as to the cause of the catastrophe was dispelled by the discovery of the fatal weapon by the side of the corpse, and also of a paper in the handwriting of the deceased. This paper contained the following words: "I am ruined!—a villain has robbed me of twenty-five thousand livres sterling; dishonor must be my portion, and I cannot await or survive it. I leave to my wife the task of distributing among my creditors the means which remain to us, and I pray that God, my friends, and my enemies, may pardon my self-destruction! Yet another minute, and I shall be in eternity!" (Signed) CLODOMIR FRENOIS."

Great was the consternation caused by this tragic event, which was the more unexpected, as the loss alluded to in the note had never been made public. The deceased had been held in great esteem over the colony as a man of strict honor and probity, and was universally lamented. His attached widow, after endeavoring faithfully to fulfil his last wishes, found her grief too overpowering to permit her to mingle longer with the world, and took the resolution of consecrating her remaining days to the services of religion. Two months after the sad end of her husband, she entered a convent, leaving to a nephew of the late merchant, a physician, the charge of completing the distribution of the effects of Frenois among his creditors.

A minute examination of the papers of the defunct, led to the discovery of the period at which the unfortunate merchant had been robbed; and this period was found to correspond with the date of the disappearance of a man named John Moon, long in the employment of Frenois. Of this man, on whom suspicion not unnaturally fell, nothing could be learned on inquiry, but, shortly after the division of the late merchant's property, Moon reappeared in the colony. When taken up and examined respecting the cause of his flight, he stated that he had been sent by his master to France to recover certain sums due to the merchant there, in which mission he had been unsuccessful; and he further averred, that if Clodomir Frenois, in his existing correspondence, had thrown any injurious suspicions upon him (Moon,) the whole was but a pretext to account for deficiencies of which the merchant himself was the sole cause and author. This declaration, made by a man who seemed to fear no inquiry, and whose worldly circumstances remained to appearance the same as they had ever been, had the effect of silencing, if it did not satisfy, the examiners, and the affair soon fell in a great measure out of the public recollection.

Things remained for a short time in this condition, when, one morning, Mr. William Burnett, principal creditor of the late Clodomir Frenois, heard a knocking at his gate at a very early hour. He called up one of his servants, who went down and opened the door, and immediately returned with the intelligence that a stranger, who seemed desirous of keeping his person concealed, wished to speak with Mr. Burnett in private. Mr. Burnett rose, threw on his dressing-gown, and descended to the parlor. He saw there a stranger, of tall person, seated in an easy and familiar attitude upon a sofa, with a number of the Morning Post in his hand. The back of the visitor was turned to Mr. Burnett as he entered. Rather surprised to see a stranger conduct himself so like an old friend of the house, Mr. Burnett said aloud, "Sir, may I beg to know your business with me?"

The stranger turned round, and advanced to salute his host warmly and courteously. Mr. Burnett started back, and uttered a loud exclamation of surprise and alarm. Well he might; for before his eyes stood his friend and debtor, Clodomir Frenois, whom he had beheld, nearly a year before, a mutilated corpse, and whom he himself had followed to the grave!

What passed at that interview between Mr. Burnett and his strange visitor, remained for the time a secret. Mr. Burnett was observed to issue several times, pale and agitated, from his dwelling, and to visit the magistrate charged with the conduct of the criminal processes of the colony. In the course of that day, while John Moon was regaling himself with tea under the palm-trees of his garden, along with a Circassian female whom he had bought some time previously, he was arrested and taken to prison by the officers of justice. On the following day, he was brought before the criminal court, accused of robbing the late Clodomir Frenois, the crime being conjoined with breach of trust and violence. Moon smiled at the charge, with all the confidence of a man who had nothing to fear. The judge having demanded of him if he confessed the crime, the accused replied that the charge was altogether absurd; that clear testimony was necessary to fix such a delict upon him; and that, so far from there being any such evidence producible, neither the widow of the deceased, nor any one person in his service, had ever heard the pretended robbery even once mentioned by Frenois during his life.

"Do you then affirm your innocence?" repeated the judge gravely, after hearing all that the other had to say.

"I will avouch my innocence," replied Moon, "even before the body of my late master, if that be necessary." [Such a thing often took place under the old colonial law.]

"John Moon," said the judge, in a voice broken by some peculiar emotion, "it is before your late master that you will have now to assert your innocence, and may God make the truth appear!"

A signal from the judge accompanied these words, and immediately a door opened, and Clodomir Frenois, the supposed suicide, entered the court. He advanced to the bar with a slow and deliberate step, having his eye calmly but sternly fixed on the prisoner, his late servant. A great sensation was caused in the court by his appearance. Uttering shrieks of alarm and horror, the females present fled from the spot. The accused fell on his knees in abject terror, and shudderingly confessed his guilt. For a time, no voice was heard but his. However, as it became apparent that a living man stood before the court, the advocate for the prisoner gained courage to speak. He demanded that the identity of the merchant be established, and the mystery of his existence explained. He said that the court should not be biased by what might prove to be a mere accidental likeness between a person living and one deceased: and that such an avowal as that of the prisoner, extracted in a moment of extraordinary terror, was not to be held of much weight. "Before being admitted here as accuser or witness," continued the advocate, addressing the resuscitated merchant, "prove who and what you are, and disclose by what chance the tomb which so lately received your body, mangled by bullets, has given up its tenant, and restored you to the world in life and health!"

This firm appeal of the advocate, who continued steadfast to his duty under circumstances that would have closed the lips of most men, called forth the following narrative from Clodomir Frenois: "My story may be soon told, and it will suffice to establish my identity. When I discovered the robbery committed by the accused, he had then fled from the island, and I speedily saw that all attempts to retake him would prove fruitless. I saw ruin and disgrace before me, and came to the resolution of terminating my life before the evil day came. On the night on which this determination was formed, I was seated alone in my private chamber. I had written the letter which was found on my table, and had loaded my pistol. This done, I prayed forgiveness from my Maker for the act of despair I was about to commit. The end of the pistol was at my head, and my finger on the lock, when a knock at the outer door of the house startled me. I concealed the weapon, and went to the door. A man entered, whom I recognized to be the sexton of the parish in which I lived. He bore a sack on his shoulders, and in it the body of man newly buried, which was destined for my nephew, the physician, then living with me. The scarcity of bodies for dissection, as the court is aware, compels those who are anxious to acquire skill in the medical profession to procure them by any possible secret means. The sexton was at first alarmed at having met me. 'Did my nephew request you to bring this body?' said I. 'No,' replied the man; 'but I know his anxiety to obtain one for dissection, and took it upon me to come and offer him this body. For mercy's sake,' continued the sexton, 'do not betray me, sir, or I shall lose my situation, and family's bread.'

"While the man was speaking, a strange idea entered my mind, and brought to my despairing bosom hopes of continued life and recovered honor. I stood for a few minutes absorbed in thought, and then, recollecting myself, I gave two pieces of gold to the resurrectionist, the sum which he had expected. Telling him to keep his own counsel, and that all would be well, I sent him away, and carried the body to my cabinet. The whole of the household had previously been sent out of the way on purpose, and I had time to carry into execution the plan which had struck me. The body was fortunately of the same stature as myself, and like me in complexion. I knew the man; he had been a poor offender, abandoned by his family. 'Poor relic of mortality!' said I, with tears in my eyes, 'nothing which man may do can now injure thee; yet pardon me if I rudely disfigure thy lifeless substance. It is to prevent the ruin of not one, but twenty families I should success attend my attempt, I swear that thy children shall be my children, and, when my own hour comes, we shall rest together in the tomb to which thou shalt be borne before me!'"

At this portion of the merchant's narrative, the most lively interest was excited in the court, and testified even by tears from many of the audience. Frenois thus proceeded: "I then stripped off all my clothes, and dressed the body in them. This accomplished, I took up the pistol, and with a hand more reluctant than when I had applied it to my own person, I fired it close to the head of the deceased, and at once caused such a disfigurement as rendered it impossible for the keenest eye to detect the substitution which had been made.

Choosing the plainest habit I could get, I then dressed myself anew, and shaved off the whiskers which I was accustomed to wear, and took other means to alter and disguise my appearance, in case of being subjected by any accident to the risk of betrayal. Next morning saw me on board a French vessel on my way to a distant land—the native country of my ancestors. The expectation which had led me to the execution of this scheme were not disappointed. I knew that John Moon, the man who had robbed me, and who now stands at the bar of this court, had formed connections in this island, which would in all probability bring him back to it as soon as the intelligence of my death gave him the promise of security. In this I have not been disappointed. I have been equally fortunate in other respects. While my unworthy servant remained here in imaginary safety, I have been successful in discovering the quarter in which, not daring at first to betray here the appearance of wealth, he had lodged the whole of the stolen money. I have brought it with me, and also sufficient proofs, supposing his confession of this day to be set aside altogether, to convict him of the crime with which he stands charged. By the same means," continued Clodomir Frenois, with a degree of honorable pride in which all who heard him sympathized, "will I be enabled to restore my family to their place in society, and to redeem the credit of a name on which no blot was left by those who bore it before me, and which, please God, I shall transmit unstained to my children, and my children's children."

John Moon, whose guilt was thus suddenly and strangely laid bare to the world, did not retract the confession which he had made in the extremity of his terror, and, without separating, the court sentenced him to confinement for life in the prisons of the colony.

The news of Clodomir Frenois' reappearance spread rapidly, and the high esteem in which his character was held led to an universal rejoicing on the occasion. He was accompanied from the court to his home by a dense multitude, who welcomed him with prolonged shouts. It would be in vain to attempt any description of the feelings of the wife, who thus saw restored to her the beloved being for whose sake she had quitted the world. She was released from her ecclesiastical vows, and rejoined her husband, no more to part till the grave really claimed one or other of them as its due.

SINGULARITIES OF CHRISTINA OF SWEDEN.—In a fit of educational enthusiasm, Christina endowed universities, academies, appointed largely-salaried professors, and suddenly changing her mind, dismissed them all with abuse and contempt. Two solemn philosophers whom she had taken into favor she one day, brusquely interrupting a grave colloquy, compelled to play at shuttlecock with each other as long as they could move their arms. Three of the most learned and eminent men in Sweden she made pirouette before her in a Greek dance, she screaming with laughter the while, and urging the musicians to play faster, faster, until one of the venerable men fainted and fell on the floor. Desarted, whom she had induced by the most flattering promises to take up his residence at her court, she literally worried into a consumption by insisting, in that terrible climate and the season winter—a more than usually rigorous winter—upon his presenting himself in her library punctually at five o'clock every morning.

THE WER-WOLF.

A KENTISH LEGEND OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

"Ye hallow'd bells, whose voices through the air
The awful summons of afflictions bear."
Honorius, on the Day of All Souls.

ON the confines of that extensive forest track formerly spreading over so large a portion of that garden of England, the lovely county of Kent, a remnant of which "woody way" to this day is known as the Weald of Kent, and where it stretched its almost impervious covert midway between Ashford and Canterbury during the prolonged reign of our second Henry, a family of Norman extraction, by name Hugues—or Wulfrie, as they were commonly called by the Saxon inhabitants of that district—had, under protection of the ancient forest laws, furtively erected for themselves a lone and miserable habitation; and amidst these sylvan fastnesses, ostensibly following the occupation of wood-cutters, the wretched outcasts—for such, for some cause or other, they evidently were—had for many years maintained a secluded and precarious existence. Whether from rooted antipathy, actively cherished against all that usurping nation from which these woodmen derived their origin, or from recorded malpractices, they had been long looked upon by their superstitious Anglo-Saxon neighbors as belonging to the accursed race of wer-wolves, and, as such, churlishly refused work on the domains of the surrounding franklins or proprietors; so thoroughly was accredited the descent of the original lycanthropic stain transmitted from father to son through several generations. That the Hugues Wulfries reckoned not a single friend among the adjacent huts and homesteads of serf or freedman was not to be wondered at, possessing, as they did, so formidable a reputation; for to them was invariably attributed even the misfortunes to which chance alone might seem to have given birth. Did midnight fire consume the grange; did the time decayed barn, over-stored with an unusually abundant harvest, tumble into ruins; were the shocks of wheat laid prostrate over the fields by tempest; did the smut destroy the grain, or the cattle perish, decimated by murrain; a child sink under some wasting malady, or a woman give premature birth to her offspring, it was ever the Hugues Wulfries who were openly accused, eyed askant with mingled fear and detestation, the finger of young and old pointing them out with bitter execrations; in fine, they were almost as nearly classed feræ naturæ as their fabled prototype, and dealt with accordingly. [King Edgar is said to have been the first who attempted to rid England of its wolves; criminals even being pardoned by producing a stated number of these creatures' tongues. Some centuries after, they increased to such a degree as to become again the object of royal attention, and Edward I. appointed persons to extirpate this obnoxious race. It is one of the principal bearings in armory. Hugh, surnamed Lupus, the first Earl of Kent, bore for his crest a wolf's head.]

Terrible indeed were the tales told of them round the glowing hearth at eventide, whilst spinning the flax or plucking the geese: equally affirmed, too, in broad daylight, whilst driving the cows to pasture; and most circumstantially discussed on Sundays, between mass and vespers, by the gossiping groups collected within Ashford church parvis, with most seasonable admixture of anathema and devout crossings. Witchcraft, larceny, murder, and sacrilege, formed prominent features in the bloody and mysterious scenes of which the Hugues Wulfries were the alleged actors. Sometimes they were ascribed to the father, at others to the mother; and even the daughter escaped not her share of villification. Fain would they have attributed an atrocious disposition to the unweaned babe, so great, so universal was the horror in which was held that race of Cain! The churchyard of Ashford, and the carved stone cross, from whence diverged the several roads to London, Canterbury, and Ashford, standing midway between the two last-named places, served—so tradition avouched—as nocturnal haunts for the unhallowed deeds of the Wulfries, who thither prowled by moonlight, it was said, to fatten on the freshly buried dead, or drain the blood of any living wight who might be rash enough to venture near those solitary spots. True it was that the wolves had, during some of the severe winters, emerged from their forest lairs, and entering the cemetery by a breach in its walls, goaded by famine, had actually disinterred the dead. True it was, also, that the Wolf's Cross, as the hinds commonly designated it, had been stained with gore on one occasion through the fall of a drunken mendicant, who chanced to fracture his skull against a pointed angle of its basement. But these accidents, as well as a multitude of others, were attributed to the guilty intervention of the Wulfries, under their fiendish guise of wer-wolves.

These poor people, moreover, took no pains to exonerate themselves from a prejudice so monstrous. Full well aware of what calumny they were to the victims, but alike conscious of their impotence to contradict it, they tacitly suffered its infliction, and fled all contact with those to whom they knew themselves repulsive. Shunning the highways, and never venturing to pass through the town of Ashford in open day, they pursued such labor as might occupy them within-doors or in unfrequented places. They appeared not at Canterbury market, never numbered themselves among the pilgrims at Becket's far-famed shrine, nor assisted at any sport, merry-making, hay-cutting, or harvest-home; the priest had interdicted them from all communion with the church—the ale-bibbers from the hostelry.

The rude hut which they inhabited was built of chalk and clay, with a thatch of straw, in which the high winds had made large rents; and its rotten door exhibited wide gaps, through which the wind had free ingress. As this wretched abode was situate at considerable distance from any other, if, perchance, any of the neighboring serfs strayed within its precincts towards nightfall, their credulous fears made them shun near approach so soon as the vapors of the marsh were seen to blend their ghastly wreaths with the twilight. When that darkling time drew on which explains the diabolical sense of the old saying, "tween dog and wolf," "twixt hawk and buzzard," and the wit-o'-the-wisps began to glimmer around the dwelling of the Wulfries, they then patriarchally supped—whenever they had a supper—and forthwith betook themselves to rest.

Sorrow, misery, and the putrid exhalations of the steeped hemp, from which they manufactured a rude and scanty attire, combined eventually to bring sickness and death into the bosom of this wretched family; who, in their utmost extremity, could hope for neither pity nor succor. The father was first attacked, and his corpse was scarce cold ere the mother rendered up her breath. Thus passed that fated couple to their account, unsolaced by the consolations of the confessor or the medicaments of the leech. Hugues Wulfrie, their eldest son, himself dug their grave, laid their bodies within it, swathed with hempen shreds for graveclothes, and raised a few clods of earth over them, wherewith to mark their last resting-place. A hind, who chanced to see him fulfilling this pious duty in the dusk of the evening, timidly crossed himself, and fled as fast as his legs would carry him, fully believing that he had witnessed some infernal incantation. When the actual fact transpired, the neighboring gossips congratulated one another upon the twofold mortality, which they looked upon as a tardy chastisement of Heaven. They spoke of ringing the joy bells, and offering masses of thanks for such a deed of grace.

It was All Soul's eve, and the wind howled along the bleak hill side, whistling drearily through the naked branches of the forest trees, whose last leaves it had remorselessly stripped; the sun had sunk obscurely; a dense and chilling fog spread through the air like the mourning veil of the widowed, whose day of love hath early fled. No star shone in the heavy, murky sky. In that lone hut, through which death had so lately passed, the orphan survivors held their lonely vigil by the fitful blaze sent forth from the reeking logs smouldering upon the hearth. Several days had elapsed since their lips had pressed for the last time the cold hands of their parents; several dreary nights had passed since the sad hour in which their last farewell had left them desolate on earth.

Poor lone ones! both, too, in the flower of their youth—how sad, yet how serene did they appear amid their grief! But what sudden and mysterious terror is it that seems to overcome them? It is not, alas! the first time since they were left alone upon earth, that they have found themselves at this hour of the night by their deserted hearth, once enlivened by the cheerful tales of their mother. Full often have they wept over her memory, but never yet had their solitude proved so appalling; and, pallid as very spectres, they tremblingly gazed upon one another as the flickering ray from the wood-fire played over their features.

"Brother! heard you not that loud shriek which every echo of the forest repeated? It sounds to me as if the ground were ringing with the tread of some gigantic phantom, and whose breath seems to have shaken the door of our hut. The breath of the dead they say is icy cold. A mortal shivering has come over me."

"And I too, sister, thought I heard voices, as it were, at a distance, murmuring strange words. Tremble not thus! Am I not beside you?"

"Oh, brother, let us most fervently pray, to the end that Heaven may restrain the departed from haunting our dwelling."

"But perhaps our mother is amongst them. She comes, unshrived and unshrouded, to visit her forlorn ones—her well-beloved! For knowest thou not, sister, 'tis the eve on which the dead forsake their graves? Let us open the door that our mother may enter and resume her wonted place by the hearthstone."

"Oh, brother, how gloomy is all without a door! how damp and cold the gusts sweep by! Hearest thou what groans the dead are uttering round our hut? Oh, close the door, in Heaven's name!"

"Take courage, sister; I have thrown upon the fire that holy branch, plucked as it flowered on last Palm Sunday, which thou knowest will drive away all evil spirits; and now our mother can enter alone."

"But how will she look, brother? They say the dead are horrible to gaze upon; that their hair has fallen away, their eyes become hollow, and that in walking their bones rattle hideously. Will our mother, then, be thus?"

"No; she will appear with the features we loved to behold; with the affectionate smile that welcomed us home from our perilous labors; with the voice which, in early youth, sought us when, belated, the closing night surprised us far from our dwelling."

The poor girl busied herself awhile in arranging a few platters of scanty fare upon the tottering board which served them for a table; and this last pious offering of filial love, as she deemed it, appeared accomplished only by the greatest and last effort, so enfeebled had her frame become.

"Let our dearly-loved mother enter, then," she exclaimed, sinking exhausted upon the settle. "I have prepared her evening meal, that she may not be angry with me; and all is arranged as she was wont to have it. But what ails thee, my brother? for now thou tremblest as I did awhile ago."

"Seest thou not, sister, those pale and lurid lights which are rising at a distance across the marsh? They are the dead, coming to seat themselves before the repast prepared for them. Hark! List to the funeral tones of the All-hallow-tide bells, as they come upon the gale, blended with their hollow voices. Listen! listen!"

"Brother, this horror grows insupportable. This, I feel, of a verity, will be my last night upon earth! And is there no word of hope to cheer me, mingling with those fearful sounds? Oh, brother! brother!"

"Hush, sister, hush! Seest thou now the ghastly lights which herald the dead athwart the horizon? Hearest thou the prolonged tolling of the bell? They come! they come!"

"Eternal repose to their ashes!" exclaimed the bereaved ones, sinking upon their knees, and bowing down their heads in the extremity of their terror and lamentation; and as they uttered the words, the door was at the same moment closed with violence, as though it had been slammed to by a vigorous hand. Hugues started to his feet, for the creaking of the timber which supported the roof seemed to announce the fall of the frail tenement; the fire was suddenly extinguished, and a plaintive groan mingled itself with the blast that whistled through the crevices of the door. On raising his sister, Hugues found that she too was no longer to be numbered among the living.

Hugues, on becoming the head of his family, composed of two sisters younger than himself, had seen them likewise descend into the grave in the space of a fortnight; and when he had laid the last within her parent earth, he hesitated whether he should not extend himself beside them, and share their peaceful slumber. It was not by tears and sobs that grief so profound as his had manifested itself, but in a mute and sullen contemplation over the rude sepulture of his kindred and his own future loneliness. During three consecutive nights he wandered, pale and haggard, from his solitary hut, to prostrate himself and kneel by turns upon the funereal turf. For three days food had not passed his lips.

Winter had interrupted the labors of the woods and fields, and Hugues had presented himself in vain among the neighboring farms to obtain a few days' employment to thresh grain, cut wood, or drive the plough; no one would employ him, from fear of drawing upon himself the fatality attached to all bearing the name of Wulfrie. He met with brutal denials at all hands; and not only were these accompanied by taunt and menace, but dogs were let loose upon him to rend his limbs; they deprived him even of the alms accorded to beggars by profession. In short, he found himself overwhelmed with scorn, insult and injury.

Was he, then, to expire of inanition, or deliver himself from the tortures of hunger by suicide? He would have embraced that means, as a last and only consolation, had he not been retained earthward to struggle with his dark fate by a feeling of love. Yes, that abject being—forced, in very desperation against his better self, to abhor the human species in the abstract, and to feel a savage joy in waging war against it; that pariah, who scarce longer felt confidence in the Heaven which seemed an apathetic witness of his woes; that man, so isolated from those social relations which alone compensate us for the toils and troubles of life, without other stay than that afforded by his conscience, with no fortune in prospect but the miserable existence and bitter death of his departed kin; worn to the bone by sorrow and privation, swelling with rage and resentment, he yet consented to live, to cling to life; for, strange to say, he loved! But for that heaven-sent ray gleaming across his thorny path, he would have gladly exchanged a pilgrimage so lone and wearisome for the peaceful slumber of the grave.

Hugues Wulfrie would have been the finest youth in all that part of Kent, were it not that the outrages with which he had so unceasingly to contend, and the privations he was forced to undergo, had effaced the color from his cheeks, and sunk his eyes deep in their orbits. His brows, also, were habitually contracted, and his glance oblique and fierce. Yet despite that recklessness and anguish which clouded his features, one incredulous of his alleged atrocities could not have failed to admire the savage beauty of his head, cast in nature's noblest mould, crowned with a profusion of waving hair, and set upon shoulders whose robust and harmonious proportions were discoverable through the tattered attire investing them. With a carriage firm and majestic, his motions were not without a species of rustic grace, and the tone of his naturally soft voice accorded admirably with the purity in which he spoke his ancestral language—Norman French. In short, he differed so widely from the people of his imputed condition, that one is constrained to believe that jealousy or prejudice must originally have been no stranger to the malicious persecution of which he was the object. The women alone ventured first to pity his forlorn condition, and next endeavored to think of him in a more favorable light.

Branda, niece of Willieblud, the flesher of Ashford, had, among other of the town maidens, noticed Hugues with a not unfavorable eye, as she chanced to pass one day on horseback through a coppice near the outskirts of the town, into which the young man had been led by the eager chase of the wild hog; and which animal, from the nature of the country, was single-handed, exceedingly difficult of capture. The cold-hearted falsehoods which the malignant crones buzzed in her ears in no wise diminished the advantageous opinion she had conceived of this ill-treated and good-looking wer-wolf. She sometimes, indeed, went so far as to turn considerably out of her way, in order to meet and exchange his cordial greeting; for Hugues, recognizing the attention of which he had now become the object, had, in his turn, at last summoned up courage to survey more leisurely the pretty Branda; and the result was that he found her the brightest and comeliest maiden that, in his hitherto restricted rambles out of the forest, his timorous gaze had ever encountered. His gratitude increased proportionably; and at the moment when his domestic be-reavements came one after another to overwhelm him, he was actually on the eve of making Branda, on the first opportunity presenting itself, an avowal of the love he bore her.

It was chill winter—holy Christmas-tide; the distant toll of the curfew had long ceased, and all the inhabitants of Ashford were safely housed in their tenements for the night. Hugues—solitary, motionless, silent, his forehead grasped between his hands, his gaze dully fixed upon the decaying brands that feebly glimmered upon his hearth—heeded not the cutting north wind, whose sweeping gusts shook the crazy roof and whistled through the chinks of the door. He started not at the harsh cries of the herons fighting for prey in the marsh, nor at the monotonous croaking of the ravens perched over his smoke vent. He thought of his departed kindred, and imagined that his hour to rejoin them would soon be at hand; for the intense cold congealed the marrow of his bones, and fell hunger gnawed and twisted his entrails. Yet at intervals would a recollection of nascent love—of Branda—suddenly appease his else intolerable anguish, and cause a faint smile to gleam across his wan features.

"O blessed Virgin! grant that my sufferings may speedily cease!" murmured he, despairingly. "Oh, would I were a wer-wolf, as they call me! I could then requite them for all the foul wrong done me. True, I could not feed upon their flesh; I would not shed their blood; but I should be able to terrify and torment those who have wrought my parents' and sisters' death, who have persecuted our family even to extermination! Why have I not the power to change my nature into that of a wolf, if of a verity my ancestors possessed it, as they avouch? I should at least find carrion (horse flesh was an article of food among our Saxon forefathers in England) to devour, and not die thus horribly of starvation. Branda is the only being in this world who cares for me; and that conviction alone reconciles me to life!"

Hugues gave free current to these gloomy reflections. The smouldering embers now gave but a feeble and vacillating light, faintly struggling with the surrounding gloom, and Hugues felt the horror of darkness coming strong upon him. Chilled with the ague fit one instant, and tormented next by the fevered pulsation of his veins, he arose at last to seek fuel, and threw upon the fire a heap of faggot chips, heath, and straw, which soon raised a clear and crackling flame. His stock of wood had become exhausted; and seeking wherewith to replenish his dying hearth-fire, whilst foraging under the rudely built oven, amongst a pile of rubbish placed there by his mother wherewith to bake bread—handles of old tools, fractured joint-stools, and cracked platters—he discovered a chest rudely bound with a dressed hide, and which he had never seen before. Rushing upon it as though he had found a treasure, he broke open the lid, strongly secured by an iron hasp.

This chest, which had evidently been long unopened, contained the complete disguise of a wer-wolf—a dyed sheepskin, with gloves in the form of paws; a tail; a mask with an elongated muzzle, furnished with formidable rows of yellow horse-teeth.

Hugues started backwards, terrified at his discovery—so opportune that it seemed to him the work of sorcery. Then, on recovering from his surprise, he drew forth, one by one, the several pieces of this strange disguise, which had evidently seen some service, but from long neglect had become somewhat damaged. Then recurred confusedly to his mind the marvellous recitals made him by his grandfather, as he nursed him upon his knees during earliest childhood—tales during the narration of which his mother wept silently, as he had laughed heartily. In his mind there was a mingled strife of feelings and purposes alike undefinable. He continued his examination of this criminal heritage, and by degrees his imagination grew bewildered with vague and extravagant projects.

Hunger and despair together hurried him on. He saw objects no longer save through an ensanguined prism. He felt his very teeth on edge with an avidity for biting. He experienced an inconceivable impulse to run. He set himself to howl, as though he had practised wer-wolfery all his life, and next began to invest himself completely with the guise and external attributes of his novel vocation. A more startling change could scarcely have been wrought in him had that horribly grotesque metamorphosis really been the effect of enchantment; aided too, as it was, by the fever which worked a temporary insanity in his frenzied brain.

Scarcely did he thus find himself travestied into a wer-wolf through the influence of his shaggy vesture, ere he darted forth from the hut, through the forest and into the open country—white with hoar-frost, and across which the bitter north-east wind swept—howling in a frightful manner, and traversing the meadows, fallows, plains, and marshes, like a phantom. But at that hour, and during such a season, not a single belated way-farer was there to encounter Hugues, whom the keenness of the air and the excitation of his run had worked up to the highest pitch of extravagance and audacity. He howled the louder in proportion as his hunger waxed sharper.

Suddenly the heavy rumbling of an approaching vehicle arrested his attention. At first with indecision, next with a stolid fixity of purpose, he struggled with two suggestions counselling him at one and the same moment—to flee and to advance. The carriage, or whatever it might be, continued rolling towards him. The night was not so obscure but that he was able to descry the tower of Ashford Church at a short distance off, and hard by which stood a pile of unhewn stone, destined either for the execution of some repair, or addition to the sacred edifice, into the deep shadow of which he ran furtively to crouch down, and so await the coming up of his prey.

It proved to be the covered cart of Willieblud, the Ashford flesher, who was wont twice a week to carry meat to Canterbury, and travelled by night in order that he might be among the first at market opening. Of this Hugues was fully aware, and the departure of the flesher naturally suggested to him the inference that his niece must be keeping house by herself, for our lusty flesher had been long a widower. For an instant he hesitated whether he should introduce himself, thus strangely accoutred, to the maiden—favorable as the opportunity seemed—or whether he should first attack the uncle and seize upon the viands. Hunger, for the nonce, got the better of love; and the monotonous whistle with which the driver was, as usual, urging forward his sorry jade, warning him to be in readiness for his onset, he suddenly howled in a loud and unearthly tone, at the same moment that he rushed forward and seized the horse by the bit.

"Willieblud, flesher!" growled Hugues, disguising his voice, and speaking to him in the lingua Franca of that period: "I hunger; throw me two pounds of meat if thou wouldst live and have me live."

"St. Wini-fred have mercy upon me!" cried the terrified flesher; "is it though, Hugues Wulfrie, of Weald Marsh, the born wer-wolf?"

"Thou sayest sooth; it is I," replied Hugues, who had the ready address to avail himself of the credulous superstition of Willieblud. "I would rather have raw beef than eat of thy flesh, plump as thou art. Throw me, therefore, what I crave, and forget not to be ready with a like portion each time thou settest out for Canterbury market; or, failing thereof, I'll tear thee limb from limb."

Hugues, to display his attributes of a wer-wolf before the gaze of the terrified flesher, had sprung upon the spokes of the wheel, and placed his forepaw upon the edge of the cart, over which he made a semblance of snuffing with his false snout. Willieblud, who believed in wolves as devoutly as he did in his patron saint, had no sooner perceived this monstrous paw than, uttering a fervent invocation to the latter, he seized upon his daintiest joint of meat, let it fall to the ground, and whilst Hugues sprang eagerly down to pick it up, the flesher at the same instant dealt a sudden and sharp blow on his beast's flank, on which the latter set off at a sharp gallop without waiting for any reiterated invitation from the lash.

Hugues, satiated with a repast which had cost him far less trouble to procure than any he had long remembered, readily promised himself the renewal of an expedient the execution of which was at once so easy and diverting; for, though smitten with the charms of the fair-haired Branda, he not the less found a malicious pleasure in augmenting the terror of her Willieblud. The latter, for a long while, revealed not to living being the tale of his late encounter and strange compact with Hugues, but submitted uncomplainingly to the impost levied each time the wer-wolf crossed his path, without being very nice about either weight or quality of the meat. He no longer even waited to be asked for it; anything rather than encounter that fiend-like form clinging to the side of his cart, or being brought into close contact with that hideous, misshapen paw, stretched forth, as it were, to strangle him—that paw, too, which once had been a human hand. The flesher, moreover, had become moody and morose of late; he set out to market reluctantly, and seemed to dread the hour of departure as it drew nigh, and no longer beguiled the dulness of his nocturnal journey by whistling to his horse, or by troling snatches of ballads, as he was wont formerly. Willieblud now invariably returned home in a gloomy and restless mood.

Branda, at a loss to conceive what had given rise to this new and permanent depression that had taken hold of her uncle's mind, after in vain exhausting conjecture, proceeded to interrogate, importune and supplicate him by turns; until the unhappy flesher, no longer proof against such continuous appeals, at last disburdened herself of the load which he had at heart, by recounting the history of his nocturnal adventures with the wer-wolf.

The quick-witted Branda listened demurely and patiently to the entire story without offering either comment or query. At its close:

"Hugues is no more a wer-wolf than thou art!" exclaimed she, hurt that such an injurious suspicion should be entertained against one for whom she had long felt something more than interest. "'Tis an idle tale, or some juggling device. I fear me thou must of a verity dream those sorceries, uncle Willieblud; for Hugues, of the Weald Marsh, or Wulfrie, as the silly fools call him, is worth far more, I trow, than his reputation goes."

"Girl, it boots not saying me nay in this matter," replied Willieblud, pertinaciously urging the truth of his story. "The family of Hugues, as everybody knows, were wer-wolves born; and since they are all of late, by the blessing of Heaven, defunct, save one, Hugues himself now, of a verity, inherits the wolf's paw."

"I tell thee, and will avouch it openly, uncle, that Hugues is of too gentle and seemly a nature to serve Satan, and turn himself into a wild beast, and that will I never believe until I have seen the same."

"Mass! and that thou shalt right speedily, if thou wilt but along with me. In very sooth, 'tis he. Besides, when he made confession of his name, did I not recognize his voice? and am I not ever bethinking me of his knavish paw, with which he grasps the cart shaft while he stays the horse? Girl, mark me, he is in league with the foul fiend."

Branda had to a certain degree imbibed the lycanthropic superstition in the abstract, as well as her uncle; saving, so far as it concerned the hitherto, as she believed, traduced being on whom her reflections, as though in feminine perversity, had so strangely lighted. Her womanish curiosity, in this instance, less determined her resolution to accompany the flesher on his next journey, than the desire to exculpate her lover—fully believing the strange tale of her kinsman's encounter with and spoliation by the latter to be the effect of some strange illusion, and of which to find Hugues guilty was the sole dread she experienced on mounting the rude vehicle laden with its customary viands.

It was just midnight when they started from Ashford, the hour alike dear to wer-wolves as to goblins of every other denomination. Hugues was punctual at the appointed spot. His howlings, as they drew nigh, though horrible enough, had still something human in them, and disconcerted not a little the confidence of Branda. Willieblud, however, trembled even more than she did, and sought for the wolf's portion; the latter raised himself upon his hind legs, and extended one of his fore-paws to receive the mulctuary dole as soon as the cart stopped at the heap of stones.

"Uncle, I shall swoon with fright," exclaimed Branda, clinging closely to the flesher, and tremblingly pulling the coverchief over her eyes; "loose rein and smite thy beast, or evil will surely betide us."

"Thou art not alone gossip," cried Hugues, fearful of a snare; "if thou essay'st to play me false, certes thou'rt at once undone."

"Harm us not, friend Hugues, thou know'st I weigh not my pounds of meat with thee; I shall take heed to keep my troth. It is Branda, my niece, who goes with me to-night to buy wares at Canterbury."

"Branda with thee? By the mass 'tis she indeed, more buxom and rosy, too, than ever; come, pretty one, descend and tarry awhile, that I may have speech with thee."

"I conjure thee, good Hugues, terrify not so cruelly my poor wench, who is well-nigh dead already with fear; suffer us to hold our way, for we have far to go, and to-morrow is early market-day."

"Go thy ways then alone, Uncle Willieblud; 'tis thy niece I would have speech with, in all courtesy and honor; the which, if thou permittest not readily and of a good grace, I will rend thee both to death."

All in vain was it that Willieblud exhausted himself in prayers and lamentation, in hopes of softening the bloodthirsty wer-wolf, as he believed him to be—refusing as the latter did every sort of compromise in avoidance of his demand, and at last replying only by horrible threats, which froze the hearts of both. Branda, although especially interested in the debate, neither stirred foot nor opened her mouth, so greatly had terror and surprise overwhelmed her. She kept her eyes fixed upon the wer-wolf, who peered at her likewise through his mask, and felt incapable of offering resistance, when she found herself forcibly dragged out of the cart, and deposited, as it seemed to her, by an invisible power, beside the heap of stones. She swooned without uttering a single scream.

The flesher was no less dumbfounded at the turn the adventure had taken; and he too fell back among his meat, as though stricken by a blinding blow. He fancied that the wolf had swept his bushy tail violently across his eyes, and on recovering the use of his senses, found himself alone in the cart, which was rolling along joltingly at a rapid pace towards Canterbury. At first he listened, but in vain, for the wind to bring him either the shrieks of his niece, or the howlings of the wolf; but stop his beast he could not, which, panic-stricken, kept tearing on as though bewitched, or that she felt the spur of some fiend pricking her flanks.

Willieblud, however, reached his journey's end in safety, sold his meat, and returned to Ashford; reckoning full sure upon having to say a miserere for his niece, whose fate he had not ceased to bemoan during the whole way. But how great was his astonishment to find her safe at home, a little pale from her recent fright and want of sleep, but without even a scratch. Still more was he astonished to hear that the wer-wolf had done her no injury whatever; contenting himself, after she had recovered from her swoon, with conducting her back to their dwelling, and acting in every respect like a loyal suitor, rather than a sanguinary wer-wolf. Willieblud knew not what to think of it.

This nocturnal gallantry towards his niece had additionally irritated the brrly Saxon against the wer-wolf; and although the fear of reprisals kept him from making a direct and public attack upon Hugues, he ruminated not the less upon taking some sure and secret revenge. But previous to putting his design into execution, it struck him that he could not do better than relate his misadventure to the ancient sacristan and parish gravedigger of St. Michael's—a worthy of profound sagacity in those matters, who being, moreover, endowed with a clerk-like erudition, was consulted as an oracle in glamour by all the old crones and lovelorn maidens throughout the township of Ashford and its vicinity.

"Slay a wer-wolf thou canst not," was the repeated rejoinder of the wisacre to the earnest inquiries of the tormented flesher; "for his hide is proof against spear or arrow, though vulnerable to the edge of a cutting weapon of steel. I counsel thee to deal him a slight flesh wound, or cut him over the paw, in order to know of a surety whether it be Hugues or no. Thou'lt run no danger, save thou strik'st him a blow from which blood flows not therefrom; for so soon as his skin is severed he taketh flight."

Resolving to follow implicitly the sacristan's advice, Willieblud that same evening determined to know with what sort of wer-wolf he had to do; and with that view hid his cleaver, newly sharpened for the occasion, under the meat in his cart; and held himself ready to make good use of it, as a preparatory step towards identifying Hugues as the audacious spoliator of his meat, and eke his peace. The wolf-man on this occasion presented himself as usual, and anxiously inquired after Branda, which stimulated the flesher the more firmly to follow out his design.

"Here, wolf," said Willieblud, stooping over the cart as if to choose a piece of meat; "I give thee double portion to-night. Up with thy paw, take toll, and be mindful of my frank alms."

"In sooth I will remember thee, gossip," rejoined our wer-wolf; "but when shall the marriage be solemnized for certain 'twixt me and the pretty Branda?"

Hugues believing he had nothing to fear from the flesher, whose meats it was his wont so illicitly to appropriate to himself, and of whose fair niece he hoped also to take shortly lawful possession—both that he really loved her, and viewed his union with her as the surest means of replacing him within the pale of that sociality from which he had been so long and so unjustly exiled, could he but succeed in making intercession with the fathers of the church so far as to obtain a removal of their interdict—Hugues, as usual, placed his expectant paw upon the edge of the cart; whereupon, instead of handing him his joint of beef or mutton, Willieblud raised his cleaver, and, at a single blow, lopped off the member laid there as fittingly for the purpose as though upon a block. Having dealt the blow, the flesher flung down his weapon and belabored his beast; at the same time the maimed wer-wolf howled aloud with agony, and then disappeared like a phantom amongst the dark shades of the forest, in which, aided by the wind, his howls and moans were soon lost to the ear.

The flesher, on his return home next day, chuckling and laughing, deposited a gory cloth upon the table among the trenchers with which his niece was busied in preparation of their noontide meal, and which wrapper, on being unfolded, displayed to her terrified gaze a freshly-severed human hand, enveloped in a wolfskin glove. Branda, intuitively guessing what had happened, shrieked aloud, shed a flood of tears, and then hurriedly threw her mantle around her, whilst her uncle was amusing himself by turning and twitching about the lopped hand with a ferocious delight, exclaiming, as he wiped up the blood which still flowed from it—

"The sacristan said sooth; the wer-wolf hath his meed, I trow, at last. And now I wot of his nature, I fear no further his witchcraft."

Although the day was far advanced, Hugues lay writhing in torture upon his wretched couch, his habiliments drenched with gore, as was also the floor of his hut. His visage, of a ghastly pallor, expressed as much moral as physical suffering. Tears gushed at intervals from beneath his red and swollen eyelids, and he listened to every sound without doors with an increasing inquietude, painfully visible upon his distorted features. At last he distinguished footsteps rapidly approaching his dismal abode; the door was hastily flung open, and, to his surprise, a female knelt beside his couch, and with mingled sobs and imprecations sought tenderly for his mutilated wrist, which, rudely swathed in hempen wrappings, no longer strove to conceal the absence of its hand, and from which a crimson stream still trickled. At so piteous a sight the tender-hearted maiden grew loud in her denunciations of the sanguinary flesher, and sympathetically mingled her lamentations with those of his victim.

These effusions of love and grief, however, were doomed to sudden interruption. Some one knocked at the shattered door of the wretched abode. Branda sprang to the loophole which served for a window, in order that she might see who the visitor might be that had dared to penetrate to the lair of a wer-wolf, and on recognizing him, raised her hands and eyes towards heaven in silent token of the extremity of her despair, while the knocking momentarily grew louder and louder.

"Tis my uncle," she whispered, in faltering accents. "Ah! woe's me! how shall I escape hence without his seeing me?—whither hide? Oh, here, here, nigh to thee, Hugues, and we will die together;" and she crouched herself down in a dark recess behind his couch. "Should Willieblud raise his cleaver to slay thee, he shall first strike through thy Branda's body."

So saying, she hastily hid her pretty little form amongst a pile of undressed hemp, at the same time whispering Hugues to summon all his courage; who, poor fellow, scarce found strength enough to raise himself to a sitting posture, whilst his languid gaze vainly sought around for some weapon of defence.

"A good day to thee, Wulfrie!" sneered Willieblud, as he stepped into the hut, holding in his hand a cloth folded and tied in a knot, which he flung down upon an old coffer standing beside the wounded man; "I come to proffer thee work, knowing that thou art no laggard at billhook and wattle. Wilt bind and stack me a faggot pile? Wilt do it, I say?"

"I am sick," replied Hugues, repressing the bitter wrath he felt at heart, and which, despite the physical suffering he was undergoing, flashed in his wild and haggard glances, "I am not in fitting trim for work."

"Sick, gossip—sick art thou, indeed? Or is it only a sloth fit? Come, come, what ails thee? Let us see where lieth the malady. Your hand, that I may feel how beateth thy pulse."

Hugues' pallid cheek reddened, and for an instant he hesitated whether he should resist a solicitation, the object of which he too readily comprehended; but in order to avoid exposing the tender-hearted damsel to her uncle's discovery, the maimed lover thrust forth his left hand from beneath the coverture, all imbrued with dried gore.

"Not that hand, Hugues; let's have the other—the right one. Body o' me, man, hast lost thy fist, and must I find it for thee?"

Hugues, whose flush of rage had alternately deepened and turned to a deathlike hue, replied not to this taunt, nor testified by the slightest gesture or movement that he was about to comply with a request as cruel in the nature of its preconcertation as the object of it was slenderly cloaked. Willieblud laughed with a loud, coarse laugh, and ground his great teeth together in savage glee, maliciously revelling in the mental torture he saw clearly he was now inflicting upon the sufferer. He seemed disposed to use violence rather than allow himself to be baffled in the attainment of the decisive proof he aimed at. Already had he commenced untying the napkin, giving vent all the while to a string of pitiless taunts—one hand only displaying itself outside the coverture, and which Hugues well-nigh senseless with anguish, thought not of withdrawing.

"Why tender me that hand?" continued his unrelenting persecutor, as he imagined himself on the eve of arriving at the conviction he so persistently sought for—"that I should lop it off? Quick! quick! Master Wulfrie, and do my bidding! I demand to see your right hand."

"Behold it then!" ejaculated a feigned voice, which belonged to no supernatural being, however it might seem appertaining to such; and Willieblud, to his utter confusion and dismay, saw a right hand, sound and unimpaired, extend itself towards him, as though in silent accusation. He started back, stammered out a cry for mercy, bent his knees for an instant, and then raising himself, palsied with terror, fled from the hut, which he firmly believed to be in the possession of the foul fiend. So great was his consternation, that he left behind him the severed hand, which from that moment became a perpetual vision ever present before his bewildered mind, and which all the potent exorcisms of the sacristan, at whose hands he continually sought counsel and consolation, signally failed to dispel.

"Oh that hand! To whom, then, belongs that accursed hand?" groaned Willieblud, despondingly. "Is it really the fiend's, or that of some wer-wolf? Certain 'tis that Hugues is innocent, for did I not see both his hands? But wherefore was one all bloody? There's sorcery at the bottom of it, nathless!"

The next morning early, the first object that struck his sight on entering his stall was the severed hand that he had left the preceding night upon the coffer in the forest hut. It was stripped of its wolfskin glove, and lay all gaunt and livid among the flesher's viands. Such was his trepidation at the spectacle that he no longer dare touch the phantom hand, which now he verily believed to be enchanted; but, hoping to get rid of it at once and forever, he had it flung into a well; and it was with no slight increase of perturbation that he found it shortly afterwards lying exposed upon his block in the vending booth. He next buried it in his garden, but still without being able to rid himself of the haunting apparition. It returned more livid and loathsome than ever to infect his shop, and augment the remorse which was unceasingly revived by the reproaches of his niece.

At length, flattering himself with the hope of escaping all further persecution from that fatal hand, it struck him that he would have it carried to the cemetery at Canterbury, and try whether solemn exorcism and sepulture in consecrated ground would bar effectually its return to the air and light of day. This was duly done. But lo! on the following morning, to his horror and mortification, he perceived it uiled to his shutter. Disheartened thoroughly by these dumb though awful reproaches, which entirely robbed him of his peace, and impatient to annihilate all trace of an action with which Heaven itself seemed to upbraid him, he quitted Ashford one morning without bidding adieu even to his niece, and some days after was found drowned in the river Stour. They drew out his swollen and discolored body, which had been discovered floating on the surface among the sedge, and it was only by piecemeal that they succeeded in tearing away from his death-contracted clutch the phantom hand, which, in his suicidal convulsions, he had retained rigidly grasped.

A year after this event, Hugues Wulfrie, although minus a hand, and therefore a confirmed wer-wolf, married the pretty Branda, his faithful leman, and sole heiress to the stock and chattels of her uncle, the late unhappy flesher of Ashford.

Lycanthropy—which the foregoing tale attempts to illustrate—is a superstition of very remote antiquity, and has long been involved in much obscurity. It pervaded Greece, Rome, and the Germanic nations, and in all probability came down to them from the Chaldeans and those nomadic people who had to defend their flocks from the attacks of wolves. The terror that those ferocious factors, who, assuming the guise of furious wolves, were the better enabled to perpetrate acts of theft or vengeance. Hence seems to have been derived a superstition which has prevailed through all ages and nations under different names, and surrounded by circumstances and features more or less strange. Lucian and Pliny, among the pagans, as well as the ghostly councils and the skillful leeches of the Middle Ages, busied themselves by turns with the lycanthropes, alike in cursing, excommunicating and curing them. When Gervoise of Tilbury flourished (in the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I.) the extirpation of British wolves was very far from being complete, so that strong vestiges of this superstition were yet in our island. "We have frequently seen," he says, "men in England transformed into wolves for the space of a lunar month, and such people are called gerulphs (garoux) by the French, and wer-wolves by the English." Camden, in his notice of the county of Tipperary, says they have "a report of men turned every year into wolves," but adds that he accounts it fabulous.

Wer-wolf (man-wolf) is supposed to be an exact equivalent to the Greek word lycanthropus—were being, in Anglo-Saxon, a man; whence some derive the were-gild, or composition money paid for homicide.

The only practical joke in which Richard Harris Barham (better known by his nom de plume of "Thomas Ingoldsby") ever personally engaged, was enacted when he was a boy at Canterbury. In company with a school-fellow, D—, he entered a Quaker meeting-house, when, looking round at the grave assembly, the latter held up a penny tart, and said solemnly "Whoever speaks first shall have this pie." "Go thy way, boy," said a drab-colored gentleman, rising; "go thy way, and ——" The pie's yours, sir!" exclaimed D—, placing it before the astounded speaker, and hastily effecting his escape.

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 323 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1865.

GEN. McDOWELL AND HIS RECORD.

WHEN General McDowell came to this coast as the Commander of the Military Department of the Pacific his record was before the people. From the earliest commencement of the war until a period but little prior to his leaving the East, he was actively engaged in it, and participated in nearly all the great movements that were planned or executed. As every man occupying a public position will have, he had his friends and his enemies, the former having decidedly the advantage in point of number. His military movements were subject to severe criticism occasionally, and his motives were, of course, from the nature of the circumstances which surrounded him, open at times to misconstruction. Gen. McClellan looked upon him as a rival and believed him to be an enemy; and when the corps of which Gen. McDowell was in command was detached from the Army of the Potomac to be organized as the Army of the Rappahannock and assigned to the defence of Washington, subsequently being ordered to advance upon Richmond independently by the way of Fredericksburg, numerous complaints, loud and deep, went up from Gen. McClellan and his principal officers then fixed in the mud of the Peninsula, as well as from their political friends at home. Gen. Fitz John Porter declared that Gen. McDowell had plotted the destruction of Gen. McClellan, and Gen. Butterfield, sitting in his tent, declared that if he were killed in the Peninsular campaign he wished it to be distinctly understood that Gen. McDowell had murdered him.

During all this time the General who was thus flung under a cloud of misinterpretation was silent. He was never heard to lift up his voice in his own defence, he never once rushed into print. The admirers and supporters of McClellan—and at that period of the war their name was legion, both in the army and out—were loud in their denunciation, but, without making answer at all, the object of their anathemas quietly pursued his way, marching upon and capturing Fredericksburg according to the letter of his instructions, and at this latter place organizing his army for the contemplated advance upon Richmond by the line of the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroad.

It was while thus organizing his army that the orders for the guarding of rebel property were issued in his Department—orders to which the hot and Hon. Ben. Wade took exception in the Senate, and which the Gold Hill News of the 13th inst., we observe, makes the text of an uncomplimentary, and, we regret to add, a most unjust article. Believing that our cotemporary will be only too glad to be set right in a mistake under which it evidently labors as to the real tenor and purport of those orders, we at this point indulge in a slight digression for the sake of making an explanation.

As has already been remarked, Gen. McDowell was at that time organizing his army for an advance upon Fredericksburg. He had nearly 40,000 troops under his command, many of whom were new recruits while others had been detached from commands in which the utmost license prevailed, with scarcely an attempt at discipline. It is scarcely worth while to multiply upon the necessity of discipline in an army, for it must be plain that without it a body of soldiers descends at once to the level of a badly-organized mob. Blenker's command had become a by-word the country through, and the name of that General had given a new phrase to the language, it being customary when any thing was stolen to speak of it as having been "Blenkered." On the march half his men were straggling from their companies, robbing dairies and sucking eggs, and it is to the demoralization that prevailed among them that the escape of Jackson from the Shenandoah Valley, when pursued by Fremont, is in a great measure to be attributed. Gen. McDowell was determined that a different order of things should be the rule in his command, and took early measures to secure it. His camp at Fredericksburg was for some time a camp of drill and organization. Very many of the soldiers on first joining it were under the mistaken impression that they shouldered muskets to have a holiday time, and that plunder and rapine were to constitute their privileges if not their serious occupation. General McDowell speedily convinced them to the contrary. Orders were issued that all private property should be respected. Rations were plenty, and there was seldom necessity for "foraging upon the enemy." When, as sometimes happened, the contrary was the case, foraging parties were sent out under the command of proper officers; but no skirmishing around of soldiers on their own hook, devastating private dwellings and outraging and insulting women, was ever permitted. If fences were pulled down, the company that did the mischief was ordered out to replace them with rails which themselves had to split, and the offence was seldom repeated. In issuing these orders for the respecting and if necessary the guarding of property, Gen. McDowell hinted at his reasons. His was an army of occupation; Fredericksburg when he moved would probably become his base of operations. The farms and the fields of the vicinity were in full bloom and flower; the grain which they contained could be made serviceable for the use of his armies when the campaign was advanced—why should he permit it to be trampled down and destroyed when no good could result but only evil in the wanton spirit it would necessarily engender among the soldiery? So fences were ordered to be let alone. So far as hen-roosts and dairies were concerned, it was of first importance that the men should be taught to respect themselves and their officers. It was not so much for the sake of the "rebel property" itself that they were to be restrained from plunder as it was for the purpose of teaching them discipline, and inculcating them with the idea that orders must be obeyed. And so great was his success in this respect that a more orderly and soldierly body of men than that army of the Rappahannock presented when the ripe time came for its march upon Richmond never flashed bayonets in the sun. The fields were as green as though the tramp of armed men had never sounded through the lanes, and the feeling on the part of the inhabitants was one of respect towards an army which they had been led to believe was simply a horde of Goths and Vandals. And at this very time the Hon. Ben Wade, taking his fat ease in his Senate seat, was declaring against Gen. McDowell for "using the soldiers to guard the pigs, chickens, and fences of our enemies instead of fighting them in the field!" It never occurred to that gentleman that the railroad from Aquia Creek had to be rebuilt, a line of communication established, and, that while this was being done, drill and discipline were the most effectual means of keeping the men out from that mischief which idleness breeds.

The contemplated movement upon Richmond was arrested at 12 o'clock at night of the day when the army was under orders to march before the next morning's sun, by a telegram from Washington that Jackson had beaten Banks back with terrible defeat, and an order to Gen. McDowell to hasten with half his command to assist in driving the bold rebel from the Valley of the Shenandoah—then a valley of humiliation and defeat—before he succeeded in swooping down upon the capital, as was evidently his intention. Had the original movement gone on, such an army as has been got together at no other time during the war would have been hurled against the northern gates of Richmond; and while the trained and disciplined men of that army were knocking at those gates, the country at large, and Ben Wade as well, would have learned to what purpose they had previously been employed in "guarding rebel property on the Rappahannock."

With the rest of Gen. McDowell's record the public is so familiar that we will not weary them with its repetition. He was blamed by some newspaper critics, but we venture to say that he was never abused until he came to California. Never a line did he write for publication during his Eastern career; at no time, even when subjected to the severest and most unjust criticism and misrepresentation, did he rush into print. A Court of Inquiry, which he demanded and obtained, cleared his skirts of all the imputations which were brought against him, and quietly and without complaint he accepted enforced inaction until work was found for him to do. Assigned to the command of the Military Department of the Pacific, he was saluted on his arrival here with salvos of praise and commendation from all quarters, some of which, perhaps, had scarcely taken the trouble to familiarize themselves with his previous career. Whether any effect was produced upon him or not by the tributes we cannot say, but we fancy not. Subsequently, when it was found that he paid very little attention to what was said or printed about him, whether good or bad, not exactly refusing to be dictated to, but somehow seeming not to hear the instructions vouchsafed him, and manifesting a strange want of intention to act upon or be governed by them—then it was that he received a salute which we imagine his ears had been strangers to before. Quiet and rather retiring in his habits, occupied with the duties of his new command and striving to familiarize himself with its requirements by personal inspection, unconscious, probably, of offence to any one within the bounds of his jurisdiction, suddenly a score of batteries were opened upon him which have played unceasingly ever since; his private affairs were dragged before the public, his wife's name was paraded through the country as though it were the sign of a village inn, and what he ate, drank and wore made the subject of comment and criticism. That he is surprised we do not doubt, that he is disgusted we can believe; but that any other effect is produced upon him we do not for a moment imagine. The scream of shot and shell is worse than a newspaper cry, and the leaded matter which the mouths of muskets distribute is more terrible than any that was ever put in print. It may seem rather hard, after having been on several pretty well-fought fields, to have his loyalty impugned by those who have never yet proved theirs by volunteering to stand under fire; his discretion and military proficiency questioned by people who would make a sad muddle of affairs here if they stood in his shoes, and his private affairs dissemised by people who have no business with them; but to these annoyances he will get used in time, if he has not already. In the meantime it is likely that he will pursue his way as usual, doing his duty to the best of his ability, never replying to and possibly never reading the attacks which are made upon him. But we do wish for their own sakes that a portion of the press of this coast would ask themselves what cause they have had for their hue-and-cry; for we predict that some day they will be heartily ashamed of it and anxious and willing to blot out the record. It were quite as well to abuse the Administration at once as to thus shower mud upon a General who is known to stand high in its confidence and who has received an important appointment at its hands. Of the respect due to the commanding officer of a military Department like that of the Pacific, we will not speak, though a few thoughts suggest themselves in that connection.

THE WIRES WORKING.

AFTER a dreary suspension of telegraphic communication with the East, the wires have once more begun to throb with the news that should have been tingling in their veins during the past fortnight. A connection was effected on Thursday, or that day, at least, brought the first installment of delayed despatches. A horse and buggy brought these suspended messages from Julesburg to Mud Springs—it was between these two points that the poles had been destroyed and the wire removed—and from the latter place they were forwarded as speedily as the fleet wings of lightning could bring them.

In learning that all despatches have to pass through Mud Springs en route from the East, our public will perhaps come to understand how it is that they turn out about as clear as mud when they reach their destination at the newspaper offices of this coast.

During this interregnum of communication the daily papers have languished, for comments on the war news and speculations as to the movements of armies have hitherto formed their principal stock in trade. To write leaders without such material to work upon was very much like the feat which the unfortunate Israelites were called upon to perform in making bricks without straw. That these comments did not always make the news clear, adding, on the contrary, oftentimes to its contradictoriness, and that the explanations of the situations sometimes puzzled the people much more than the situations themselves, mattered not. Something to write about was all that was required, and this the telegraph never failed to furnish while it was in working order.

With the public at large the interruption did not seem to make much difference. Business went on as usual and speculations in greenbacks were undiminished. The fever of excitement which had become characteristic of our population since the application of the galvanic battery daily to their spines, in a great measure subsided, and they settled down to the probability that for a period they would have to await steamer arrivals for news, with a calm composure exceedingly creditable under the circumstances. The resignation with which this deprivation of the accustomed daily despatches was met, may perhaps be attributed to the want of faith which the multitude had arrived at as regarded anything transmitted over the wires. They had swung their hats exultingly one day over news which was contradicted the next, and indulged in premature celebrations over the capture of nearly every city or fortification which our armies have besieged during the war. Operations in greenbacks, based on the price of gold as transmitted by telegraph, often terminated disastrously for those who fancied that they had the inside track. In short, the working of the wires brought so many to grief, that no very emphatic indignation was expressed towards the experimental Indians who pulled them down. That the Indians had not before found out the means of annoyance, which the easy sundering of the wires stretched across their country placed within their power, has always surprised us; having now found it out, we imagine it will be long before they "let up" so that regular communication can be counted upon.

THE San Francisco Olympic Club will give a grand ball and exhibition, Wednesday evening, Feb. 22d, at Platt's Hall. In regard to the exhibition, the Club promise a more attractive entertainment than ever, introducing acrobatic and gymnastic feats of a different character from those heretofore given. The proceeds will be added to the building fund of the institution.

A PLEA FOR A COTEMPORARY.

[THE following communication in reference to divorces, and the system which one of our cotemporaries has adopted in their publication, touches a rather tender subject; but it is only by discussion that men are able to arrive at truth, and we are always happy to throw our columns open to argument if conducted in a proper manner. As regards the right of divorce so many different opinions are entertained that we prefer to turn the theme over to contributors for discussion, without mingling in it ourselves. It would seem, however, that if the law be competent to marry, it is also competent to separate. But where the ceremony is made a religious one, as it is in some churches which do not recognize a marriage unless it be performed by a clergyman, the case may be different. Where God does the joining together, it is evident enough that no man has either right or power to put asunder. An old minister in Massachusetts is very particular, in his performance of the marriage service, to say: "Those whom God hath joined together let no man nor court put asunder!" and the emphasis which he bestows upon the italicized words clearly enough proves that he resents the idea of civil interference with any work which is done under the color of his cloth.]

EDITOR CALIFORNIAN.—One of your cotemporaries has inaugurated the custom of printing divorces in the same manner that it does marriages, births, and deaths, and fault is found on some sides with the practice. It is argued that it is treating a serious matter too lightly, and familiarizing the public mind with facts which ought to be kept as far from contemplation as possible. Looking at the innovation complained of in a common-sense light, however, I see little in it to censure or condemn. Death is quite as serious a matter as divorce, and sometimes marriage proves more serious than either and yet, most well-conducted journals publish these events in regular lists. The publication of births has always been considered of rather questionable taste, since these little affairs are ones which concern only the family immediately interested, and can be of no possible consequence to the world outside. Friends are pretty certain to hear the news in due course of time, without looking in public journals for it.

But with marriages, deaths and divorces the case is different. The sojourner in the valley of the Sacramento, for instance, reading in an Eastern paper the marriage of a girl between whom and himself rings and vows had passed, would probably settle down to his work after the first moment of disappointment was over and endeavor to become a good and creditable Californian. So, too, if he heard of the death of his betrothed, his parents, or any other near relative. Unless published in the regular lists to which one turns for this sort of intelligence, the news might escape him, for one never wades through all the thousand and one items that are sown and sprinkled over the face of a daily newspaper. And here you have a plea for the style of publishing divorces which your cotemporary has adopted; for the same argument holds good. If that same sojourner in the valley of the Sacramento see that an early love has been divorced, he having acquired wealth in the meanwhile and all things being equal, he can then return home and marry her with a safe conscience. If he saw that his father and mother had been divorced, however, the chances are that he wouldn't want to return home at all, but would be ever content to remain a Californian. Even in this event it will be seen that some one would be spared a useless journey and perhaps put into a way for making a fortune by holding on to claims, mining or petroleum, instead of selling out.

I have an idea, speaking seriously about a serious subject, that this matter of divorce is not altogether understood by those of your cotemporaries who find fault with their neighbor. It was indeed sad to see those whom God had joined together put asunder, but sometimes it is simply a Justice of the Peace who has done the coupling, and then the case is different. Looking through the thronging instances of matrimonial difficulties which come out in every day's newspaper, and reflecting that these are only the bubbles that occasionally break to the surface, telling the seething that is continually going on below, how can the friendly intervention of the law be looked upon with abhorrence or as something to be slummed away in some obscure corner of a public print? Wife-whippers are every day committed in the Police Court; rarely ever does a day go by that some poor woman does not mount the witness stand, showing discolored arms and a bruised body as evidences of a husband's brutality. Every now and again a darker tragedy is brought to light, and the extreme sentence of the law is passed upon a wife murderer. Surely divorces under such circumstances are to be regarded as the most necessary of necessary evils, quite as joyful as marriages, and infinitely less sad than deaths.

No objection is made to the publication of regular lists of deaths. Does it ever occur to the censors for whose benefit this article is written that death is very often a divorce, sent by a merciful hand, with whose provisions it would certainly be impious to quarrel? It must be remembered that the cases of matrimonial unhappiness which come to light in police reports and the pages of public journals generally occur in the lower walks of life; the daily and hourly torment of some households in the upper ones are not often revealed. Without being positively brutal in his treatment a husband may torture his wife until she would choose a protracted service in the galleys to a residence in her own home, and both may feel that their marriage was a sad mistake. The law put them together; why, then may it not put them apart? Sad as the alternative may be, it is certainly better than that two people should live a lie, and go through the world with their hands joined together where their hearts are as far asunder as though a grave lay between them. If the mistakes which people very often make are published as marriages in regular lists, why not also publish the corrections to those mistakes, known as divorces, in similar form? A table of errata should always be provided for, and postscripts are sometimes as necessary as original documents. Seeing the many errors which are made in matrimonial conjunctions it sometimes occurs to me that marriage certificates should have "E. E." written upon them like some other bills of sale and all accounts current. It is scarcely worth while to waste words over mere sentimentalities when the plain fact seems to be that in this country divorces are so necessary, so regular, and so frequent, that your cotemporary is compelled to assign a department to them for convenience's sake, and when the probabilities are that each separation chronicled makes two persons happy, whereas their union made only one. After all, our climate is perhaps chiefly to blame, its humidity at this season rendering it as difficult to make marriage contracts stick as though they were refractory revenue stamps.

OGINT.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

MISS HERON has occupied the Opera House stage since our last writing, Camille on Friday evening week giving place to Medea, which in its turn was supplanted by Gamea on Monday night last, this latter piece holding its ground during the entire week. In both of these plays Miss Heron justified her claim to the position she occupies as one of the greatest tragediennes of the day. At times as "Medea" her rendition of the character was positively startling from the force and dramatic intensity with which the contending passions of love, hatred and revenge were set forth, and in that terrible last scene where "Creusa," her rival, has fallen a victim to the poison she sends her, and her own children are offered up by the indignant mother in atonement for the great wrong did her by their father, while finally the reeking knife finds a bloody sheath in her own heart, she so wrought upon the audience that one and all forgot their usual custom of applauding at the most inopportune moment that offers, actually waiting until the curtain had fairly fallen and then atoning for their former surprised silence by the most vociferous rounds. As "Gamea" Miss Heron also has an opportunity of displaying her peculiar powers, interpreting the woes of the wronged mother, robbed of her child, with the most terrible fidelity and distinctness. It is one peculiarity of this lady's acting that she perfectly identifies herself with her part, entirely doing away with the impression that it is either Matilda Heron or Mme. Stoepl that occupies the stage. On the contrary, it is the heroine of the play, the suffering lorette or the betrayed mother, that is before us, and, wrapt in what seems the mortal agony of real woe, the audience forget that it is but illusion. The following tribute—too late for timely publication in last week's issue—comes to us accompanied by a note expressive of the author's admiration for Miss Heron and his opinion that her "Camille" is indeed a theatrical wonder":

A SONNET.

TO MISS MATILDA HERON, IN CAMILLE.

Thou marvel of all marvels, great Camille!
What genius is thine own who can conceive
Save those that thy magnetic power thus feel!
Perfection of all Art, that does not leave
One trace of the ideal! Like some master-piece
Of Painting or of Sculpture, that the more
And more entrances us, as o'er and o'er
Again we dwell upon it, so increase
Thy matchless beauties whensoever we gaze,
Yet leave us still unsated as before.
We read thee, as we read the verse whose blaze
E'er lights the soul to rapture and to praise,
Unmingled with the earthly, sad regret,
That thou art one the feelings can forget.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 18th, 1865.

H. W.

Owing to the success of Gamea, the management did not put Camille upon the stage Thursday night, as advertised. Of Gamea this evening witnesses the last production, as Margo, or The Mysteries of the Temple of Paris, another play of Miss Heron's composition, is in active preparation, and will probably be produced Monday evening. Miss Heron, during her engagement, receives excellent support from Mrs. Saunders, Mrs. Edwin, Mrs. Perry, Mr. Mayo, Mr. Aldrich, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Barry and the other members of the company.

At the Opera House this afternoon the attraction of a performance by the regular company, with the addition of a musical melange by the Minstrel troupe, is offered. These entertainments are expressly for the benefit of ladies and children, though gentlemen are admitted under a pledge of good behavior, and only half prices of admission are charged. The Minstrels, who fill the Academy of Music—with their melodies—nightly, drawing crowds to that abode of Birch, temple of Bacchus, and wigwam of Wambold, appear to-morrow evening on that stage in the usual Sacred Concert.

NEW YORK NEWS.

THE steamer of yesterday brings us dates from our New York correspondents to the 18th ult. Unfortunately the late hour at which distribution at the Post Office was effected prevents our giving them publication in this issue. Our correspondent informs us of the separation of Fitz Hugh Ludlow from his wife and narrates the circumstances; gives particulars of the death of Mrs. William H. Fry, the Tribune's musical critic, and author of the opera of Leonora; discusses the coming of Dumas, the character of G. A. Sala, the troubles of Private Miles O'Reilly; tells of a visit to Bayard Taylor, and in that furnishes an epitome of everything of interest occurring and talked of in the Metropolis. These letters will be published next week, and their gossip contents will be found eminently interesting.

They have some rich men in New York:

Peter Cooper, reports an income of $106,000, David Dndley Field $60,000, Cyrus Field $9,000, Mayor Gunther $13,400, street-sweeping Boole $418, Mr. Hudson, the managing editor of the Herald, $3,742, Robert Ilce (the press manufacturer) $50,000, and Fitz Hugh Ludlow, the author, $916.

The receipts of one of the New York dailies last year were $747,501, and the expenses $735,751, leaving a net profit of only $11,750. The expenses for white paper alone were $426,000.

From France we learn that Renan's Life of Jesus has sold in France to the number of 100,000, and the profits of publishers and author have been $100,000.

BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S.

The Perpetual Curate, by Mrs. Oliphant, is one of those quiet stories of English life which occasionally appear to offset the sensational ones of that school, which Miss Braddon and Mrs. Wood represent. It would be difficult indeed to make the record of a perpetual curate's outgoings, incomings and doings very thrilling, but in investing it with a certain sort of interest Mrs. Oliphant has succeeded very well.

A Tribute to Thomas Starr King is written by Richard Frothingham. It tells the boyhood and manhood of one whom we all knew and loved, but is singularly incomplete as regards Mr. King's California career, only a very few pages of the book being devoted to this most important era of his life. It was in California that Mr. King won his principal fame, it was here that he had a home in the hearts of all, and this city mourned for him as an Eastern one would scarcely have done. The years that he spent among us were emphatically ones of labor, and their record would be interesting to the world. It is a pity that in this particular Mr. Frothingham's book had not been more complete.

A very pretty edition of Shakspeare's sonnets has been printed by Ticknor & Fields. We scarcely propose to speak critically of any of this author's works at the present date.

Love in Marriage is a translation by Marguerite O. Stevens from the French of Guizot. It is an historical story, professing to narrate the real life of Lady Rachel Russell. Surely the title of the work should make a sensation in France, where the gentlemen always shrug their shoulders at the absurdity of a man's being in love with his own wife.

"Ik Marvel" has never written anything, to our liking, since his Dream Life, and Reveries of a Bachelor, Wet Days at Edgewood, which lies before us, inspires us with the idea of a man feeling it necessary to make a book and unwilling to let his reputation die. We question, however, whether it is not better occasionally to let a reputation rest, for the series of sketches comprised in the present volume will scarcely add to the pleasant memories which readers generally entertain of him, who told us what a bachelor thought of in his dreamy moments.

In Cousin Alice we have a memoir of Alice B. Haven, who under the nom de plume which forms the title of the book, has been known to children the country over for many a long day. Mrs. Haven was by her first marriage the wife of Jos. C. Neal, widely known as the author of "Charcoal Sketches." The life of an exemplary woman as well as a talented authoress could not fail to be interesting, and this we have in the memoir of Alice B. Haven.

THE TELEGRAPH NEWS.—Up to the hour of our going to press no news despatches have been received in the city. Private telegrams monopolize the wires for the time. When that business is done with, the public, who assuredly are more interested, will have an opportunity to hear what has been done in the Eastern world for two long mortal weeks, since the electric pulse ceased its throbbings.

In regard to the Peace rumors, we have a private despatch, dated as far back as February 4th, which states that the interview between the President, Mr. Seward, and the rebel Commissioners has resulted in nothing. Gold on the same day was quoted at 213.

BETTER float on the river tide out out to the broad ocean, and be lost in its immensity, than shrivel on some sand bank of life.

THE UNSEEN BATTLE-FIELD.

THERE is an unseen battle-field
In every human breast,
Where two opposing forces meet,
But where they seldom rest.

The field is veiled from mortal sight;
'Tis only seen by One,
Who knows alone where victory lies,
When each day's flight is done.

One army clusters strong and fierce—
Their chief of Demon-form;
His brow is like the thunder-cloud,
His voice the hursting storm.

His captains, Pride and Lust and Hate,
Whose troops watch night and day,
Swift to detect the weakest point,
And thirsting for the fray.

Contending with this mighty force
Is but a little band;
Yet there, with an unyielding front,
Those warriors firmly stand.

Their leader is a godlike form,
Of countenance serene,
And glowing on his naked breast
A simple Cross is seen.

His captains Faith, and Hope and Love,
Point to the wondrous sign,
And, gazing at it, all receive Strength from a source divine.

They feel it speaks a glorious truth—
A truth as great as sure—
That to be victors they must learn
To love, confide, endure.

That Faith sublime, in wildest strife,
Imparts a holy calm—
In every deadly blow a shield,
For every wound a balm.

And when they win that battle-field,
Past toil, is quite forgot;
The plain where carnage once had reigned
Becomes a hallowed spot—

A spot where flowers of joy and peace
Spring from the fertile sod,
And breathe the perfume of their hearts
In every breeze—to God.

NAPOLEN'S THREE WARNINGS.

[This little story is abridged from an old French feuilleton by Maria Aycard, one of the most fertile authors of such novellettes that ever undertook the task of amusing Paris. There was so much of the marvellous in Napoleon's whole career, that it would be hard to say when or where the anecdotes told respecting him diverge into fiction. Certainly he was an object of unbounded admiration, almost of idolatry, to thousands of whom he himself knew nothing, yet who would have preserved him from danger at the cost of their own lives.]

THE celebrated Fouché, Duke of Otranto, was retained but a short time, it was well known, in the service of the Bourbons, after their restoration to the throne of France. He retired to the town of Aix, in Provence, and there lived in affluent ease upon the gains of his long and busy career. Curiosity attracted many visitors around this remarkable man, and he was habitually free in communicating his reminiscences of the great events which it had been his lot to witness. On one occasion, the company assembled in his saloon heard from his lips the following story:

By degrees, as Napoleon assumed the power and authority of a king, everything about him, even in the days of the consulate, began to wear a court-like appearance. All the old monarchical habitudes were revived one by one. Among other revivals of this kind, the custom of attending mass previous to the hour of audience, was restored by Bonaparte, and he himself was punctual in his appearances at the chapel of Saint-Cloud on such occasions. Nothing could be more mundane than the mode of performing these religious services. The actresses of the opera were the chorists, and great crowds of busy talkative people were in the habit of frequenting the gallery of the chapel, from the windows of which the First Consul and Josephine could be seen, with their suites and friends. The whole formed merely a daily exhibition of the consular court to the people.

At one particular time, the punctuality of Bonaparte in his attendance on mass was rather distressing to his wife. The quick and jealous Josephine had discovered that the eye of her husband was too much directed to a window in the gallery, where there regularly appeared the form and face of a young girl of uncommon beauty. The chestnut tresses, brilliant eyes, and graceful figure of this personage, caused the more uneasiness to the consul's wife, as the stranger's glances were bent not less often upon Bonaparte than his were upon her. "Who is that young girl?" said Josephine one day at the close of the service; "what can she seek from the First Consul? I observed her drop a billet just now at his feet. He picked it up; I saw him." No one could tell Josephine who the object of her notice precisely was, though there were some who declared her to be an emigrant lately returned, and one who probably was desirous of the intervention of the First Consul in favor of her family. With such guesses as this, the consul's wife was obliged to rest satisfied for the time.

After the audience of that same day had passed, Bonaparte expressed a wish for a drive in the park, and accordingly went out, attended by his wife, his brother Joseph, Duroc, Cambaceres, and Hortense Beauharnois, wife of Louis Bonaparte. The King of Prussia had just presented Napoleon with a superb set of horses, four in number, and these were harnessed to an open chariot for the party. The consul took it into his head to drive in person, and mounted into the coachman's place. The chariot set off, but, just as it was turning into the park, it went crash against a stone at the gate, and the First Consul was thrown to the ground. He attempted to rise, but again fell prostrate in a stunned or insensible condition. Meanwhile, the horses sprung forward with the chariot, and were only stopped when Duroc, at the risk of his life, threw himself out and seized the loose reins. Josephine was taken out in a swooning state. The rest of the party speedily returned to the First Consul, and carried him back to his apartments. On recovering his senses fully, the first thing which he did was to put his hand into his pocket and pull out the slip of paper dropped at his feet in the chapel. Leaning over his shoulder, Josephine read upon it these words—"Do not drive out in your carriage to-day."

"This can have no allusion to our late accident," said Bonaparte. "No one could foresee that I was to play the part of a coachman to-day, or that I should be awkward enough to drive against a stone. Go, Duroc, and examine the chariot."

Duroc obeyed. Soon afterwards he returned very pale, and took the First Consul aside. "Citizen-consul," said he, "had you not struck the stone, and stopped our drive, we had all been lost!" "How so?" was the reply. "There was in the carriage, concealed behind the back seat, a bomb—a real, massive bomb, charged with ragged pieces of iron, and with a slow match attached to it—kindled! Things had been so arranged that, in a quarter of an hour, we should have been scattered among the trees of the park of Saint-Cloud. There must be treachery close at hand. 'Fouché must be told of this—Duroc must be warned!' 'Not a word to them!' replied Bonaparte; 'the knowledge of one plot but engenders a second. Let Josephine remain ignorant of the danger she has escaped. Hortense, Joseph, Cambaceres—tell none of them: and let the government journals say not a word about my fall.'"

The First Consul was then silent for some time. "Duroc," said he at length, "you will come to-morrow to mass in the chapel, and examine with attention a young girl whom I shall point out to you. She will occupy the fourth window in the gallery on the right; follow her home, or cause her to be followed, and bring me intelligence of her name, her abode, and her circumstances. It will be better to do this yourself; I would not have the police to interfere. Have you taken care of the bomb, and removed it?" "I have, citizen-consul." "Come, then, let us again drive in the park," said Bonaparte. The drive was resumed, but, on this occasion, the coachman was allowed to fulfil his own duties.

On the morrow, the eyes of more than one person were turned to the window in the gallery. But the jealous Josephine sought in vain for the elegant figure of the young girl. She was not there. The impatient First Consul, with his confident Duroc, were greatly annoyed at her non-appearance, and small was the attention paid by them to the service that day. Their anxiety was fruitless. The girl was seen at mass no more.

The summers of Napoleon were chiefly spent at Malmaison, the winters at St. Cloud and the Tuileries. Winter had come on, and the First Consul had been holding court in the great apartments of the last of these palaces. It was the third of the month, which the republicans well called nicose, and, in the evening, Bonaparte entered his carriage to go to the opera, accompanied by his aide-de-camp Lauriston, and Generals Lannes and Berthier. The vehicle was about to start, when a female, wrapt in a black mantle, rushed out upon the Place Carrousel, made her way into the middle of the guards about to accompany Napoleon, and held forth a paper to the latter, crying, "Citizen-consul! citizen-consul! read—read!" Bonaparte, with that smile which Bourrienne describes as so irresistible, saluted the petitioner, and stretched out his hand for the missive. "A petition, madam?" said he inquiringly; and then continued, "Fear nothing; I shall peruse it, and see justice done." "Citizen-consul!" cried the woman, imploringly joining her hands. What she would have further said was lost. The coachman, who, it was afterwards said, was intoxicated, gave the lash to his horses, and they sprung off with the speed of lightning. The First Consul, throwing into his hat the paper he had received, remarked to his companions, "I could not well see her figure, but I think the poor woman is young."

The carriage dashed rapidly along. It was just issuing from the street of Saint Nicholas, when a frightful detonation was heard, mingling with and followed by the crash of broken windows, and the cries of the injured passers-by. The infernal machine had exploded! Uninjured, the carriage of the consul and its inmates were whirled with undiminished rapidity to the opera. Bonaparte entered his box with serene brow and unruffled deportment. He saluted, as usual, the assembled spectators, to whom the news of the explosion came with all the speed which rumor exercises upon such occasions. All were stunned and stupefied; Bonaparte only was perfectly calm. He stood with crossed arms, listening attentively to the oratorio of Haydn, which was executed on that evening. Suddenly, however, he remembered the paper put into his hands. He took it out, and read these lines: "In the name of heaven, Citizen-Consul, do not go to the opera to-night, or, if you do go, pass not through the street Saint Nicholas!" The warning came in some respects too late.

On reading these words, the Consul chanced to raise his eyes. Exactly opposite to him, in a box on the third tier, sat the young girl of the chapel of Saint Cloud, who, with joined hands, seemed to utter prayers of gratitude for the escape which had taken place. Her head had no covering but her flowing and beautiful chestnut hair, and her person was wrapt in a dark mantle, which the Consul recognized as identical with that worn by the woman who had delivered the paper to him at the carriage door. "Go," said Bonaparte quietly but quickly to Lannes; "go to the box exactly opposite to us, on the third tier. You will find a young girl in a black mantle. Bring her to the Tuileries; I must see her, and without delay." Bonaparte spoke thus without raising his eyes, but, to make Lannes certain of the person, he took the General's arm, and said, pointing upwards: "See there—look!"

Bonaparte stopped suddenly. The girl was gone; no black mantle was to be seen. Annoyed at this beyond measure, he hurriedly sent off Lannes to intercept her. It was in vain. The box-keeper had seen such an individual, but knew nothing about her. Bonaparte applied to Fouché and Dubois; but all the zeal of these functionaries failed in discovering her.

Years ran on after the explosion of the infernal machine, and the strange accompanying circumstances which tended to make the occurrence more remarkable in the eyes of Bonaparte. To the consulate succeeded the empire, and victory after victory marked the career of the great Corsican. At length the hour of change came. Allied Europe poured its troops into France, and compelled the emperor to lay down the sceptre which had been so long shaken in terror over half the civilized earth. The isle of Elba became for a day the most remarkable spot on the globe; and, finally, the reassembled empire fell to pieces anew on the field of Waterloo.

Bonaparte was about to quit France. The moment had come for him to set foot in the bark which was to convey him to the English vessel. Friends, who had followed the fallen chief to the very last, were standing by to give him a final adieu. He waved his hand to those around, and a smile was on the lip which had lately given the farewell kiss to the imperial eagle. At this instant a woman broke through the band that stood before Napoleon. She was in the prime of woman's life; not a girl, but yet young enough to retain unimpaired that beauty for which she would at all times have been remarkable among a crowd of beauties. Her features were full of anxiety and sadness, adding interest even to her appearance at that moment. "Sire! sire!" said she, presenting a paper hurriedly; "read! read!"

The emperor took the paper presented to him, but kept his eye upon the presenter. He seemed, it may be, to feel at that instant the perfumed breeze in the park of Saint Cloud, or to hear the choristers chanting melodiously in the chapel, as he had heard them in other days. Josephine, Duroc, and all his friends, came haply before him, and among them the face which he was wont to see at the fourth window in the gallery. His eye was now on that countenance in reality, altered, yet the same. These illusory recollections were of brief duration. Napoleon shook his head, and held the paper up to his eye. After perusing its contents, he took it between his hands, and tore it to pieces, scattering the fragments in the air.

"Stop, sire!" cried the woman, "follow the advice! Be warned; it is yet time!"

"No," replied he: and taking from his finger a beautiful Oriental ruby, a valuable souvenir of his Egyptian campaigns, he held it out to the woman. She took it, kneeling and kissing the hand which presented it. Turning his head, Napoleon then stepped into the boat, which waited to take him to the vessel. Not long afterwards, he was pining on the rock of St. Helena.

Thus, of three warnings, two were useless because neglected until the danger had occurred, and the third—which prognosticated the fate of Napoleon if once in the power of his adversaries—the third was rejected.

"But who was this woman, Duke of Otranto?" "Oh," replied Fouché, "I know not with certainty. The emperor, if he knew ultimately, seems to have kept the secret."

All that is known respecting the matter is that a female, related to Saint Regent, one of the authors of the explosion of the Rue Saint Nicholas, died at the hospital of Hotel-Dieu in 1837, and that around her neck was found suspended, by a silk ribbon, the exquisite oriental ruby of Napoleon.

THE ONLY
First Premium
SEWING MACHINE
—IS THE—
GROVER & BAKER.

THE FLORENCE
NEVER HAS RECEIVED A PREMIUM
OVER ANY
First, Second, or Third Class
SEWING MACHINE!

We have already Published the fact that the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE was awarded the HIGHEST PREMIUM at the Oregon State Fair, and it was denied by the agent of the Florence Machine; we have proven it by affidavits from the President of the Society, and four of the five ladies who composed the Committee; the agent of the Florence replies that his statements and affidavits are of a later date than ours, and consequently ours must be a FABRICATION. Now, as we published no dates, he asserts this unwittingly, besides falsely, for each and all of ours are of much later dates, and have not been refuted in the most remote degree. For instance, he publishes Mrs. Griffin's card, bearing date December 13th. She gives us her affidavit, stating she WAS ENTIRELY MISREPRESENTED IN THE MATTER, AND DATED JANUARY 10TH. Also, he publishes Mrs. Miller's card, dated January 6th, and she gives us an explanation, and corroborates our right to the Premium under date of January 10th; and in answer to Mr. N. O. PARRISH and Mrs. Church, we append the statements of Mrs. J. W. J. Pierson and Mrs. P. E. Rogers, parties who are sufficiently well and favorably known in San Francisco to warrant due regard, in comparison with those who have been brought into the case from an adjoining State, where it will be borne in mind as a most striking and mysterious fact, that the agent of the Florence Machine has not in any manner denied our Premium, and has not dared publish any portion of the advertisement he has circulated here to the contrary, as the whole facts of the cases are too well known there to warrant him in such a daring outrage upon truth and right.

The undersigned represented and exhibited the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and hereby affirm that the whole statement of the agent of the Florence Sewing Machine, and of N. O. Parrish, their agent at Salem, and of Mrs. E. C. Church, relative to an examination of our machine by a self-styled committee, of which she was a member, etc., etc., to be grossly exaggerated, and without foundation in anything approaching truth.

It has always been customary for the President of the Society to appoint a Special Committee to act upon Sewing Machines. Of this fact Mr. Parrish was aware, and consulted with us on the subject on the first day of this Fair. This Special Committee was appointed as has been shown by Judge Thornton's affidavit, and examined and reported on both machines, and no other Committee did examine officially or report on either. Immediately on the decision being announced, the Blue Ribbon (significant of the first premium) was attached to the GROVER & BAKER Machine by the Clerk, and the report read by the President in the presence of Mr. N. O. Parrish, agent of the Florence, and by Mr. J. W. J. Pierson, agent of the "GROVER & BAKER." The statement of Mr. Parrish that the decision could not be ascertained until after the close of the Fair is simply ridiculous under the circumstances. The exhibition of our machines was conducted in the most honorable manner, and the remarks of Mr. Collins, (travelling agent for the Florence) that "they had expended $1,000, and would expend another $1,000, if necessary, to obtain the premium," was satisfactory evidence to his hearers that money and not merit was what they relied on for victory. The First Premium was awarded the "Grover & Baker" Machines, and was universally known during and after the Fair.

J. W. J. PIERSON,
MRS. P. E. ROGERS.

So much for "affidavits," and there the question of the Premium at the Oregon Fair rests. We have the Report, giving Grover & Baker the First Premium, in our possession, properly authenticated; also, all the affidavits necessary to substantiate it, and open to the inspection of any interested party. The Agent of the Florence Machine further over-steps the mark, and makes a statement which betokens either an ignorant or wilful and malicious falsifier. He says: "To be beaten, however, by a chain-stitch machine which, when exhibited in honorable competition with ANY lock-stitch machine, as has been shown by records of previous Fairs, HAS BEEN MORE FREQUENTLY CLASSED AS SECOND OR THIRD RATE THAN OTHERWISE, would be a disgrace indeed." Now we CHALLENGE Mr. Hill to show, in the first place, that the "Grover & Baker" is a CHAIN-STITCH MACHINE; and in the next, to name ANY State or County Fair during the past four years where a subtle, or misnamed lock-stitch, has not been beaten by the GROVER & BAKER, when in competition, and the premium awarded us; and further, that he will not and cannot name any one premium which the Florence Machine has ever received over any First, Second, or Third Class Machine in existence. For his enlightenment on this point we append a FEW of the Fairs at which the "Grover & Baker" was NOT classed second or third rate (?) BUT DEFEATED ALL OTHERS DURING 1864, viz.:

The Oregon State Fair, recently held at Salem, awarded the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, for the best Sewing Machine.

The Illinois State Fair, held at Springfield, recently awarded to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, the highest Premium for best Sewing Machine and Machine Work.

Two First Premiums were awarded to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, at the Michigan State Fair, recently held at Kalamazoo, viz.: for the best Family Sewing Machine and for the best machine work.

The Iowa State Fair, recently held at Burlington, awarded the First Premiums for the best Family Sewing Machine and the best machine for light and heavy work to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company.

Two First Premiums were awarded to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, for the best machines for family and manufacturing use, at the Wisconsin State Fair, recently held at Milwaukee.

The First Premium for the best Double-thread Sewing Machine and for the best machine work at the Pennsylvania State Fair of 1864, were awarded to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company.

Three First Premiums have been awarded to The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company at the Fair of the Queen's county (New York) Agricultural Society, recently held at Jamaica, viz.: For the best Family Machine, the best Manufacturing Machine, and the best machine work.

At the Westchester County (New York) Agricultural Fair, recently held at White Plains, the First Premiums for the Best Machine and the best machine work were awarded to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company.

Three First Premiums were awarded to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines, at the Cayuga county Agricultural Fair, recently held at Auburn, New York, viz.: For the best Family Machine, the best Manufacturing Machine, and the best Machine Work.

At the Franklin county (New York) Agricultural Fair, recently closed, three First Premiums were awarded to the Grover & Baker Machines, viz.: For the best Family machine, best Manufacturing machine, and best machine work.

The Orange County (New York) Agricultural Fair, recently held at Newburgh, awarded the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine.

The Scott county (Iowa) Fair, held at Davenport this fall, awarded two First Premiums to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, one for the best Family machines, and one for the best machine work.

The First Premium for the Best Sewing Machine and the best Machine work were awarded to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, at the Montgomery county (Pennsylvania) Fair this fall.

At the Montgomery County Fair, held in Montgomery county, Ohio, were awarded two First Premiums for the best Family Machine and for the best Machine work to the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company.

Of the personal application of a portion of his advertisement we shall make no newspaper argument; having on our part taken the initiative in personalities, we have no desire to continue them offensively before the public through the columns of a newspaper, but retract nothing we have heretofore said, and hold ourselves personally responsible for the same.

We welcome the "testimony" Mr. Hill is beginning to take, and assure him that neither "hy silence or otherwise" will we acknowledge aught but that his statements are an imposition upon the public, and that his course relative to the Oregon Fair and its award to the GROVER & BAKER machine is an outrage upon honorable competition. We trust that the next time he hazards his success in competition at any Fair, he will be able to give it the attention which he was unable (?) even with five representatives to give to the Salem Fair. The only drawback to his success will not be in the FORCE which represents the machine itself, which will never stand on equal ground with any first-class machine in existence. The GROVER & BAKER is too well and favorably known, for any such sarcasms from Mr. Hill as "second-class" to have weight with the public, who almost unanimously declare it the

"BEST IN USE."

R. G. BROWN,
Agent Grover & Baker S. M. Co.,
329 Montgomery street

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S
PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. McInturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of balling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quaint, builder; Philip Caduce, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN,

No. 28 Third street, San Francisco, del7-3m
Who will give all information about them.

ATKINS MASSEY,
UNDERTAKER,
(At the Old Stand.)
No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,
First house below Kearny street.
Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases, Office of the City
del3 tf and County Coroner.

NATHANIEL GRAY,
UNDERTAKER,
CITY AND COUNTY SEXTON,
641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,
Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC
BURIAL CASES and CASKETS.
del7-3m

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFFERED by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRETIEN PFISTER,
oc15-tf No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

GREGORY YALE,
ATTORNEY AT LAW,
OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. y2

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

401 Battery, cor. Clay,
ja25-tf San Francisco.

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large.

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other mal-practices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
ja25-tf 401 Battery, corner Clay,
San Francisco.

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGUARY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy; and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents for the Pacific Coast,
401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,
San Francisco.

Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-tf

(For the Californian.)

THE SONG AND THE SEA.

THE poet's song doth seem to me
 A slumberous breadth of tropic sea
 That in voluptuous metre panteth
 All in a deep delicious dream,
 When now and then the great sun granteth
 Floods of merry beams to stream
 Adown in one bright golden gleam
 Of light that revels in its splendor
 Upon the bosom of the waves;
 And then a drowsy wave awneth
 And creepeth to an isle and breaketh
 Upon the shore in melody,
 While feathery-foam entrancedly
 The limpid rosy-domed shell laves;
 And bubbly drift clings all along
 The smoothly yellow-sloping sands
 By shade of heaped cliffs, and throng
 Of tressed vines, in braided hands:
 And farther on the lowland's finger
 That pointeth westward ever truly,
 By twenty palms that climb the bluely
 Veined mist-walls of heaven linger
 The crystal tribute of the waves,
 That thither in their glee they bore
 From coral grotts and mossy caves:
 So, when upon the creamy shore
 Is heard the Ocean's muffled roar,
 As hollow vales cry echo to it,
 And balmy winds come down and woo it
 With kisses and caresses tender,
 While all is wrought in harmony
 Of such exquisite melody—
 So musical, it seems to me
 The whole a poet's song doth render.

CHAS. WARREN STODDARD.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 18th, 1865.

LOCAL ITEMS.

The Oakland Ladies' Christian Commission, on Tuesday, sent $500 in gold to the office of the Commission in this city.

Henry Botaski, the little boy who was run over by a car on the Hayes Valley road last week, died on Saturday.

The San Francisco and Spring Valley Water Companies have been consolidated; the papers are at last duly recorded.

Miss Sterling, the "tall woman," has been sent East, the P. M. S. Co. giving her a free ticket.

Attorney-General McCullough is recovering from the severe illness that recently caused his friends much apprehension that his life of usefulness was about to close.

A young man, formerly a resident of La Salle county, Illinois, who recently arrived in California, was found dead in his room at the What Cheer House, Monday evening last.

A wharf is to be built at the foot of Howard street, 475 feet long and 80 feet wide. It will be connected with Stuart street, by a section 212 feet long and 30 feet wide.

Owing to the death of Walter S. Denio, chief melter and refiner, Sub-Treasurer Cheesman has stopped the business of the Mint, pending the appointment of a successor to deceased.

A gentleman from Redwood City, San Mateo county, was chloroformed, and robbed of $50, Tuesday night, at the West End Hotel. The door had been opened from the inside, and the sufferer is confident that the robber was concealed under his bed.

A pawnbroker named Murdock, alias Smith, last week instituted proceedings against S. Laske, a cigar dealer, for obtaining money upon fraudulent representations in regard to cigars deposited; Laske was discharged, since which Murdock has been arrested on charge of irregular proceedings as a pawnbroker. An investigation has resulted in his acquittal.

James McConnell was arrested, Wednesday, for attempting to kill his wife, the night previous. She received several severe wounds in the throat; he avers that she inflicted them with the intention of committing suicide, but failing in nerve to complete the business, concluded to charge him with attempt to murder.

Surgeon C. McCormick, an old-time Californian, who has been in active service from the commencement of the war, will soon be with us again, having been relieved from the position of Medical Director of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, and assigned to like duty in this Department.

Louis Peterson, proprietor of a coffee stand at the corner of Jackson and East streets, rescued a man who fell through one of the wharf-openings which the city maintains free of expense to casual bathers in his locality, on Sunday. Peterson has saved many lives by risking his own, and deserves all praise for his heroism; we hope the man-traps will not remain one day too many for him.

We frequently meet with evidences that the times are like "the way of the transgressor," but an incontrovertible instance was furnished by a friend, the other day: he says he passed an auction-room at half-past 7 A. M., and saw a melancholy young man seated at a piano which was awaiting sacrifice at the hammer of the auctioneer, singing, to a doleful accompaniment, "The heart bowed down," etc.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

Ranchmen on the east side of the Sacramento are suffering from an overplus of water.

A bridge is to be built across the Pajaro river at Watsonville, at a cost of $10,000.

A fire-proof brick theatre is to be constructed at Grass Valley by a joint-stock company, at a cost of $12,000.

The Supervisors of El Dorado county have reduced the salary of their Superintendent of common schools to $75 per month.

Mr. John Hulme, of Weaverville, a blacksmith by vocation, fell dead at his anvil on Monday evening last. His sudden death is attributed to heart disease.

The saw-mill of Abrams & Co., on the Columbia river, thirteen miles above the Cascades, was burned on Saturday. Loss, $7,000.

An exchange says the sheep in Santa Cruz county "are looking fat and healthy"—which direction is probably knife-ward.

The Virginia (Nevada) papers are discussing the propriety of repudiating all the indebtedness (about $120,000) incurred by the City Council beyond the limit fixed by the charter.

Martin Crozier, in Sacramento, has been sentenced to ten years at San Quentin for his participancy in the murder of Russell and Selter in 1860.

The Enterprise says nearly every mill in the State of Nevada is at work at the present time; and all have plenty of ore on hand.

A fire occurred at Quincy, Plumas county, recently, which destroyed the Coburn House, (loss $10,000,) and other property worth about $5,000.

Over one hundred men are engaged at Folsom in grading for the railroad to the granite quarries of the Natoma Water and Mining Company, and it appears to be the intention to complete the work as soon as possible.

H. P. Eaton, a clerk in the Marysville Post Office, was detected, a few days ago, purloining money from a letter. He confesses that since October last he has helped himself to about $2,000 in the same way.

The latest advices from Cañon City, Oregon, states that the newly-discovered mines on Clark Creek, 20 miles northeast, are very rich and extensive. The great amount of snow has made good prospects for hill digging.

Peter Drury was caved on while at work in a mining claim at Pine Hill, Nevada county. His right thigh bone was broken, and his shoulder and ankle dislocated. It is hardly possible for him to recover.

A miner named Thomas Rouse was murdered in Holcombe Valley on the 27th ult. He was shot twice with rifles, by some parties unknown, who had secreted themselves in a house near the claim in which he was working.

C. Hall and Oscar Warwick fought a duel near Grass Valley on Friday with Deringer pistols. Three shots were exchanged without injury to either party, when they settled their quarrel amicably. A woman was "in it."

Barclay Muir, owner of a sloop plying on the waters of the bay of San Francisco, who was arrested a few weeks since on the charge of stealing wood from Refugio landing, has been tried and honorably acquitted in Contra Costa county.

Edward Tiehenor, convicted of cutting timber upon public lands in Oregon, received a full and unconditional pardon from President Lincoln, by the steamer Oregon, thus releasing him from a fine of $18,750.

J. T. Gibbs, John Hobbs and Samuel D. Eldredge propose to incorporate the "Naptha Oil Spring Company." Their springs, which are to the westward of Tulare lake, were discovered by Gibbs nearly ten years ago.

The Visalia Delta says, referring to the agricultural prospects in Tulare: "A brighter sun of promise never arose upon any community or people than the one which shines on Tulare to-day."

William Snider, a seaman on the schooner Noyo, was knocked overboard off Punta de los Reyes, on Sunday, by the shifting of the main boom and drowned. The body was not recovered.

A nugget of gold worth $1,500 was taken out of the Miami mining claim at Beunington Hill, in Little York township, Nevada county, a few days since. The claim from which the lump was taken, has been paying well all the season.

A whisky shop kept by Mrs. Hannah Shannahan, near the barracks at Benicia, was burnt Feb. 11th, together with the occupant. The body of the woman was nearly consumed, and though the portion of the skull remaining was found broken, it was so much burned that the jury could not decide whether she was first murdered and the house fired or not.

The editor of the Victoria Colonist has in his office an enormous hen's egg, 7 1-2 inches in circumference, 4 inches long and weighing 5 3-4 ounces. It was laid on the 28th ult. by a hen belonging to a marine on San Juan Island.

The Gould & Curry Company employ in and about their mines 215 men, thus: extracting ore, 79; prospecting, 11; accessory work, 59; on improvements, 20; carpenters, 25; blacksmiths, 7; outside laborers, 14. The ore taken daily amounts to about 130 tons, and averages from $90 to $500.

The Stockton Independent cautions persons who are looking for mushrooms to beware of toadstools. The latter, it intimates, may be known "when they exude a milky, acrid and styptic juice, and have a coriaceous, liqueous, corky consistence." When they don't exude, etc., you are all right.

Edwin Shore and Erwin Locke were engaged in the tunnel of Colley & Co., on Deer creek, near Nevada city, Feb. 11th, when a blast was prematurely discharged; Shore was killed, and Locke so badly injured that he will probably lose both eyes.

The Wilmington Journal thinks that the centre of the oil discoveries, made in the southern part of the State, is the county of Los Angeles, and that the springs extend into Santa Barbara county, in the direction of the San Bernardino mountains.

In consequence of outrages committed by the Indians, and in order to "crush out" the savages speedily, martial law has been proclaimed in Colorado Territory; volunteers are called for. The present season is likely to prove very sickly for the red skins on the border.

A man named Joseph Vickers, residing at Buena Vista Ranch, Nevada county, injured his leg in some machinery a few days ago. Amputation became necessary, but the limb was in such a condition that the injured man died in a few hours after the operation.

Gov. Low has pardoned William Shelby, convicted in Yuba county, February, 1857, of grand larceny, and sentenced to the State Prison for ten years. He is pardoned on the recommendation of citizens of Marysville, who say that the trial took place at a time of great excitement, and that the sentence was greatly disproportioned to the offense.

Letters from Arizona state that matters are looking up. The full development of the mines is considerably retarded by the enormous rates of freight, but for which many mines, offering good paying ore, would maintain a great trade with San Francisco. Ore-sacks are very scarce and in great demand; 10,000 per month would find ready sale at La Paz.

King, Terry, Foster and Keefer escaped from jail at Yreka, Feb. 11th. The two former were soon recaptured, and parties continued in pursuit of the others. While several of the pursuers were sitting in the house of "Cherokee Mary," in Scott Valley, the door was quietly opened by Foster and Keefer. They started to run, but a charge of buckshot in the neck and face of Foster stopped him. Keefer escaped. Foster is now in jail, and will recover.

In 1861 a man named Helms was murdered in Sonoma county, on the highway. Thos. Stuart and his two brothers were indicted as the murderers; the latter were acquitted. Thomas was arrested at Vallejo, admitted to bail, and went to Mendocino county, where he was recently arrested again, on the ground that a capital offense did not admit of bail. He has been taken back to Sonoma for trial.

The Marysville Appeal says that two telegraphic attaches passed that city on the 13th, en route from Portland to Sacramento. These men left Portland, Oregon, Jan. 18th, passing over the entire line, inspecting and repairing. They informed the Appeal that the winter in Oregon has been the roughest for several years, and that they found the roads almost impassable in many places. The line is now in good condition.

OPENING OF A NEW PLEASURE PLACE.—The present day is noted for another important event besides the publication of THE CALIFORNIAN—it also will witness the opening of the Alameda Park Hotel, another addition to the many elegant pleasure-places with which our city is favored. Situated on the Alameda Encinal, the new house can be reached by boat and ride in forty minutes from Montgomery street, and a pleasanter mode of conveyance than a combination of boat and rail has yet to be invented. Those who have visited the house speak of it in the most praiseful terms, representing that the beauty of its location and the scenery is only equalled by the furniture and appointments of the house itself. It is intended to make it a suburban resort; bowling alleys, billiard rooms, and all the leading journals of the day, commencing of course with THE CALIFORNIAN, are supplied for the entertainment of guests, and wild game is said to abound in the vicinity to such an extent that all windows have to be supplied with wire bars to keep quail from flying in. Under the patronage of the experienced and popular proprietor, Mr. Frank Johnson, we apprehend that the Alameda Park Hotel will be able to hold its own, not only with any hotel in its vicinity, but also in San Francisco.

BOOTS AND SHOES.—We could scarcely do greater favor to a friend than to inform him where boot or shoe can be obtained which will be a source of comfort, pride and pleasure, as he mingles in the passing throng on life's journey. Mr. arkine, 151 Fourth street, achieves the highest excellence in his art, and gives perfect satisfaction to one who call on him. Ladies are always pleased with his work, and as they speak well of him nothing further is necessary.

BOOK KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete BUSINESS EDUCATION, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4-3m

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-athetic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
645 Washington st., San Francisco.

MR. CHRETIEN PEISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Journe's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses; and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charriere of Paris, Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M.

RICHERS HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
Over Parrott's Bank.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
fe31-3m

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,
ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,
No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKEY.

Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge.

I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor.

MORE ABOUT

SEWING MACHINES!

POSITIVE PROOF

THAT THE

"FLORENCE"

TOOK

The Premium

AT THE

Oregon State Fair,

AS IT DID AT EVERY FAIR

Held on this Coast in 1864!

A NEW COMMITTEE APPOINTED

—BY—

THE CONSPIRATORS!

WHEN THE

Regular Committee Fail to

ANSWER THEIR PURPOSE,

BUT WITH NO BETTER SUCCESS!

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
Marion County,

The undersigned, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Church, of Salem, Oregon, states as follows: On the second day of the late State Fair held at this place, I, together with Mrs. Cochran and Mrs. Gray, were appointed by the Manager of the Fair the regular Committee to examine and award premiums on the articles on exhibition in Class 9 of the Fair, in which class the Sewing Machines were entered, and we entered upon our duties as such Committee.

Among other things in this class we examined the Grover & Baker and the Florence Sewing Machines, then on exhibition, and we unanimously awarded the First Premium to the Florence Machine.

After our Award on the Sewing Machines became known on the third day of the Fair, another—a Special Committee of Five—was appointed by somebody to examine the Sewing Machines, of which appointment we were not informed until we made ready to submit our awards in writing, and then we declined to have anything more to do with the matter.

ELIZABETH C. CHURCH.

The above named Elizabeth C. Church personally appeared before me, and being duly sworn to tell the truth, says the statements which she has subscribed above are true.

J. GASTON, Notary Public.

Salem, Oregon, January 6, 1865.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
Marion County.

The undersigned, N. O. Parrish, makes the following statement: I am the agent of the Florence Sewing Machine at Salem, Oregon. I was aware of the appointment of Mrs. Church, Mrs. Cochran and Mrs. Gray, by the Managers of the late State Fair at Salem, as the regular Committee on Sewing Machines, but never knew the award of said Committee on Sewing Machines.

I then objected and protested against the appointment of any new committee as being discourteous to the regular Committee, and that it was irregular and improper to do so, and informing him that two of the members of the new Committee were owners of the Grover & Baker Machine. I protested that it was unjust to the Florence to appoint persons known to be prejudiced in favor of the Grover & Baker. He (Thornton) curtly cut short our conversation by telling me that "he would do as he pleased in the matter." It was long after the close of the Fair before I could learn with certainty whether the latter Committee really decided in favor of the Florence or not, the records of the Fair being in confusion. I have used the utmost diligence to publish the facts at the earliest possible period after learning them.

N. O. PARRISH.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 14th day of January, 1865. Witness my hand and official seal.

J. GASTON, Notary Public.

We republish the affidavits of the three Ladies who are a majority on the last Committee of Five. They are the only ones on said Committee who were not owners of and known to be biased in favor of the Grover & Baker Machine before their appointment. At the time we published them they were not all sworn to, which is now the case, and the oath was taken at a later date than the contradictory statements published by the Agent of the Grover & Baker Machine purporting to have been made by them, proving one at least, of those presented by him, to be a base fabrication.

"After a careful examination of the Sewing Machines and Machine Work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was decided and agreed by the Committee, to award the first Premium to the Florence Machine as the best Machine for doing all grades of work, and a premium to the Grover & Baker Machine for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the Committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the Committee and their final decision.

MARY A. HOWE.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
County of Multnomah,

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, Mary A. Howe, who, being first duly sworn, says the above statement is true, as she verily believes.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, this 4th day of November, 1864.
(Notarial Seal.) J. N. DOLPH,
Notary Public, Multnomah County, Oregon.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
County of Linn.

I have read the above statement, (I being one of the Committee mentioned,) and the same is true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

EMILY C. GRIFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of December, 1864.

JAMES ELKINS,
County Clerk, Linn County, Oregon.

I was one of the five ladies comprising the Committee for the examination of Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and am the party referred to above as having been called away before signing our Report. I hereby say that the above statements are true as to the decision of the Committee.

MARY MILLER.

Albany, Oregon, December 13th, 1864.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
County of Linn.

Mary Miller, the person making the above statement, being duly sworn, says said statement is true to the best of her knowledge and belief.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 6th day of January, 1865.

JAMES ELKINT, County Clerk.
By A. F. WHEELER, Deputy Clerk.

That there can be no mistake in the above statements, or that any misrepresentation was made to obtain them, the name of the respected gentleman, Rev. J. L. Parrish, of Portland, (regretting that it is necessary to use his name in this unpleasant controversy,) who took the depositions, is a more than sufficient guarantee, he being one of the oldest residents of the State of Oregon, widely and favorably known both there and in California. The documents are plainly written, signed, and sworn to, open to the inspection of any one. The idea that these statements were not given and taken understandingly and in good faith is simply ridiculous.

PORTLAND, January 26, 1865.

I certify that I am Corresponding Secretary of the Oregon State Agricultural Society; that the original copy of the Report of Committee on Sewing Machines at the Fair of 1864, has never been out of my possession more than 30 minutes since I received it from the Board of Managers, and that J. W. J. Pearson (Oregon Agent G. & B. Machines,) told me in Portland he had written to S. E. May, of Salem, for a copy of it, and that, too, nearly three weeks after the publication by the Agent in San Francisco that he had it in his possession; further that I am in no way interested in the result of the decision of the Committee, or in the final result of the investigation, except as an officer of the Society.

E. M. WAITE,

Corresponding Sec'y O. S. A. Society.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 26th of January, 1865.

LEVI ANDERSON, J. P.,
Multnomah county, Oregon.

We trust it will not be supposed, from our efforts to prove the justice of our claim to the Oregon premium, that we esteem the premium there or elsewhere, over such a competitor, of any value; to be beaten, however, by a chain stitch machine, which, when exhibited in honorable competition with any lock-stitch machine, as shown by the records of previous Fairs, has been more frequently classed as second or third rate than otherwise, would be a disgrace indeed.

The instances are numerous where the Agent of that machine has attempted unfair advantages to obtain premiums which he knew could be taken in no other manner—for proof, refer to any one of the San Francisco Sewing Machine Agents.

The developments in the Salem matter show to what perfection long practice and experience in such transactions have brought him. It is certainly amusing to follow the details in this deep-laid, premeditated and wicked plan.

The Agent of the Grover & Baker machine selects a distant point for the field of his operations, hoping by distance to cover the means used to accomplish the fraudulent end in view; he selects a time also when we were engaged in exhibiting the Florence at two other Fairs, which would prevent our giving it much attention at a third Fair. With the President of the Fair apparently pledged to award him the premium if a committee could not be selected who would do so; in fact, with every arrangement made beforehand that would seem to make a failure impossible, he finally ventured to place his machine in competition with the FLORENCE. The result was such as all who know the two would anticipate: a more than disastrous defeat to the unscrupulous champion of the chain-stitch machine.

The facts in relation to the transaction at Salem, now being exposed, are known to too many for the Agent of the Grover & Baker machine to make a successful denial of them. We have hardly begun to "take testimony" yet. The investigation now commenced will be carried forward until every particular in relation to the fraud is exposed, unless the Agent of the Grover & Baker Machine, by silence or otherwise, acknowledges the truth in the premises.

Duty to the Florence will compel us to do this, and while we invite a full and most thorough investigation, we trust no one will make a statement for or against us that they cannot fully substantiate if called upon to do so. We say this not to intimidate, but simply that the plain truth and only that may be given.

We would suggest to the Agent of the G. & B. machine that as we are not skilled, even if we had the inclination, in the bombastic and personally abusive style of writing, apparently so much his forte, that he should refrain from it in future as calculated to cover and obscure the real facts in the case.

That the Florence is a substantial and reliable machine, easily understood and operated, doing the heaviest or lightest work, and requiring scarcely no change to be made for anything, all who have them testify.

More than one thousand have been sold on this coast, and we do not know of one that is not giving perfect and entire satisfaction; if there is one not doing this, no matter how distant it may be, if the owner will inform us, it will be attended to without any expense whatever to the party.

Instruction will be given free to one who may wish to learn to use the Florence, or who wish to test its merits, whether they intend to purchase or not.

SAMUEL HILL, General Agent,
fe18-2t No. 111 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skilleman, M. D., Boudinook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M. D., Mausheld, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "utmost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass. and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY

Is for sale by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,
San Francisco.

And by all Druggists. ja28-1m

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late east INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my25

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

CALIFORNIA

Home Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Bangh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Deering, A. B. McCreery, C. Dunsen, C. J. Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heynemann, R. G. Sneath, C. F. McDermott, J. C. Wilmerding, Levi Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Thibault, S. Hemenway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.

B. F. LOWE, President.

JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5-3m

REMOVAL

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs. Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin. Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent. no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS, MERCHANDISE, FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
206 Front street, corner of California.

LOCKE & MONTAGUE, IMPORTERS OF STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,
SAN FRANCISCO.JOSEPH A. DONOHOE,
San Francisco.EUGENE KELLY,
New York.DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,
SAN FRANCISCO.
EUGENE KELLY & CO.,
NEW YORK.
Bankers.

NEW YORK. EXCHANGE ON BANK OF LONDON, - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. - - - jy2

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.
Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern my25

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S
no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platina, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anesthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. dc10 3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL!

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,
Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. dc3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. jul8

CARPETS.

We have just received and are now opening
NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF WILTON

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets.
no12

RUPTURE.

RADICAL CURE OF Rupture by the application of the Anatomical Truss of Elastic and empressing pressure, by A. FOLLEAU, Pupils of Chirurgical of Paris Anatomical, Orthopedical and Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club-feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street,
Between Montgomery and Kearny.
Manufactory, 232 Sutter street. dc3

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,
SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,
Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office.)

SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz.: Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballard's, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. ja8-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, Etc.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

WILSON & EVANS,
No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco,
And 122 J street, Sacramento.
dc3 3m

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624 CLAY STREET, (Old No. 17)

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

ALTA MILLS,

STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, - - - SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., - - - Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large; Hominy, Small; Oatmeal, Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order.
dc17-3m

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of FEBRUARY, 1865:

FEBRUARY 23d - - - SACRAMENTO
From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,
Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5 1/2 J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY,.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State. Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

ju25

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every description, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear, or for Dealers' Supplies, from a sailing to a steam engine —a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles) can be paid for on delivery by Express; or others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

no6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; or otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By G. C. LUTHER, Deputy Clerk.
Chas. McC. Delany, Plaintiff's Attorney. dc24 3m

BREWSTER & CO.'S Carriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA,

will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE, and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES, and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of Broome street,

The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of No. 372, Broome street,

de17-5m NEW YORK.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with movable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of this avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,
Southeast corner of Montgomery and California street,
San Francisco. de17-5m

GOODWIN & CO.,

HAVING RECEIVED AT THE

LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,

—THE—

First Premium,

—ON—

FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES.

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such

Consisting of

Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,

DINING ROOM AND

OFFICE FURNITURE,

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street

no12

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
—IN—
Fine Clothing
—AND—
GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;

JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;

STEAMBOAT GIN;

OLD TOM GIN;

IRISH WHISKY,

from Bond direct.

For sale by

V. SZARZA,

ja28-1f

44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDDY & FULLER'S

Dancing Academy,

No. 727 Market street, a few doors above Third.
PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS AND FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREEs on alternate weeks.

ja7-1f

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!

CANTY & WAGNER,

(SUCCESSORS TO J. REGAN.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS.

113 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Between Bush and Sutter, - - - San Francisco.

N. B.—ALL CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.

Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to. dc3-3m

PHINEAS BANNING,

FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington.

ac24

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known. It cures diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

an27

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

au27

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION

FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING

AND

DRESSING

THE

Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Fetridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents, San Francisco.

ja25-1f

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere

ja25-1f

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATED

Salt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers, Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, - - - FIFTY CENTS.
Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by

MRS. A. GRIDLEY,

Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,

AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.
TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,

Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,

ja25-1f

SAN FRANCISCO

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!

DE GRATH'S GENUINE

ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES.

Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetters, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,

ja25 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roseate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,

416 418 Front street,

ja25-1f

San Francisco.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

MISS MATILDA HERON,

Supported by

THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,This Saturday Evening, February 18th, 1865.

In the Play of

G A M E A ;

OR, THE JEWISH MOTHER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, February 18th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

BY THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

And a Musical Melange by

The Eureka Minstrel Troupe.

MONDAY EVENING,

M A R G O ;

OR, THE MYSTERIES OF THE TEMPLE OF PARIS.

S. F. O. C.

GRAND

Promenade Exhibition

—OF THE—

San Francisco Olympic Club,

—AT—

PLATT'S HALL,*On Wednesday Evening, February 22nd,*TICKETS (admitting a Gentleman and Ladies) - $3.
To be had of any member of the Club.Ladies will be admitted only on Tickets issued by the Committee on Invitations.

Such Tickets of Invitation may be procured by application to

MESSRS. R. H. LLOYD,

W. H. ELDRIDGE,

J. MANSUR,

C. C. JACKS,

J. K. ORR,

or, GEO. S. BROWN.

The Promenade Exhibition will be to all intents and purposes a select or "Dress Ball." The exercises will take place between the dances; and the floor of the Hall will be covered with canvas and free of seats.

The object of the Club, to have the company select, will be strictly carried out, and no pains will be spared, either in the decoration of the hall, the selection of the music, or in any minor details, which may add to the full enjoyment of the occasion.

HOMESTEAD FOR SALE!

ANY PERSON DESIROUS OF PURCHASING a valuable HOUSE AND LOT at a bargain, for CASH, can hear of a chance, by applying immediately at the office of THE CALIFORNIAN. The property is within 10 minutes' walk of the corner of Clay and Montgomery streets, is in the southern part of the city, and in a neat private street and pleasant neighborhood. The House contains two Parlors (with sliding-doors, gas chandeliers and marble mantel), a dining-room and kitchen on the first floor, and four bed-rooms on the second. Planked yard, flowering vines, outhouses, etc. Water in three different places on the premises and gas fixtures all through the house. It is built in a thorough and substantial manner, and is now under a monthly rent of $50. Size of Lot, 24 feet, by 80 feet in depth. Title, PERFECT.

Satisfactory reasons for selling will be given to a purchaser by applying as above.

fe18-1t.

M. HARKINS,

MANUFACTURER OF

LADIES', MISSES', AND CHILDREN'S'

Boots and Shoes.Also, GENTLEMEN'S BOOTS, SHOES and SLIPPERS
MADE TO ORDER.

No. 151 FOURTH STREET,

Second door above Howard, east side,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Repairing of all kinds neatly and promptly done.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Pine street, below Montgomery.

THOMAS MAGUIRE, - Proprietor.
LEW RATTIER, - Manager.
C. F. SHATTUCK, - Musical Director.
J. L. SCHMIDT, - Leader of Orchestra.

G R E A T

COMBINATION OF MUSICAL TALENT,

BY THE STAR TROUPE OF

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

D. S. WAMBOLD,

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
P. B. Isaacs, W. Bernard,
Lew Rattier, Mons. Charles,
C. F. Shattuck, M. Lewis,
Sig. Fano, S. Washburn,
W. Sheppard, Tommy Peel,
Frank Medina, H. Groh,

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL

Sacred Concert!Every Sunday Evening, by the Troupe,

Messrs W J Hill, John Gregg, J. Schlotte, and

50 INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Dress Circle and Parquet, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra; Private Boxes, $5.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

Saturday afternoon performances by the Minstrels, at the Opera House.

THE CALIFORNIA ART UNION,

OVER THE STORE OF

JONES, WOOL & SUTHERLAND,

No. 312 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Is Now Open,

And will continue to receive Visitors DAILY from 10 A M until 10 P M.

Terms of membership - Five Dollars
Single Admission - Twenty-five cents

Annual Subscriptions, Five Dollars, which entitles the subscriber to free admission to the Gallery; also, to an Engraving or Photograph of some Picture in the exhibition and a chance in the distribution of the property of the Association at the close of the season, according to the plan of the various Art Unions of Europe and the Atlantic States.

ja23-1t

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness. This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

Terms easy.

fe18-1t

FRANK JOHNSON.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES, adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSEN, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of SUPERIOR CARRIAGES, ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:
Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY.
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

F. MCCOPPIN, Superintendent.

CATHOLIC GIFTS,

IN GREAT VARIETY!

Consisting of—

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,
STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,
MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES

And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

For sale by

MICHAEL FLOOD,

Catholic Bookseller,

No. 428 Kearny street, San Francisco.

PRINTING! PRINTING!!DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Montgomery, - - San Francisco

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city.

fe4-1t

P. J. WHITE & CO.,

SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN—

BUTTER, LARD, HAM, BACON, PORK,
SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,

And a general assortment of

G R O C E R I E S ,

Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Battery, San Francisco.

Your trade is respectfully solicited.

de10-1t

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PIC-TURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, Etc.

Especial attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDSENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

ja25-1t

THESE PLASTERS have the compactness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove. They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly hump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms. For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.,
"Brandreth Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

San Francisco.

Sold by all Druggists.

de17-3m

THE REASON WHY

EVERYBODY USES

THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED
ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,
OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.

Second—It is more effectual.

Third—It saves labor.

Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally.
Manufactory, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco.

ja7-3m

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.A. Roman & Co.,

TAKE PLEASURE in announcing the following list of NEW BOOKS just received from the East:

Enoch Arden. 1 vol. small quarto, elegantly illustrated. Blue and Gold edition.

Cleaver Stories of many Lands, by John G. Saxe. 1 vol. 4to, illustrated.

The Queens of Song. Being memoirs of the most celebrated female vocalists. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portraits. All lovers of the Opera will be delighted with this charming volume.

The Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, with a memoir. 2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, tinted paper.

Doran's Complete Works. 9 vols., cloth and half Turkey, with the "Annals of the Stage."

Arctic Researches and Life Among the Esquimaux, by Charles F. Hall. 1 vol. 8vo, illustrated. Ranks next to that of Dr. Kane.

Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. 1 vol. 12mo. The latest contribution to the great Theological Controversy in England.

John Godfrey's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor. 1 vol. 12mo. An absorbing story of American life.

Golden Leaves from the American Poets. 1 vol. 16mo., vellum and morocco. A tasteful selection from our most popular Poets.

The Gentle Life. 1 vol. 16mo. An elegant series of Essays on the Formation of Character.

Following the Flag, by "Carleton." A fascinating juvenile.

Eliana, by Charles Lamb. 1 vol. 12mo. Being the heretofore uncollected writings of "Elia."

Autumn Holidays in the Country, by the "Country Parson." 1 vol. 12mo.

The Queen of the County, by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids. 1 vol. 12mo.

A New Atmosphere, by Gail Hamilton. 1 vol. 12mo.

Looking Towards Sunset, by L. M. Child. 1 vol. 4to, Love and Duty. 1 vol. 12mo.

Lost Love. 1 vol. 12mo.

Margaret Denzil's History. 1 vol. paper.

Bohemians of London. 1 vol. 12mo.

Autobiography of Gen. Scott. 2 vols. 12mo.

Woodchiff, by Harriet B. McKeever. 1 vol. 12mo.

Hymns of the Ages. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

Old Merchants of New York. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

In addition to the above we have a large list of other NEW BOOKS, together with a complete stock in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

All are cordially invited to call and examine.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

ja25-1m

VANDALL, CARR & CO.,
BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,
NO. 410 CLAY STREET,
(North side, between Sansome and Battery.)

Particular attention paid to the printing of Briefs and Records.

fe11-1t

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

S. W. H. WARD & SON,
NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
387 Broadway. } San Francisco, Cal.
de31-3m

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

CREATE A HEALTHY APPETITE!

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure Dyspepsia, Diarrhoea and Constipation.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Invigorate the System and enliven the mind.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Overcome the effects of Drunkenness and Late Hours.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure all Diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Are Palatable to the Taste.

They are the

BEST BITTERS IN THE MARKET,

And when once used will always be called for again.

They are made in the most careful manner
From Pure Old Wheat Whisky, Medicated from
Roots and Herbs

Especially adapted for the cure of all Stomachic Diseases
and Liver Complaints.

Try Them and You will be Satisfied.

For sale everywhere by Druggists and Liquor Dealers,
or by

N. B. JACOBS & CO.,423 Front street,
San Francisco.

fe11-6m

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER
AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II, No. 13.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 25, 1865.

TERMS: $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:	POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:
Things—by "Inigo."	The Fable—By C. W. Stoddard
Two Days with Mosby.	"Not Lost but Gone Before"—By C. H. Webb.
A Wonderful Fat Man.	The Voice of the Loyal North.
A very Polite Patient.	Discovered.
The Baby Tower of Shanghai.	Ingenious Word Changes.
The Grand Duke's New Suit.
Paragraphs from Paris Letters.
A Critic Protests.
ONLY A CLOUD—Miss Braddon's New Novel, conclusion of Chapter XVI.	RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS:
	A Condensation of the Telegraphic War News of the Week.
EDITORIALS:	ATLANTIC GOSSIP:
The End Near.	Special Correspondence of THE CALIFORNIAN.
Arizona.
Paragraphs on Minor Topics.	DRAMATIC MENTION:
	The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.
LOCAL AND INTERIOR ITEMS:	MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:
The News at Home and Abroad in Brief.	Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.
ADVERTISEMENTS.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, February 25th, 1865.

SEVERAL years since the question was agitated: "Where do all the pins go to?" Walking through the streets the other day, an equally intricate problem occurred to me: "Where do all the hoop-skirts come from that skirt the streets?"

ABOUT DISCARDED SUITS.

I have sub-headed this article as above, borrowing a phrase from the technicalities of a well-known game, because it occurs to me that women discard these suits somewhat as one clears his hand at euchre before picking up the card from the deck which has been turned up as trump.

Go where you please, walk where you will, you still find the inevitable skirt, lying in your pathway like a coiled serpent-ready to spring; and as its springs are spiral ones, might it not be difficult to get out of the way if the thing did indeed take a fancy to jump?

In youth they told me marvellous stories of the hoop-snake. Is this the reptile that my nurse used to frighten me into convulsions about? It seems harmless enough now, and I have yet to see the first one that I'm afraid to approach, though to tell the truth I shouldn't care to attempt to handle it.

Is it a peculiarity of the Californian female that at regular intervals she goes out into the street and crawls out of her skirt as an eel does from its skin, or a crab from its old and battered shell. I intend to go through the city of nights, and keep vigils for this peeling operation, for I'm anxious to solve the mystery.

It is really a strange fact, that go through any part of the city you choose, frequented highway or seldom trodden by-way, and still the same sight greets you. Lying in ambush, as it were, they suggest mousetraps to the contemplative mind—or springs "to catch wood-cock" as Hamlet hath it.

They assume fantastic shapes upon the ground, reminding one at times of the apple-paring that is thrown over our heads to "tell the first letter of our true-love's name," and then anon, from a different point of view, looking very like a weasel or a squirrel-cage, sometimes being "backed like a camel."

Horses occasionally tangle their feet in them, and wonder what they are. I saw a hungry brute stick his nose into one, the other day, with a sniff and snort of intense delight. He thought he had found an oat-bag.

He must have thought that women had a strange way of sowing their wild oats.

I wish to protest against this growing habit, among our representative women, of indiscriminate skirt-shedding. It may be urged that women have the same right to strew their quills around that the porcupine has, but I think differently. There is a law against obstructing the streets.

Again, do we not nightly pray to be delivered from temptation—to be preserved, so to speak, from the snare of the fowler as well as from the pestilence that walketh at noonday? And here we have the temptation planted like a hand-grenade at our very feet, the snare set like a gill-net for salmon, in the channels we most frequent.

Do no sacred memories cling to these skirts, that they should be thus profaned? The poet-lover, apostrophizing his mistress's girdle, says:

Give me but what this ribbon bound—
Take all the rest the sun goes round.

If locks of hair and faded gloves be so prized that occasionally at some old miser's death one is found in his strong box, tied with a knot of blue ribbon and embalmed in an explanation which tells that the dead miser valued it above all his treasures, what value would not attach to one of these discarded skirts as a memento! Think of it, women; do not rob your tresses of a single hair as a keepsake for him who kneels and begs, but send him some of these hair springs instead, and then he will indeed have something to remember you by. At any rate, do not cast them out like lumps of salt that have lost their savor to be trodden under the foot of man. The simile is not a bad one, for a spring and a summer sault are very much the same thing.

Forget or ignore, if you choose, the springs that have passed over your head, but do not scatter them in this reckless way. For by this practice your springs are suffered a second time to go to Waist.

The most sacred things come to be regarded with irreverence if made common, and by this practice of yours the inner mysteries of the temple are revealed, when we should be taught to approach even the vestibule with the air of men conscious that they are trenching upon holy ground. The difference between picking up a skirt that is strewn in our path and walking away with it, and doing the same thing by the first one that comes along with a woman in it, seems very slight indeed. Picking up the empty shells that lie along the beach, honest and unshellfish as we might be, would soon bring us to a point of demoralization at which we would not hesitate to pick up one that had a soft-shell crab inside it.

As Pope very cleverly puts it:

These hoops are monsters of such hideous mien,
That to be hated need but be seen,
But seen too oft, familiar with their place,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

I regard those lines of the Pope, above quoted, as constituting in their entirety one of the best eucyclical letters ever written.

Hitherto I have taken high moral and æsthetic ground in my argument, when perhaps it were better had I taken a more practical, in fact an economic, view of the subject. Having asked if no sacred memories cling to these skirts allow me in conclusion to inquire: Is there no value in old iron? Is it not possible to beat the steel of which they are composed into ploughshares?

Certes I should like a share, even a plough share, of them myself. And with this admonition, ladies, I leave you: abandon your entrenchments if you like, but do not voluntarily throw them into the hands of your enemy; if you do, the sin be upon your own skirts.

OTHER THINGS.

A remarkable instance of how the honors generally fall to the weakest hands and prizes go to the least deserving, occurred at the benefit of the Hon. Charles Backus on Friday evening of last week, when the conundrum: Why was San Francisco on the 5th of February (Sunday) like a field of wheat fifty years ago? Answer: Because it was cut by Sickles—took the prize.

From the hundred and fifty condrams offered, though I had not the pleasure of hearing any of them read, I do venture to say that there could scarcely have been a worse one selected than that, the laugh only coming in on the local allusion it contained.

A much better one was: Why does Backus' mouth resemble Mt. Vesuvius? Answer: Because the crater's mouth is always open.

The prize goblet awarded on the occasion was made at Tucker's, and was on exhibition to sharpen the wits of conundrumists, for a month before the performance came off. The same eminent jeweler has made a large service of silver plate to be presented to me, if anybody will pay for it, which may be seen in his window at any hour of the day. He has, too, a number of gold watches, rings, pins and things which he assures me were also made for me, their presentation being delayed only because he is desirous of not engraving my name upon them until he receives an equivalent for the goods. Thus I am spared the unpleasant necessity of pawning them immediately.

At present he is engaged upon a jockey cup, to be presented to the winner of the match race between Capt. Baby and Judge Cowles, to come off on Howard street the first pleasant Sunday.

The Judge is somewhat ignorant of the rules of the road and I'm betting that the Captain will take his wheel off if he attempts to cut in ahead of him when the greys have struck their four minute lick; but I'm also betting that the Judge beats when the case comes into court, for there the pace tells against you.

The match is scarcely made up yet, but my friend Canavan, decidedly the best writer on this coast, is engaged in an extensive correspondence with Judge Hoffman on the subject, and the preliminaries will probably be settled early in the week. Some nine hundred baskets of champagne have already been lost and won on the result.

In the meanwhile the books are open at this office, and if any wish to make their bets—the terms being play or pay—they are at liberty to deposit the stakes, permanently and safely, with

INIGO.

A VOICE OF THE LOYAL NORTH.

NATIONAL FAST, JANUARY 4, 1861.

WE sing "Our Country's" song to-night
With saddened voice and eye;
Her banner droops in clouded light
Beneath the wintry sky.
We'll pledge her once in golden wine
Before her stars have set;
Though dim one reddening orb may shine,
We have a Country yet.

'Twere vain to sigh o'er errors past,
The fault of sires or sons;
Our soldier heard the threatening blast,
And spiked his useless guns;
He saw the star-wreathed ensign fall,
By mad invaders torn;
He saw it from the bastioned wall
That laughed their rage to scorn!

What though their angry cry is flung
Across the howling wave—
They smite the air with idle tongue
The gathering storm who brave;
Enough of speech! the trumpet rings;
Be silent, patient, calm—
God help them if the tempest swings
The pine against the palm!

Our toilsome years have made us tame;
Our strength has slept unfelt;
The furnace-fire is slow to flame
That bids our ploughshares melt;
'Tis hard to lose the bread they win
In spite of Nature's frowns—
To drop the iron threads we spin
That weave our web of towns,

To see the rustling turbines stand
Before the emptied flumes,
To fold the arms that flood the land
With rivers from their looms—
But harder still for those who learn
The truth forgot so long;
When once their slumbering passions burn,
The peaceful are the strong!

The Lord have mercy on the weak,
And calm their frenzied ire,
And save our brothers ere they shriek,
"We played with Northern fire!"
The eagle hold his mountain height—
The tiger pace his den!
Give all their country, each his right!
God help us all! Amen!

[Oliver Wendell Holmes.]

DISSEVERED.

THE rose renews her sensuous bloom,
The lily gems the garden walk,
The pinks above the borders loom,
I hear the bluebird's twittered talk.

The sunlight gilds the poplar leaves,
And green and gold the meadows glow;
His woodside net the spider weaves,
And hums the blithe bee to and fro.

O once beloved sounds and sights
That drift my moody vision by,
Which her clear presence made delights,
And that her absence make a lie,

In vain upon my sense you press,
I know not what the bluebird said;
I cannot of your meanings guess,
Your sweet interpreter is dead.

No more the rose her perfume gives.
The lily is a flower forlorn,
The pink in scentless beauty lives—
The incense of the world is gone!

(W. A. Kendall, in the N. Y. Home Journal.)

TWO DAYS WITH MOSBY.

["JOHN SINGLETON MOSBY," says Harper's Weekly, to whose handsomely-illustrated paper we are indebted for the following story, "long notorious as a rebel guerrilla, was born in Virginia in 1832. Little is popularly known of his career before the war. In 1862 he was a lieutenant in Lee's army, and for his services in harassing our troops encamped near Fredericksburg met with Gen. Lee's approval and was promoted Major. In March, 1863, he captured Gen. Stoughton at Fairfax Court House. He was wounded near this same place in August of that year, and was unable, previous to January, 1864, to resume his official duties. Last August he was again wounded and put hors du combat for two months, after which he again appeared in a raid on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, for which he was made Lieutenant Colonel. December 10th, he was given the full rank of Colonel. We give below an account, entitled "Two Days with Mosby," which, as being substantially true, will prove very interesting to our readers. This rebel Colonel has been the centre of a great deal of fabulous romance during the war. He has been recently wounded again, and so seriously that his friends, it is reported, despair of his recovery."]

I WAS up at reveillé. Orders to inspect the camp of dismounted cavalry near Harper's Ferry had been in my pocket two days, awaiting an escort through the fifty miles of guerrilla infested country which lay between me and that distant post. This was the day for the regular train, and a thousand wagons were expected to leave Sheridan's headquarters, on Cedar Creek, at daylight, with a brigade of infantry as guard, and a troop of cavalry as outriders.

An hour's ride of eight miles along a picketed line across the valley brought me to the famous army. Torbert was there, and I awaited his detailed instructions. Unavoidable delay ensued. Despatches were to be sent, and they were not yet ready. An hour passed, and, meantime, the industrious wagon-train was lightly and rapidly rolling away down the pike. The last wagon passed out of sight, and the rear-guard closed up behind it before I was ready to start. No other train was to go for four days. I must overtake this one or give up my journey. At length, accompanied by a single orderly, and my colored servant, George Washington, a contraband, commonly called "Wash," I started in pursuit of the train.

As I had nearly passed Newtown I overtook a small party apparently of the rear-guard of the train, who were lighting their pipes and buying cakes and apples at a small grocery on the right of the pike, and who seemed to be in charge of a non-commissioned officer.

"Good morning, Sergeant. You had better close up at once. The train is getting well ahead, and this is the favorite beat of Mosby."

"All right, sir," he replied with a smile, and nodding to his men, they mounted at once and closed in behind me, while quite to my surprise I noticed three more of the party whom I had not before seen in front of me.

An instinct of danger at once possessed me. I saw nothing to justify it, but I felt a presence of evil which I could not shake off. The men were in Union blue complete, and wore on their caps the well-known Greek cross which distinguishes the gallant Sixth Corps. They were young, intelligent, cleanly, and good-looking soldiers, armed with revolvers and Spencer's repeating carbine. I noticed the absence of sabres, but the presence of the Spencer, which is a comparatively new arm in our service, reassured me, and I thought it impossible that the enemy could as yet be possessed of them.

We galloped on merrily, and just as I was ready to laugh at my own fears, "Wash," who had been riding behind me and had heard some remark made by the soldiers, brushed up to my side, and whispered through his teeth chattering with fear:

"Massa, secesh sure! Run like de debil!"

I turned to look back at these words, and saw six carbines levelled at me at twenty paces distant, and the Sergeant who had watched every motion of the negro, came riding toward me with revolver drawn and the sharp command, "Halt. Surrender!"

We had reached a low place where the Opequan Creek crosses the pike, a mile from Newtown. The train was not a quarter of a mile ahead, but out of sight for the moment over the west ridge.

High stone-walls lined the pike on either side and a narrow bridge across the stream was in front of me and already occupied by the three rascals who had acted as advance-guard, who now coolly turned round and presented carbines also from their point of view.

I remembered the military maxim, a mounted man should never surrender until his horse is disabled, and hesitated an instant considering what to do, and quite in doubt whether I was myself or some other fellow whom I had read of as captured and hung by guerrillas; but at the repetition of the sharp command, aided by the somewhat disagreeable presence of the revolver immediately in my face, I concluded I was undoubtedly the other fellow, and surrendered accordingly.

My sword and revolver were taken at once by the Sergeant, who proved to be a rebel lieutenant in disguise, and remarked, laughing as he took them,

"We closed up, Captain, as you directed; as this is a favorite beat of Mosby's, I hope our drill was satisfactory."

"All right, Sergeant. Every dog has his day, and yours happens to come now. Possibly my turn may come to-morrow."

"Your turn to be hung," he replied.

It was not long before I was ushered into the presence of the great modern highwayman, John S. Mosby, Lieutenant-Colonel, C. S. A.

He stood a little apart from his men, by the side of a splendid gray horse, with his right hand grasping the bridle-rein, and resting on the pommel of his saddle—a slight, medium-sized man, sharp of feature, quick of sight, lithe of limb, with a bronzed face of the color and tension of whipcord. His hair is a yellow brown, with full but light beard and mustache of the same; a straight Grecian nose, firm set expressive mouth, large ears, deep gray eyes, high forehead, large well-shaped head, and his whole expression denoting energy, hard service, and love of whisky. He wore top-boots, and a civilian's over coat, black, lined with red, and beneath it the complete gray uniform of a Confederate Lieutenant-Colonel, with its two stars on the side of the standing collar, and the whole surmounted by the inevitable slouched hat of the whole Southern race. His men were about half in blue and half in butternut.

Mosby, after taking my horse and quietly examining my papers, presently looked up with a peculiar gleam of satisfaction on his face.

"Ah, Captain B——! Inspector-General of ——'s Cavalry! Good-morning, Captain! Glad to see you, sir! Indeed there is but one man I would prefer to see this morning to yourself, and that is your commander. Were you present, sir, the other day at the hanging of eight of my men as guerrillas at Front Royal?"

I answered him firmly, "I was present, sir; and, like you, have only to regret that it was not the commander instead of his unfortunate men."

This answer seemed to please Mosby, for he apparently expected a denial. He assumed a grim smile, and directed Lieutenant Whiting to search me.

My gold hunting-watch and chain, several rings, a set of shirt-studs and sleeve-buttons, a Masonic pin, some coins, and about three hundred dollars in greenbacks, with some letters and pictures of the dear ones at home, and a small pocket Bible, were taken. My cavalry-boots, worth about fifteen dollars were appraised at six hundred and fifty in Confederate money; my watch at three thousand dollars, and the other articles in about the same proportion, including my poor servant "Wash," who was put in and raffled for at two thousand dollars, so that my entire outfit made quite a respectable prize.

"Wash" was very indignant that he should be thought worth only two thousand dollars Confederate, and informed them that he considered himself unappreciated, and that, among other accomplishments, he could make the best milk punch of any man in the Confederacy.

When all this was concluded, Mosby took me a little one side, and returned to me the pocket Bible, the letters and the Masonic pin, saying quietly as he did so, alluding to the latter with a significant sign:

"You may as well keep this. It may be of use to you somewhere."

I thanked him warmly for his kindness as I took his offered hand, and really began to think Mosby almost a gentleman and a soldier, although he had just robbed me in the most approved manner of modern highwaymen.

Immediate preparations were made for the long road to Richmond and the Libby. A guard of fifteen men, in command of Lieutenant Whiting, was detailed as our escort, and, accompanied by Mosby himself, we started directly across the country, regardless of roads, in an easterly direction toward the Shenandoah and the Blue Ridge.

We were now in company of nine more of our men, who had been taken at different times, making eleven of our party in all, besides the indignant contraband "Wash," whom it was also thought prudent to send to the rear for safe-keeping.

I had determined to escape if even half an opportunity should present itself, and the boys were quick in understanding my purpose, and intimating their readiness to risk their lives in the attempt. One of them, in particular, George W. McCauley, commonly known as Maek, and another one named Brown, afterward proved themselves heroes.

At Howettsville on the Shenandoah, nine miles below Front Royal, we bivouacked for the night in an old school-house.

Our party of eleven were assigned to one side of the lower floor of the school-house, where we lay down side by side with our heads to the wall and our feet nearly meeting the feet of the guard, who lay in the same manner opposite us, with their heads to the other wall, except three, who formed a relief guard for the sentry's post at the door.

Above the head of the guard along the wall ran a low deck, on which each man of them stood his carbine and laid his revolver before disposing himself to sleep.

A fire before the door lighted the room; and the scene, as they dropped gradually to sleep, was warlike in the extreme, and made a Rembrandt picture on my memory which will never be effaced.

I had taken care to place myself between McCauley and Brown, and the moment the rebels began to snore and the sentry to nod over his pipe, we were in earnest and deep conversation.

McCauley proposed to unite our party and make a simultaneous rush for the carbines, and take our chances of stampeding the guard and escaping; but on passing the whisper quietly along our line, only three men were found willing to assent to it. As the odds were so largely against us, it was in vain to urge the subject.

The march began at an early hour the next morning, and the route ran directly up the Blue Ridge. We had emerged from the forest and ascended about one-third of the height of the mountain, when the full valley became visible, spread out like a map before us, showing plainly the lines of our army, its routes of supply, its foraging parties out, and my own camp at Front Royal as distinctly as if we stood in one of its streets.

We now struck a wood-path running southward and parallel with the ridge of the mountains, along which we travelled for hours, with this wonderful panorama of forest and river and mountain before us in all the gorgeous beauty of the early autumn.

"This is a favorite promenade of mine," said Mosby. "I love to see your people sending out their almost daily raids after me. There comes one of them now almost toward us. If you please we will step behind this point and see them pass. It may be the last sight you will have of your old friends for some time," and, looking in the direction he pointed, I saw a squadron of my own regiment coming directly toward us on a road running under the foot of the mountain, and apparently on some foraging expedition down the valley. They passed within a half mile of us, under the mountain, while Mosby stood with folded arms on a rock above them.

Before noon we reached the road running through Manassas Gap, which place was held by about one hundred of Mosby's men, who signaled him as he approached, and here, much to my regret, the great guerrilla left us, bidding me a kindly good-by.

We were hurried through the gap and down the eastern side of the Blue Ridge, and by three o'clock reached Chester Gap, after passing which we descended into the valley, and move rapidly toward Sperryville on the direct line to Richmond.

Our guard was now reduced, as we are far within the Confederate lines, to Lieutenant Whiting and three men, and our party of eleven prisoners had seven horses among them. There was also a pack-horse carrying our forage, rations, and some blankets. To the saddle of this pack-horse are strapped two Spencer carbines, muzzle downward, with their accoutrements complete, including two well-filled cartridge-boxes.

I called Maek's attention to this fact as soon as the guard was reduced, and he needed no second hint to comprehend its full significance at once. He soon after dismounted, and when it came his turn to mount again, he selected, apparently by accident, the poorest and most broken-down horse of the party, with which he appeared to find it very difficult to keep up, and which he actually succeeded in some mysterious way in laming.

He then dropped back to the Lieutenant in charge and modestly asked to exchange his lame horse for the pack-horse, and being particularly winning in his address, his request was at once granted without a suspicion of its object, or a thought of the fatal carbines on the pack-saddle. I used some little skill in diverting the attention of the Lieutenant while the pack was readjusted; and as the rain had begun to fall freely no one of the guard was particularly alert.

I was presently gratified with the sight of Mack riding ahead on the pack-horse, with the two carbines still strapped to the saddle, but loosened, and well concealed by his heavy poncho, which he had spread as protection from the rain. These carbines are seven-shooters, and load from the breech by simply drawing out from the hollow stock a spiral spring, and dropping in the seven cartridges, one after the other, and then inserting the spring again behind them, which coils as it is pressed home, and by its elasticity forces the cartridges forward, one at a time, into the barrel at the successive movements of the lock.

I could see the movements of Mack's right arm by the shape into which it threw the poncho, and while guiding his horse with his left, looking the other way and chatting glibly with the other boys, I saw him distinctly draw the springs from those carbines with his right hand and hook them into the upper button-hole of his coat to support them, while he dropped in the cartridges one after another, trotting his horse at the time to conceal the noise of their click, and finally forcing down the springs, and looking round at me with a look of the finest heroism and triumph I have ever beheld.

I nodded approval, and fearing he would precipitate matters, yet knowing that any instant might lead to discovery and be too late, I rode carelessly across the road to Brown, who was on foot, and, dismounting, asked him to tighten my girth, during which operation I told him the position of affairs as quietly as possible, and requested him to get up gradually by the side of Mack, communicate with him, and, at a signal from me, to seize one of the carbines and do his duty as a soldier if he valued his liberty.

Brown was terribly frightened and trembled like a leaf, but went immediately to his post, and I did not doubt would do his duty well.

I rode up again to the side of Lieutenant Whiting, and, like an echo from the past, came back to me my words of yesterday, "Possibly my turn may come to-morrow."

I engaged him in conversation, and, among other things, spoke of the prospect of sudden death as one always present in our army life, and the tendency it had to either harden or ameliorate the character according to the quality of the individual.

He expressed the opinion which many hold that a brutal man is made more brutal by it, and a refined and cultivated man is softened and made more refined by it.

We were on the immediate flank of Early's army. His cavalry was all around us. The road was thickly inhabited. It was almost night. We had passed a rebel picket but a mile back, and knew not how near another one of their camps might be.

The three rebel guards were riding in front of us and on our flanks, our party of prisoners was in the centre, and I was by the side of Lieutenant Whiting, who acted as rear-guard, when we entered a small copse of willow which for a moment covered the road. The hour was propitious. I gave the fatal signal and instantly threw myself from my saddle upon the Lieutenant, grasping him around the arms and dragging him from his horse, in the hope of securing his revolver, capturing him, and compelling him to pilot us outside of the rebel lines. At the same instant Mack raised one of the loaded carbines, and, in less time than I can write it, shot two of the guard in front of him, killing them instantly; and then coolly turning in his saddle, and seeing me struggling in the road with the Lieutenant, and the chances of obtaining the revolver apparently against me, he raised the carbine the third time; and as I strained the now desperate rebel to my breast, with his livid face over my left shoulder, he shot him as directly between the eyes as he could have done if firing at a target at ten paces distance.

His hold relaxed, and his ghastly corpse fell from my arms. "Golly, Cap," said Mack, "I could have killed five or six more of them as well as not."

Brown had only wounded his man in the side, and allowed him to escape.

Our position was now perilous. Not a man of us knew the country, except its most general outlines. The rebel camps could not be far away; the whole country would be alarmed in an hour; darkness was intervening; and I doubted not that, before sundown, even blood-hounds would be on our track. One half our party had already scattered, panic-stricken, at the first alarm, and every man for himself, scouring the country in every direction.

But five remained, including the faithful "Wash," who immediately showed his practical qualities by searching the bodies of the slain, and recovering therefrom, among other things, my gold hunting-watch from the person of Lieutenant Whiting, and over eleven hundred dollars in greenbacks, the proceeds, doubtless, of their various robberies of our men.

"Not quite nuff," said Wash, showing his ivories from ear to ear. "Dey vally dis nigger at two thousand dollars. I tink I ought to git de money."

We instantly mounted the best horses, and, well armed with carbine and revolver, struck directly for the mountain on our right; but, knowing that would be the first place we should be sought for, soon changed our direction to the south, and rode for hours directly toward the enemy as rapidly as we could ride, and before complete darkness intervened we had made thirty miles from the place of our escape; and then turning sharp up the mountain we rode as far as horses could climb, and, abandoning them, pushed on on foot through the whole night to the very summit of the Blue Ridge, whence we could see the rebel camp-fires, and view their entire lines and position, just as daylight was breaking over the Valley.

The length of this weary day, and the terrible pangs of hunger and thirst which we suffered on this barren mountain, pertain to the more common experience of a soldier's life, and I need not describe them here.

We had to go still further south to avoid the scouts and pickets, and finally struck the Shenandoah twenty miles to the rear of Early's entire army, and there built a raft, and floated by night forty miles down that memorable stream, through his crafty pickets, until the glorious old flag once more hailed us a welcome.—Harper's Weekly.

A WONDERFUL FAT MAN.

AS I was idling about one of those towns the inhabitants of which, entertaining a serious objection to theatres, are obliged to depend, for amusement, on itinerant lecturers, conjurers, comic recitationists, popular preachers, and circuses, and other shows, my attention was drawn to a menagerie by a band of nigger minstrels stationed on the outside of it, playing appropriate airs. Above and behind the musicians a series of wonderful works of Art indicated the wonderful works of Nature to be seen within. Among these paintings was the figure of an enormously fat man, entitled, in large illuminated letters underneath his portrait, "The Second Daniel Lambert." I thought I should like to see this second Daniel, and being what is euphemistically called stout myself, walked up and demanded gratuitous admission on the ground of being one of the brotherhood. But that, the money-taker said, could not entitle me to see the lions and tigers, because, if I was a monster, still I was not a beast. I accepted the compliment, paid my money, and went in.

The Fat Man was in a sort of annexe to the caravan. He panted and perspired very much.

"Hard work, sir," I observed.

Puffing laboriously, he answered, "Yes, sir!"

"I hope, sir," I said, "that your exertions are liberally rewarded by Mr. Saunders"—the name of the showman.

"I am Mr. Saunders, sir. I am my own proprietor."

"No! Are you, though, really? Well, sir, I admire your moral courage. You show your sense, sir, in thus accepting your situation, and making the most of yourself."

"Ah, sir!" he said, "I have made the most of myself indeed. This fat, sir"—he did not say this here fat, but spoke very much like a gentleman—"all this fat is not natural."

"Is it not?"

"No, sir. I am"—here he slightly chuckled—"what you may call a self-made man."

"Ah!" said I, "that's what we stout gentlemen most of us are, I'm afraid. We do make prize-pigs of ourselves with our eyes open—in that particular unlike the pigs."

"I did it on purpose, sir."

"On purpose, sir?"

"Yes, sir, on purpose. When I started this concern, I thought I might as well become part of it, by making an exhibition of myself. I had a reason for it. What are appearances, sir?"

"Full eight yards round," I answered. "Sir, I respect your contempt for appearances, and for the people who are astonished by them, and who come and stare at you. And so you made yourself of this size, sir?"

"I did, sir."

"How did you do it, sir?"

"The old way, sir—eating and drinking."

"What did you eat, sir?"

"Potatoes. I ate a good deal of potatoes. And bread, sir. Ate a good deal of bread. You see, sir, I did just the reverse of what Mr. Banting recommends for bringing this down."

"Did you, sir?"

"Yes, sir. Butter. I ate a good deal of that. Sugar, too; large quantities of sugar. Sugar's very fattening, contains so much carbon; dissolves so fast and runs into fat. Pies, tarts, puddings, sweets of all kinds. Pork too, sir, pork; ate a great deal of pork. Not much bacon; no. Don't like it; too filling to fatten on. Salmon, stewed eels, too; nice, rich, nourishing; very fond of stewed eels. Milk and cream; have two bowls of bread and milk a day. Oil, and starch, and saccharine matter, sir; as much as possible of food containing plenty of oil, starch, and saccharine matter."

"What did you drink, sir?"

"As much fluid as possible, sir; as much of every pleasant fluid. A good deal of tea; 'tis a solvent for the solid food. Beer; ale, good fat Burton. Stout. Fruity port. Clicquot's Champagne. Hot rum and water, strong and sweet. Ah!"

"You must have had a strong motive, sir, to induce you to acquire a bulk which appears to be distressing."

"I had, sir. My wife died, sir, and at the same time I experienced a reverse of fortune. I have one son, sir, to whom I am desirous of giving a good education. Having had an indifferent one myself, I had no means of earning the wherewithal by intellectual exertion. Always rather disliked exertion of any kind. Thought that the least troublesome way of getting money would be riding about with a show. At that time Mr. Banting's pamphlet fell in my way. It made an impression on me. I wanted a wonderful fat man. Couldn't one be made by practicing the contrary of Banting's rules? Why not make one of myself? As I had determined to start a show, fancied that the pleasantest occupation would be that of cramming myself up, as my son says, for its chief attraction."

"Sir," said I, "you are a wonderful father. You are a prodigy of parental affection."

"He's in there now, sir," said the fat man, pointing to a green baize partition at the back of the van. "Home for the vacation from the University."

"Come, governor," called a voice from behind the green baize. "Time to shut up. Want to light my cigar?"

"He's not in orders yet," observed the fond father.

"Come, I say, governor!" repeated the undergraduate.

"Bless you, sir!" I cried, grasping the Fat Man's hand. "May your boy prove a blessing to you! Farewell!"

And I rushed away.

ABOUT A STAR.—Some time ago, Miss Fanny Brown, who will be remembered by all frequenters of our theatres, went away to San Francisco. She made her début in that city, recently, at Maguire's Opera House, as "Poeahontas," in Brougham's burlesque, and "Bob Nettles," in a farce.

The day was rainy, but there was an excellent house. Miss Brown appeared as a star.

The critic of THE CALIFORNIAN, who is good authority, says: "We can scarcely chronicle a success for the lady, though we do not intend to stamp the début as a failure. It was simply a mistake." Then the critic goes on to lecture about the foolishness of Atlantic stock actors who go to the Pacific coast to star. It seems that Miss Brown had been posted around the streets as "The Queen of Comedy and Song, the Successor of Mrs. John Wood," and this would not work.

"With Mrs. John Wood," says THE CALIFORNIAN, "our public were familiar; and so great a favorite was she with theatre goers, that the simple mention of any other performer as her rival or successor would be certain to provoke comparisons disadvantageous to the claims of the contestant for her place, unless based upon great and actual merit."

We mention this affair as a matter of interest to theatre-goers, and especially to theatrical performers, and we commend to the latter this moral, which THE CALIFORNIAN sagely deduces from the facts:

"To have appeared without a flourish of trumpets would have secured Miss Brown an immediate success as a pretty and accomplished little actress, a valuable addition to any stock company; but her being presented as a star went very far towards preventing the public from giving her that recognition which is legitimately her due."

That is sound doctrine. Actors and actresses, read and reflect?—N. Y. Leader.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Josh Billings is responsible for the following "Answers to Correspondents" in the New York Mercury:

HENNER: The best time to set a hen is when the hen is red. I can't tell you what the best brood is, but Shanghai is the meanest. It costs as much to board one as it does a stage boss, and you might as well undertake to fatten a mill by running oats thru it. There ain't no profit in keeping a hen for his eggs, if he laze less than one a day. Hens are very long-lived, if they don't contract the throat disease; there is a grate menny goes tew pot every year, bi this melancholly disease. I can't tell exactly how tew pick out a good hen, but as a general thing the long-eared ones are kounted the best. The one-legged ones I know, are the best at tew scratch up the garden. Eggs packed in equal parts of salt and lime water, with the other end down, will keep from 30 to 40 years if they are not disturbed. Fresh beefsteak is good for hens; I serpose 4 or 5 pounds a day would be awl a hen would need at fast along. I shall be happy to advise with you at enny time on the hen question, and—take it in eggs.

MIRACLE—Yu sa you can't understand the mirakel of the whale that swallowed Joner. I don't serpose that Joner, nor the whale, ever fully understood it themselves. I have thought that it was cazyer for the whale to swallow Joner than it was for the outsiders to swallow the mirakel. I can't tell you what Joner did while in the whale's belly; but I know what a yankee would have done; he would have rigged a rudder on the animal, and run him into port, and either claimed the ile for salvage, or sold his chance to a petroleum grease company.

Although bank bills don't grow on bushes they are nevertheless current leaves.

"NOT DEAD BUT GONE BEFORE."

WE weep, yet tears should have no place—
Our mother did not die;
The Christ child sighed for her embrace
And caught her to the sky.
Earth has one loving spirit less,
And Heaven one angel more;
Oh, write this of the name we bless:
Not dead but gone before.

The shroud, the pall, the gloomy state,
Were all a deft device;
The grave was but an emerald gate
That led to Paradise.
And now our mother's gentle hand
Waves from the golden shore—
She calls us to the better land:
Not dead but gone before.

She whispers: Lo! a loved one waits;
My children weep the while—
The angel at the Jasper gates
Will yield to mother's smile,
And open the portals at her prayer
Her loved ones to restore—
We have a mother pleading there,
Not dead but gone before.

And oft when summer roses wave
Their incense on the air,
We kneel above our mother's grave
And breathe our simple prayer:—
Oh, leave thy children not alone,
But guide us as of yore,
And lead our footsteps to the Throne,
Sweet mother, gone before.

C. H. WEBB.

THE GRAND DUKE'S NEW SUIT.

ONCE upon a time there was a grand Duke so fond of new clothes that he spent all his money on his toilet. Whenever he reviewed his troops, whenever he went to theatre or for a ride, it was always for one purpose—to show off his new clothes. Every hour of the day he changed his costume; and, as it is said of a king—"He is in his council chamber," it was said of him—"He is in his dressing-room." The capital was an exceedingly gay city, thanks to the number of foreigners passing through it. But one day there likewise came two rascals who gave themselves out for weavers, and declared they were capable of weaving the most magnificent cloth in the world. Not only were the colors and material of extraordinary beauty, but the garments made from this stuff possessed a marvelous property—they became invisible to every functionary ignorant of the requirements of his office, or to any one of limited understanding.

"Those must, indeed, be invaluable clothes," thought the Grand Duke to himself. "With them I should be enabled to find out the incapable members of my Government, and readily distinguish the competent from the incompetent. Yes, this wondrous cloth is indispensable to me." He then advanced a large sum of money to the two rogues, that they might immediately commence their work.

Indeed, they set up two looms, and made pretense of busy-ing themselves, though in reality there was absolutely nothing on the bobbins. They unceasingly asked for the finest of silk and the purest of gold thread; but they placed all that in their bag, working till midnight at their empty looms.

"I should like to know how the labor is progressing," said the Grand Duke to himself. But he felt his heart sink on recollecting that persons ignorant or incapable of fulfilling their functions were unable to see this magic cloth. Not that he for a moment doubted his own capacity, yet he judged it best to send some one to make a prior examination. The entire inhabitants of the city were cognizant of the marvelous qualities of the cloth, and all awaited impatiently the knowledge of their neighbor's stupidity.

"I will send my good old Minister to the weavers," thought the Grand Duke; "none can judge better of the merits of their work than he, distinguished as he is by his sense and knowledge of the requirements of the position he fills."

The honest old Minister entered the room in which the two impostors plied their empty looms.

"Egad!" thought he, opening wide his eyes, I can see nothing." But this he kept to himself.

The two rogues invited him to draw near, and inquired of him how he found the design and colors.

They at the same time pointed to their looms, and the old Minister earnestly fixed his gaze upon them; but he saw nothing for the simple reason that there was nothing to see.

"Gracious goodness!" thought he, "am I in reality a blockhead? None must have a suspicion of this. Can I really be incapable? I dare not avow that the cloth is invisible to me."

"Well, what do you think of it?" said one of the weavers.

"Charming! most charming!" replied the Minister, putting on his spectacles. "This design and these colors. . . . Yes, I will tell his Highness that I am extremely satisfied."

It is fortunate for us," said the two weavers; and they commenced an elaborate explanation of the forms and beauties of this imaginary piece of work. The old Minister paid the utmost attention, that he might repeat to the Grand Duke a true and full description of it.

The rogues were continuous in their demands for money, silk, and gold; an enormous quantity was required for this not-to-be-equalled tissue. Of course they pocketed all; the looms remained empty, and still they worked on.

Some time after the Grand Duke sent another honest functionary to examine the cloth and see if it advanced to a termination. The same thing happened to this new deputy as had happened to the Minister; he looked and looked, but saw nothing.

"Is not the tissue admirable?" asked the two impostors, indicating the superb design and gorgeous colors that did not exist.

"And yet I am not a simpleton," thought the visitor. "Can I be incapable of filling my office? It is strange; but I will be careful how I lose my position." He praised the cloth, and expressed his admiration at the choice and arrangement of the colors.

"It is of incomparable magnificence," said he to his master. And nothing was spoken of in the city but this extraordinary cloth.

Finally the sovereign himself desired to see it while yet on the loom. Accompanied by a crowd of chosen courtiers, among whom were the two honest functionaries, he visited the clever rogues, who plied their shuttles continually, though employing neither silk, nor gold, nor any kind of thread.

"Is it not indeed magnificent?" said the two honest functionaries. "The design and colors are worthy of your Highness." And they pointed to the empty looms, believing the others might perceive something.

"What the deuce!" thought the Grand Duke. "I can see nothing. This is terrible. Am I, then, a blockhead? Am I incapable of governing? No greater misfortune could occur." Then he cried, suddenly, "It is magnificent! And I here publicly announce my entire satisfaction." He wagged his head with a contented air, and looked at the looms, not daring to tell the truth. His snite did the same, one after the other, but without seeing anything, and repeated like him, "It is magnificent!" They even advised him to wear garments of this new cloth at the first grand procession. "It is magnificent! it is charming! it is admirable!" exclaimed every mouth; and the satisfaction was general.

The two impostors were decorated and received the title of Gentleman Weavers.

The whole night preceding the day of the procession they sat up and worked by the light of numerous tapers. The labor they imposed on themselves was visible to every one. At last they pretended to take the cloth from off the looms, sent through emptiness with large scissors, stitched with threadless needles, after which they proclaimed the raiment to be finished.

The Grand Duke, followed by his aids-de-camp, went to examine it, and the sharpers, raising their arms as though lifting something, said,

"Here are the breeches, here is the doublet, here is the mantle. They are as light as a spider's web. There is no fear of the body being oppressed by their weight; and in this, above all, lies the virtue of the cloth."

"Certainly," replied the aids-de-camp; but they saw nothing, since there was nothing to see.

"If his Grand Ducal Highness will condescend to undress," said the rogues, "we will try on him the garments before the pier-glass."

His Highness undressed, and the rogues made believe to hand him different portions of the attire. They placed their hands on his shoulder as though in the act of fastening something; it was the train. The monarch turned and turned before the glass.

"Jupiter! How well it fits! What an elegant make!" cried all the courtiers. "What a design! What colors! What a precious costume!"

The Grand Master of the Ceremonies entered.

"The canopy beneath which your Highness is to take part in the procession awaits you," said he.

"Very well! I am ready," replied the Grand Duke. "It seems to me that I have not a bad appearance!" And he gave one more turn before the glass, and cast another admiring look on the supposed splendor of his raiment.

The chamberlains, whose duty it was to bear the train, went through the performance of raising something from off the floor, then lifted their hands level with their breasts, not wishing it to be thought that they saw nothing.

While the monarch proudly headed the procession beneath his magnificent canopy everybody in the street and at the windows cried aloud: "What a superb costume! What a graceful train! What a perfect make!" No person would have it known that he saw nothing; had he done so he would have been declared incapable of holding office. Never before had his grand ducal clothes excited such an amount of admiration.

"But I don't see that he has any clothes on at all," observed a little child.

"Holy Father! only listen to the innocent!" said the parent; and the crowd soon whispered among themselves the child's remark.

"There is a little child who says that the Grand Duke has no clothes on at all!"

"He has no clothes on at all!" finally shouted the crowd; and the Grand Duke was extremely vexed, for it seemed to him that they were right. He, however, was resolved on the course to follow.

"Under any circumstances I must go through with it to the end," thought he.

Then he drew himself up more proudly than ever, and the chamberlains continued respectfully to bear the train which did not exist.

PARAGRAPHS FROM PARIS LETTER.

THE Court have returned from Compiegne. We have several anecdotes of life there. All accounts agree that Mons. Lachand was the lion of his series. He played billiards with the French Emperor and was the cavalier seul of the Empress in the only Boulangere danced at Compiegne. One evening the Court played this game: each person gave the other a given number of ivory letters, challenging the latter to guess the word in the former's mind. The Empress gave Mons. Lachand nine letters and bade him form the word she thought of. He tried in vain to class them in some readable word. Seeing his embarrassment, Mons. de Royer, the First President of the Court of Accounts, whispered to him: "It is very easy, see here," and he arranged E L O - Q U E N C E one after the other to let the eminent advocate see the delicate compliment paid him by the Empress. It is whispered that one of the guests, a painter, (a continental newspaper has annoyed Mons. Couture by asserting that the guest was he, which is false) begged hard to be allowed to stay another ten days. He was of course refused. He then prayed that he might be allowed to carry home with him a gold beaker with its dish of great price as a memento of his visit. This was not denied him; the Emperor and Empress prized it particularly and are vexed enough at the indiscretion of their guest.

Mons. Alex. Dumas goes to America in a short time. He expects you will make as great a lion of him as you made of Dickens. Here is an amusing paragraph on the subject which I clip from the Paris papers: "Dumas goes accompanied by several draughtsmen and three secretaries, for he is going to send 'copy' from America to the Parisian newspapers who dispute the honor of signing engagements with the great writer. He reckons upon sending five hundred lines a day at the very least. He intends to give lectures every day in the chief towns. He expects to go to balls, festivals and dinners—they are great dinner givers in America—every evening. After he visits the United States he will go to California and Mexico. Somebody asked him why he wanted to visit California. He replied: 'My dear fellow, I want to know how gold is made, besides since I have been making it I have never had enough left in my hands so long as to look well at it.' But the real object of Dumas' voyage to America is a treaty entered into between him and the President of the North for the pacification of the South. This treaty stipulates that Alexandre Dumas agrees to begin immediately on his landing a novel of great interest—a second Monte Cristo or Reine Margot—in the feuilleton of a Federal newspaper. The impressions of the paper containing the first part of this story will be printed in great number and distributed gratuitously to the Confederate people and army. They both will take absorbing interest in the novel. Then, all at once, when the story has reached its most exciting point, the Federal Government will discontinue the distribution of the newspaper. The Confederate States will be in consternation. The North will instantly send a message by flag of truce announcing that the illustrious Alexandre Dumas, whose liberal ideas are known to the whole world, will not write for slave holders and will not complete his novel unless the Confederates accept peace. Mr. President Davis refuses. The people and army rise against him. They force him to yield. The South is restored to the Union. Dumas ends his feuilleton and all is saved."

I heard some days since a chess anecdote which I think is worth the telling. Judge for yourself: "Abd-Allah, Emir of Jaen, dethroned his brother Abd-el-Hamid, and imprisoned him in the citadel of Salobrena, of which the alcade—who was one of his most steadfast friends—was the keeper. The dethroned captive, Abd-el-Hamid, passed away the long hours of captivity playing chess with his jailer. They were nearly matched in skill, they were both passionately fond of the game, and their long games were no sooner ended than they commenced again. History teaches that no usurper rests quietly on his throne so long as the one he wronged still lives, for the victim's very existence is a continual menace and a constant reproach. The lesson was not gainsaid by this instance. One morning while the alcade was deeply engaged in his favorite game he received orders for the immediate execution of his partner Abd-el-Hamid. The death warrant was peremptory. Its perusal so disturbed the alcade that his schemes of playing became confused and he was beaten with a rapidity and completeness unprecedented in their games. The game ended, he announced as gently as possible the fatal intelligence to his prisoner. Abd-el-Hamid received the mournful announcement with the resignation characteristic of the Moslem race. The only favor he asked was permission to live long enough to offer the alcade an opportunity of revenge for the defeat he had undergone. This wish was too near the secret desires of the alcade to be refused. The stubbornly contested game lasted a long time. Meantime a rumor that Abd-el-Hamid was sentenced to death ran with the rapidity of lightning through the town. It produced great indignation. The people remembered the gentle reign of Abd-el-Hamid and contrasted it with Abd-Allah's violence. They flew to arms. They forced the citadel and discovered the two players absorbed in their game of chess. They proclaimed Abd-el-Hamid Emir, and imprisoned Abd-Allah, who before night had forgotten his troubles in checkmating the alcade. Moral: Learn to play chess.—"Spiridion" in the Boston Gazette.

A CRITIC PROTESTS.

IT has become quite the fashion lately for managers and agents to quote the criticisms upon their plays and performers in their advertisements. This is a very excellent idea, for it gives those who read the advertisements the benefit of the best critical opinions. Unquestionably, this is far preferable to the stupid style of managerial puffs. But to be excellent and preferable it must be honestly done, and it is generally very dishonestly done.

Now I am too practical a man to expect managers to pay fifteen or twenty cents a line for the republication of attacks upon their plays or their performers. Of course, when there is a sentence of praise in a column of censure the managers will pick out that sentence to republish as an advertisement, and omit all the rest. This is quite natural, and I don't object to it. But I do object when they patch two sentences together, omitting part and including part of each, so as to make one eulogistic phrase. And I do object when they cut up a sentence so as to make the worse appear the better reason.

For example: That eminent American artist, Mr. Snooks, appears at one of our theatres, and the critics speak of him as follows:

The Herald says: "We do not think Mr. Snooks a good actor. Although he was heartily applauded, the applause was rather ironical than complimentary."

The Times says: "Mr. Snooks was nervous and ill at ease. He did not know his part, and the audience laughed constantly at his blunders. We hope never to see such acting again."

The Tribune says: "We have visited the worst theatres of Paris and London, and have witnessed a deal of bad acting in our day; but for a conscientiously, irretrievably and unpardonably bad performer commend us to Mr. Snooks."

All this being presupposed, what would we find in the advertisements of the theatre where Snooks was acting? Why, something like this:

GREAT SUCCESS OF SNOOKS!

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS,

(From the Herald.)

"We do think Mr. Snooks a good actor. He was heartily applauded. The applause was complimentary."

(From the Times.)

"The audience laughed constantly. We hope to see such acting again."

(From the Tribune.)

"We have visited the theatres of Paris and London, and have witnessed a deal of acting in our day; but for a conscientious performer commend us to Mr. Snooks."

That this is no fancy sketch may be proven from the files of the papers for almost any week—and especially for this week. I care to name no names at present; but only to ask what to call this deliberate misrepresentation? Is it swindling, or worse? How does the critic feel when he finds his remarks thus tortured and mangled, and himself forced to apparently approve what he has so emphatically rebuked? Let us ask the managers and agents who have adopted this practice to consider its criminality, and to desist from it forthwith. When critics say pleasant things, it is easy to quote them; when they say unpleasant things, it is as easy not to quote them. But to profess to quote and then to misrepresent and contradict the evident meaning of the critics is—well, I will say what it is when I see that, in order to stop the practice, somebody must be nailed by the ears.—"Ariel" in the N. Y. Leader.

We see it stated that Henry Clapp, Jr., "Figaro," formerly of the Leader, Edward H. House, of the Tribune, and William Winter ("Mercutio," of the Abion), three of the ablest dramatic critics in the country, are all writers for Mr. C. B. Seymour's new weekly paper, entitled the New York Review.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

MARGO, or The Mysteries of the Temple of Paris, was put upon the Opera House Stage on Monday evening, Miss Heron appearing as "Margo," supported by the regular company. The story of the plot has been so well told in the different dailies and so many have seen the piece that it is scarcely worth while to repeat it here. Suffice it to say that Margo was a noble rag-seller, loved by "Clergo," (Mayo) a noble charcoal vender. Margo retires from business wealthy, and is supposed to have been murdered by "Oliver Giroud," (Hill) but this turns out to be a mistake. "Count Felix de Bertrand," a Frenchman—not from Limerick, (Aldrich) figures largely, but is discovered in the end to be an impostor and a common swindler—singularly enough he does not receive the appointment of Quartermaster to a regiment of volunteers in reward for his political services. "Lacroix" (Barry) and "Lemoine" (Thayer) are the other villains of the piece, and probably get hung for their crimes, though the audience do not have the pleasure of witnessing the execution. "Edmia" (Mrs. Perry) is a pretty and virtuous sister of Margo's, betrothed to de Bertrand, but the no-Count Felix shakes her because he finds out that her sister has been a rag-picker, and is subsequently himself shaken off to prison by gens d'armes. In the grand finale, everybody is married that deserves to be, and the curtain falls on unmitigated happiness all around. Miss Heron on being called before the curtain remarked that all the merits or demerits of the piece belonged to her, and that she was indebted to the liberality of the manager for a carte blanche which enabled her to put it upon the stage in the way it was—and certainly the piece was splendidly produced.

Mathilde or The Lone Chateau replaced Margo on Wednesday evening. As a sensational play this has few rivals. "Mathilde" (Miss Heron) is invited to the lone chateau where she expects to play it alone or at least to find her husband, but she has been duped by a villain and comes very near getting euchred. "Durivage" (Mayo) and "Laroche" (Reeves) rush in through the window and rescue her, proposing to brand the villain "Lugarto" (Aldrich) on the forehead with a red hot cheese-knife for his crimes. He gets Mathilde to intercede for him, and, taking a convenient opportunity, shoots the gentleman who proposed to brand him through the back, and the curtain falls on the second act and an audience immeasurably pleased. We would feel more sympathy for Laroche, if, in threatening to shoot Lugarto through the heart, he did not present the pistol directly at that eminent scoundrel's head. Count de Lanery (Thayer), husband of Mathilde, who by a little accident mistook "Ursula" (Mrs. Edwin) for his wife, and took a trip to Paris with her, turns up suddenly, wins his wife's forgiveness, but not Durivage's—whose wife Ursula happened to be—and the latter gentleman challenges him to a duel in which Lugarto acts as second to both. De Lanery gets his ticket for soup at the first pop, but reserves his fire. Lugarto, who never intends to lose a point, and thinks it would be rather a good plan to have both his friends out of the way, as they both have reason to let him out at the first convenient opportunity, rushes up to de Lanery and suggests to him that, mortally wounded as he is, it would be a good idea to revenge himself by drilling Durivage. But de Lanery doesn't see it in that light, and very coolly amuses himself by a little practice with Lugarto, bringing him the first time. It will be seen that very few were left alive at the end of the play, but the dead and wounded came before the curtain in response to the enthusiastic call and bowed their thanks. The house was a crowded one. Our friend "Al," an excellent though somewhat convivial critic and an ardent admirer of Miss Heron's, gives it as his opinion that there is too much fighting in the play and too little drinking. But it must be remembered that Miss Heron's forte is impassioned acting, and that these plays, her own, are specially constructed for the purpose of affording her scope. Last evening Miss Heron was to take a benefit as "Camille" and we would almost dare write down that the house was a full one though this paper will have gone to press long before the curtain rings up on the lorette. Wambold ought to have had a full house at his benefit at the Academy last night, for an immense number of tickets were sold.

The announcements for the week are the usual afternoon performance at the Opera House to-day, and Mathilde in the evening. Miss Heron will appear as "Julia" in the Hunchback on Monday night. Edith, or The Earl's Daughter, is in active preparation and will be brought out soon. It is rumored, or rather positively stated: that an opera troupe has been engaged at the East by Signor Bianchi and Mr. Maguire jointly, and that the first spring month will inaugurate the season. We hope so.

NEW MILITARY DISTRICTS.—A telegraphic despatch states that Gen. Connor has been assigned to the command at Denver, with complete supervision and authority over the overland California route. Gen. Pope has been assigned to the command of a new military district, including the Departments of Missouri, Kansas and the Northwest, with his headquarters at Milwaukee. Gen. Dodge is in command of the Department of Kansas, with his headquarters at Leavenworth.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The Carson Post intimates that some of the Nevada legislators indulge in the mysteries of draw-poker.

Horace Jones was killed by the caving of a bank of earth in the Oliver Tunnel, Feb. 15th.

On February 14th, Frank King was severely injured near Dutch Flat, by a cave of dirt and gravel.

The new hoisting works of the Ophir and Mexican Mining Companies in Nevada are now in successful operation.

The dwelling house of F. Heath, near the smelting works at Quincy, Plumas county, was destroyed by fire on February 17th. None of the furniture was saved.

Chief Justice Sanderson's house, in Sacramento, was burglariously entered an evening or two ago, and robbed of considerable valuables.

A silver excitement on a small scale has broken out in Folsom, owing to the discovery of silver ore near the line dividing Sacramento and El Dorado counties.

Almond trees were in such early bloom at Sacramento the present season, that they are expected to drop their ripe fruit in April.

The Calaveras river has overflowed its banks, spread widely over the adjacent country, and greatly injured the road leading from Stockton to the Southern mines.

Davidson & Co., says the Colusa Sun, have made arrangements to work the oil spring near Botts'. They are going to all the expense of boring, etc., and giving the claimants one-fourth of the oil, in the barrel, at the spring.

The Visalia Della is authorized to say that the lands in the Valley of Owens River are now subject to location or sale either by pre-emption or homestead, the restrictions upon the Indian Reservation having been removed December 19, 1864.

The Red Bluff Independent states that the average current of the Sacramento river, at low water, is about four miles an hour; common high water, the average is about six miles. During the flood of 1862, it was as strong as ten miles an hour.

The Yreka Journal learns that John Stevenson shot a large California lion near his ranch on the Klamath, which had been killing his hogs. The lion measured about seven feet from the tip of his nose to the end of his tail. He was a savage looking animal, with teeth at least two inches long.

On the 21st inst., says the Folsom Telegraph, the proprietors of the Granite Mills will commence the grading for a new railroad, running from the railroad bridge on the American river, along the west bank of that river, a distance of three-fourths of a mile to their mills. The S. V. R. R. Company are to furnish the iron for the track.

The telegraph reports the death of R. M. Jessup, at Panama. Mr. Jessup was a pioneer of this State, noted for his enterprise and benevolence. He served in the Legislature of the State, and from its organization was a prominent member of the California Steam Navigation Company, of which he was Vice President at the time of his death.

Several of the mining claims on the North Fork, Plumas county, are paying big for this time of the year. Orton & Harris' claim is paying them from eight to twelve dollars per day, and Thompson & Co.'s claim is averaging about an ounce a day to the hand. Several other claims are paying from four to six dollars per day.

The Grass Valley National gives an account of a free fight which took place in that town recently, at a dance between a party of Germans on one side and Cornishmen on the other. Clubs, stones, staves, beer mugs, beer kegs, shovels, etc., were the weapons used. About one hundred men were engaged in the muss, several of whom were severely bruised, but none fatally injured.

Charles Lieb, a somewhat noted Western politician, died at Prescott, Arizona, January 21, 1865. Dr. Lieb was a member of the Lecompton (Kansas) Convention, but afterward removed to Chicago and became a warm Republican. Removing to Arizona early in 1864, he ran for Territorial Representative at the first election held in the Territory, but was beaten by Colonel Poston, the present incumbent.

The Folsom Telegraph is informed by a gentleman of that town that a corps of engineers have been sent there by the owners of the Leidesdorff grant to survey off the lands upon the grant into small sections, for the benefit of those who desire to purchase. All now living upon the grant will have their farms surveyed to suit themselves, and will have the privilege to purchase in preference to any others.

Herman Wohler, of San Francisco, was shot on the night of Feb. 19th, at Iona Valley, while lying in bed. The assassin fired through a window. The ball passed through his right arm and entered the right breast below the nipple, inflicting a serious, but it is thought not fatal, wound. Deputy Marshal Swain, with a company of troops, was enforcing a judgment in ejectment in favor of the Arroyo Seco Rancho, and Wohler was in line to receive possession. It is therefore supposed that the would-be murderer was a squatter.

(For the Californian.)

THE FABLE.

MYTH of the sages, beautiful and rare
And richer for thine age, like wine
That bubbles in a twilight silence, where
No light may delve the mine

Of ancient shadow caverns, until when
A single golden ray succeeds
In threading all the gloomy halls and then
Is strung with purple beads

That quiver like a thousand rosy stars
A-glow on some bright burning shore,
Each with the fiery brilliancy of Mars
All flecked in battle gore.

A twinkling chain of linked beauties, each
An hundred pleasing hues engage,
From lofty mysteries of the past they reach
Down to this earthy age.

Such is the fable, gleaming from the past—
Rich jewels from a casket old,
Circled with shadows but not overcast,
Strung on Time's thread of gold

CHAS. WARREN STODDARD.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 25th, 1865.

MISS. M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XVI.—CONTINUED.

AND then at last it was discovered that Francis Tredethlyn, who had volunteered to carry a tea-tray, or a coal-scuttle, or to announce a carriage, or to perform any ignominious part in the drama for Miss Hillary's pleasure—it was discovered all at once that this young man was able to act. He was no untaught Macready, no ready-made Kean, but he was able to do what the best of the government clerks and literary barristers failed in doing; he was able to roll out the melodious blank verse in a big, deep voice, that never failed him to the end of the chapter. The stage is almost as great a leveller as death himself, and on that little platform at Twickenham uneducated Francis Tredethlyn was quite as much at his ease as the well-bred young men about him: more at his ease, for he was not so bent upon distinguishing himself, and was indeed only eager to oblige Miss Hillary. All this had happened before the autumn visit to Brighton, and now when Maude returned to the Cedars she found busy workmen making a perpetual hammering in the apartment which had been chosen for the scene of the entertainment. Mr. Hillary did everything in a superb manner; there was to be no pitiful contrivance of folding-doors festooned by suburban carpenters, but accomplished people from town had come down to the Cedars, and a magnificent archway of white and gold spanned the lofty billiard-room which the merchant had built at one end of his house. All the arrangements were to be perfection: the lighting of the small stage was to be a miracle of art, the grouping of the furniture had been studied by genre painters of no mean pretensions. Poor Maude grew sick at heart as she heard all these details discussed. She looked back, and wondered, as she remembered what a frivolous creature she had been only a few months ago, and how this amateur dramatic performance had seemed a matter of supreme importance to her; and now she repeated the words mechanically during those long rehearsals, in the course of which the amateurs had so many angry disputations, and so cruelly victimized Mr. Hillary's pale sherry.

At last the new year began, and at ten o'clock upon the first night in January long lines of carriages filled the avenue at the Cedars, and the road outside the lodge gates, until the neighborhood was luminous with flaming lamps that glared redly in the winter darkness. People came from far and wide to see Miss Hillary play "Pauline," and to devour Mr. Gunter's supper, though Miss Hillary's heart might be breaking, and the merchant's head splitting with the weight of care that pressed just now upon his overtaxed brain! But people do get through these things somehow; and Lionel Hillary walked about his drawing rooms, looking supremely gentlemanly in a stiff cambric cravat, and uttering mild commonplace for the edification of new arrivals.

People get through these things. Poor Maude's head ached with a dull pain as her maid arrayed her in a dress of white silk, showered rosebuds, and flounced and looped with lace and ribbon. Would any of this finery be paid for? Miss Hillary wondered, as she saw her splendor reflected in the cheval glass; or was it altogether dishonesty and wickedness? She shuddered as she thought of this; but the entertainment of to-night was only a part of the grand hypocrisy which might help to float Mr. Hillary safely over the terrible crisis, and Maude determined to be true to her promise. So she smiled at Julia Desmond, when that young lady, who was to play "Madame Deschappelles," came to exhibit herself in powder and patches, and with brocade and diamonds, and with half the point lace in South Audley street bestowed upon her handsome person. Miss Desmond had consented with amazing graciousness to perform the matronly role allotted to her; but she had determined to look like a marquise of the time of Louis Quinze, and she had despatched Francis Tredethlyn on half a dozen shopping expeditions, until that gentleman was fain to wonder how a few ribbons, brocaded labrics, and yellow old lace flounces could cost the big sums for which he wrote cheques in favor of the West End tradesmen to whom Julia sent him.

The two girls admired each other's dresses, and the maid joined in a perfect chorus of laudations with a young lady who would play the "Widow Melnotte" in a nine-guinea black moire antique, and a point lace cap and apron, and who kept snatching a manuscript copy of her part from her pocket, and furtively gabbling its contents in dark corners. The girls admired each other, and sailed down the broad staircase together, and went straight to a little anteroom, where half a dozen gentlemen, in attitudes expressive of supreme mental agony, were hending over half a dozen copies of the Lady of Lyons, and gabbling vehemently.

There is no occasion to describe this amateur performance at the Cedars, inasmuch as it very closely resembled all other amateur performances. Miss Hillary, stepping on to a stage for the first time, was, to say the least, not quite a Helen Faucit, and was on the point of breaking down now and then in some of her grand speeches; but she looked so beautiful in her perplexity and confusion, that the elegant audience encouraged and supported her by the gentlestappings of spangled fans and pattings of tight kid gloves. There were no tiresome boys in the gallery to urge her to speak up; no critical chimney sweeps to murmur their disapproval, or hint that she had better go home and learn her part. There was only admiration for her timid loveliness, and the soft music of her treasured voice.

Of course there were the usual number of dead pauses in the drama, technically known as "stage-waits," the solemn silences in which the actors stood still and looked imploringly at one another, while the voices of amateur prompters—always inciting their victims to the utterance of wrong speeches—were painfully audible throughout the assemblage. Mr. Tredethlyn rolled out his blank verse with a sturdy courage that was worthy of all praise; and if his hands were a little red, and his blue cotton blouse slightly suggestive of Newgate market, he had acted with his brother soldiers in very rough performances out in Van Diemen's Land, and now and then some touch of natural fire, some little bit of tender pathos, startled the well-bred audience into applause. It may be that now and then Francis Tredethlyn found himself carried away by the spirit of the scene. Did not that romantic drama bear some likeness to his own story? This beautiful "Pauline," this unapproachable being whose lovely image filled the peasant's dreams, who was she but Maude Hillary herself? Perhaps if Miss Desmond had been the "Pauline," Francis might have seemed as cold and tame as the rest of the Twickenham amateurs; but the eye that looked at him tenderly or reproachfully to-night were the only eyes in all the world that had the power to move him deeply. He acted well, therefore, as the dullest man will act sometimes under the influence of some factitious excitement; and when the curtain fell upon the final scene of happy and triumphant love, the audience were loud in their praise of "that handsome-looking Mr. Tredethlyn, who was just the very man for 'Claude Melnotte.'"

Then there was a final parting of the curtains and a shower of bouquets, all in the orthodox style, and Maude felt perfumed petals fluttering about her as she curtsied to her indulgent audience.

All through that last act she had surprised those well-bred spectators out of their natural languor. The "Pauline" who had been so tame and unimpassioned in the grand cottage scene, was carried away by a strong tide of passionate feeling in that last act, where the half broken-hearted daughter pleads for her insolvent father. Sobs almost choked Miss Hillary's utterance more than once in this scene; and when at last her head lay for a few moments on Francis Tredethlyn's breast, the young man's martial decorations were wet with real tears. The sight of that emotion moved him strangely, though he beheld in it nothing more than the natural excitement of a highly sensitive organization. After the little ovation that came with the close of the drama, he followed Maude Hillary into the anteroom, where the rest of the amateurs were discussing the night's business, and flirting with the gay Julia, and thence to an inner room, less brilliantly lighted, and quite unoccupied. Beyond this inner room there was another apartment—the study in which Francis had fallen an easy victim to the wiles of the Hibernian enchantress—and it was to this room that Maude hurried, still followed by Mr. Tredethlyn.

He had no business to follow her. He knew that very well. His business was with Julia, who had acted "Madame Deschappelles" with wonderful spirit, and for whom the evening had been one long triumph, inasmuch as her lace, and diamonds, and brocade, and dark eyes, and white teeth had been the subjects of universal admiration. Mr. Tredethlyn's business lay in that brilliantly lighted antechamber where Julia sat amongst the government clerks, and barristers, and grand military dandies, while an accompaniment of perpetually popping champagne corks mingled pleasantly with the noise of their laughter. He knew this, and yet he followed Maude to the dimly lighted study, where the red glow of the fire flickered on the bindings of the books and the frames of the pictures. He could not leave off being "Claude Melnotte" all in a moment. The exaltation of the mimic scene was still upon him. Just now he had been carried quite away by the influence of the poetic situation; and when he flung down the shaw money, which was to release the merchant's daughter from her hated suitor, a warmer thrill of triumph had stirred his breast than had ever been engendered by the possession of Oliver Tredethlyn's thousands.

And now he could not fall back to his old position all at once. Only a minute or two ago Maude Hillary had been sobbing on his breast—his bride, his wife; and he half fancied he had some kind of right to sympathize with her emotion. He stopped suddenly on the threshold of the study, quite unmanned by the sight of Mr. Hillary's daughter half kneeling, half lying on the ground, with her face buried in the cushions on a sofa, and her hands clasped in a despairing attitude above the fair tangled hair that had so lately lain upon his breast. Her whole frame was shaken by the vehemence of her sobs; and before such a picture as this it was scarcely strange if poor country-bred Francis Tredethlyn quite forgot that he was not Claude Melnotte. He bent over the prostrate girl, and laid his big fingers gently upon one of those little bejewelled hands clasped so convulsively above the fair head.

"Miss Hillary," he exclaimed, "dear Miss Hillary, for pity's sake tell me what distresses you—what has happened—what is wrong—or—I—I beg your pardon—you have over-fatigued yourself, and you are hysterical; let me send for your maid."

"Oh, no, no, no!" cried the girl, rising to her feet and standing before him, but with her face still hidden from him, hidden by her outspread hands and her dishevelled hair.

"Shall I call Julia? she is in the room yonder."

"Oh, no! I—I want to speak to you, Mr. Tredethlyn; stay just a little, please. Ah! it is so hard, so cruel, but the last chance! In all the world there is no one else who can save me—and my father—my poor, miserable bankrupt father!"

Francis looked at Miss Hillary in complete bewilderment. Her father—her bankrupt father! Why, then, she was still thinking of the scene that was just finished, and the commercial troubles of Monsieur Deschappelles; which character, by the way, had been enacted by a very young man of a sickly cast of countenance and an inclination to hang his head dejectedly throughout the performance of the drama. It is a rule amongst amateurs to assign the elderly and indelible characters to the youngest and meekest members of the company; whereby Monsieur Deschappelles is usually represented as a young person of some nineteen summers, with flour in his hair, dirty streaks, supposed to represent wrinkles, upon his face, and a tendency to squeakiness in his voice.

"I am sure you are over-fatigued, over-excited by the play," urged Francis; "do let me call Julia."

"No!" cried Miss Hillary, dropping her hands from before her face. "Oh, Mr. Tredethlyn," she exclaimed, almost passionately, "can't you understand—can't you see that I am in earnest? Do you think that scene just now would have made me cry as it did if it had not reminded me of my own sorrow? Mr. Tredethlyn—I know you are a good man, that you would not be slow to do a kindness for any one who needed your help; I know that; and I—I thought I should have courage to speak to you, but now the words won't come—I—"

Her dry lips moved, but made no sound. She clasped her hands once more before her face. Heaven knows how desperate was the effort that she made. It is not such an easy matter to borrow twenty thousand pounds; even though the borrower may be young and beautiful, and accustomed to perpetual adoration.

"Miss Hillary, you speak of help—needing help—from me. For mercy's sake, tell me how I can help you. Do you think there is anything upon earth that would give me such pride and delight as to be of service to you?"

The enthusiasm of the moment lighted up Francis Tredethlyn's countenance like a sudden glow of summer sunshine. Maude uncovered her face and looked at him, and saw at once that her cause was gained; her father's preserver was found. She had not counted in vain upon Francis Tredethlyn.

"I want you to lend papa twenty thousand pounds," she said; "I know that he will repay you honorably. He has some difficulties—terrible difficulties in his business—but the loan of twenty thousands would smooth them all away. I know that you are very, very rich, Mr. Tredethlyn, and that you can afford to lend such a sum of money, or I should never have dared—"

"You would not have dared, Miss Hillary? Oh, can you doubt I would give the last sixpence I have in the world, the last drop of my heart's blood, to save you from one pang? Twenty thousand pounds! Take forty—fifty thousand—the utmost farthing of my fortune, if you will—squander it—throw it into the river yonder, if the waste of it can give you a moment's pleasure. Oh, you don't know, you don't know how I love you!"

He had been acting "Claude Melnotte," and the intoxication of the sweet sentimental poetry was strong upon him; beyond which it is just possible that he may have taken a little more sparkling Moselle in the course of his dramatic exertions than can safely be taken by a young man of sanguine temperament. All prudence, all power of reticence left him at that moment, and he dropped on his knees at Miss Hillary's feet, like a lover in a stage play. She was so beautiful—she seemed so far away from him, even now, when her distress had brought her a little nearer than of old—that this attitude of adoration seemed quite natural to him, almost the only attitude in which he dared address her.

"Oh, if you knew how I love you," he cried, passionately—"if you could only believe or understand! But I am so ignorant—so unworthy—so far beneath you."

Miss Hillary drew herself away from him with a gesture of mingled surprise and disgust.

"You dare to talk to me like this, and you are the affianced husband of my friend!" she cried. "Oh, Mr. Tredethlyn, you take a very mean advantage of my father's difficulties and my distress."

"Yes!" answered Julia Desmond from the doorway. She had been standing on the threshold for the last few moments, watching this interview behind the scenes. "Yes! it is altogether mean and shameful, Maude Hillary. You have taken noble course, I think, when you fling your father's debts upon the man who was to be my husband, and coolly ask him for the trifling loan of twenty thousand pounds." She laughed bitterly as she named the sum. "Twenty thousand pounds—and you ask your friend's lover to turn money-lender; and you bring your tears and hysterical sobs, and a thousand pretty amateur dramatic devices to bear, in order to obtain what you want, and all in the most childish innocence, of course. And then you turn upon the man whom you have lured to your feet by a hundred tricks and artifices, and make charming show of surprise and indignation. Ah! it is shameful, Maude Hillary—mean, and cruel, and false; and bitter shame shall come to you for this night's work."

The Irishwoman was superb in her indignation. Those flashing eyes and glittering teeth, hereditary in the race of the Desmonds, seemed to light her face with an infernal kind of splendor; such a splendor had many a fated victim seen upon the duelling Irish colonel, just before he fell prone on some lonely field beside the Shannon. It was against Maude that the fuller fury of Julia Desmond's rage was directed—against Maude, of whom she had always been jealous, in whom she had continually found a triumphant rival. It was only after that outburst of jealous rage that Julia turned upon her recreant lover. Francis had risen from his knees, and stood a little away from the two girls, with a dogged moodiness on his face: he was sobered by Maude's indignation and Julia's passion, and he was dimly aware that he had acted like a scoundrel.

"As for you, Mr. Francis Tredethlyn," Miss Desmond said presently, "I suppose I have no need to tell you that all is over between us, and that I bitterly repent the humiliation my own folly has brought upon me. I should have known how much I risked when I stooped to regard a person whose code of honor belongs to a different world from that in which I have been reared. I suppose amongst your people it is the fashion for a man to pledge himself to one woman and then make love to another; but such is not the custom in the circles where the Desmonds have been used to be welcome. I should have known what I had to expect when I came into this house. I should have known what I had to anticipate when I trusted in the truth and loyalty of a man who is not a gentleman."

Throughout this speech Julia's hands had been moving rapidly, but with unflinching purpose, though they trembled a little all the while. One by one she had unfastened the diamond ornaments that had glittered upon her head and wrists, her throat and bosom, and now the jewels lay in a little heap at the feet of Francis Tredethlyn. One by one she had thrown them there during that passionate speech. She could not act her play out. She had been unable to support the character she had undertaken. The fiery blood of the Ryan O'Bryan Desmond had asserted itself in spite of all the promptings of prudence, all the bitter schooling of experience. It was very dreadful to be poor and dependent. It would have been delightful to be mistress of thirty thousand a year; but Julia Desmond, coming to the threshold of the study, had heard Maude's appeal for the twenty thousand pounds, and Francis Tredethlyn's impassioned avowal, and patience and policy had alike deserted her. Carried away by the impulse of the moment, she renounced everything. At last Francis Tredethlyn spoke for himself.

"I know that I have acted very badly," he said. "I had no right to speak; I never should have spoken but for that play. I think I must have almost fancied myself that poor garden-er's son, who dared to worship the brightest creature that ever crossed his pathway, and in an evil hour told her of his madness. Ah, forgive me, Miss Hillary; do not hate or despise me for what I said just now; let it pass like the play in which we acted to-night. And you, Julia—Miss Desmond, I am not too proud to ask your forgiveness for the wrong I have done you. I have been very guilty, and I accept your reproaches in all their bitterness. But when I promised to be your true and faithful husband, I only made a promise that I am still prepared to fulfil. You will at least do me the justice to remember that I did not profess any warmer feeling than admiration and esteem."

"Your justification is only a new insult, Mr. Tredethlyn," Julia answered, coldly. "I wish you good night."

Her passion had been something terrible in its suppressed vehemence some moments before, but she was quite calm now. She swept towards the door leading out into the corridor; but as she passed the merchant's daughter she stopped, just long enough to utter one brief sentence close in the young lady's ear.

"You shall suffer for this, Miss Hillary," she said. She left the room; but Maude followed her, crying—

"Julia! Julia!"

She hurried along the corridor and up the staircase, following closely upon Miss Desmond; but when she reached that young lady's room, the door was shut in her face, and only one answer came to her almost piteous pleadings for admission.

"I have nothing to say to you, Miss Hillary. I only regret that I must pass one more night in this house."

So Maude was obliged to go away in despair, and, meeting her maid at the door of her own room, was informed that Mr. Hillary had been inquiring for her, "ever so many times," the maid said; "and I've been looking for you everywhere, Miss, to know when you'd have your dress changed."

Yes, there was to be more changing of dresses before Maude's work was done. She resigned herself with a sigh to the hands of the young person who waited upon her, and then went down-stairs, gorgeous in pink silk and crape puffings, and with a crown of dewy rosebuds on her head, to receive the compliments and congratulations of her father's friends, and to act her part in that social drama which was quite as difficult a performance as the "Lady of Lyons."

Francis Tredethlyn sat quite alone in the little dimly lighted study at the end of the long, rambling mansion, while Mr. Hillary's guests finished the evening with a little dancing, a great deal of flirting, and a perpetual sipping of sparkling wines, in out-of-the-way corridors and lobbies, where there were hothouse flowers and low chintz-covered ottomans, and an air of loneliness conducive to flirtation. Francis Tredethlyn sat alone, with Julia's diamonds still lying at his feet, and brooded over his position. He had outraged Maude, whom he adored. He had injured Julia, to whom he was bound by every sentiment of honor and good faith. No words can express the bitterness of his remorse as he sat pondering upon what he had done. "False to my cousin Susan, false to Julia Desmond," he thought, "nothing but mischief has come to me since I inherited that miserable money. I have no right to be amongst these people. I never should have come to this house, where her presence has always seemed to turn my brain."

He looked down at the diamonds lying on the carpet, and smiled bitterly as he remembered how much money they represented—more than had been spent on Susan Tredethlyn in all the girl's joyless life—ten times more than would have restored the young man's father to solvency and comfort, that time when his uncle refused him the loan of two hundred pounds.

He stooped and gathered together the fallen jewels. There was a writing-table near him, with pens, and paper, and sealing-wax, and all necessary implements. He selected a large sheet of paper, and packed the diamonds into a parcel. But before sealing the packet he wrote a few lines on the margin of the paper:

"DEAR MISS DESMOND: I beg you to retain the enclosed. They were given to you as an evidence of my esteem and admiration, as well as of my gratitude for your indulgent kindness to one so much beneath you as myself. I implore you to forget and pardon what has happened to-night. I am too ignorant of the world in which you live to know what I ought to do; and I can only assure you that I am ready to submit myself entirely to your discretion, and still hold myself bound by every word I said in this room on the day when you promised to be my wife.

"Yours sincerely,

"FRANCIS TREDETHLYN."

No one but the servants knew when or how Mr. Tredethlyn left the Cedars on that first night of the New Year; but a little before one o'clock the next day a letter was delivered to Mr. Hillary—a letter from the assistant manager of a certain bank in the City, informing the merchant that a sum of twenty thousand pounds had that morning been placed to his credit.

(To be continued.)

THE BABY TOWER OF SHANGHAI.

THE following is from a description of the Chinese city of Shanghai contributed to the Continental Magazine by H. B. Auchincloss: "The only structure like a tower, if we except the turrets on the city walls and watch-towers erected within the past few years, when the Taepings have threatened the city, is a tall, white monument, rising to the height of twenty feet, and without inscription or distinguishing mark of any description. It looks like a fine, white tomb, higher and more ambitious than usual, and truly it is a 'whited sepulchre!' Baby Tower, it is called by the foreign residents, for it is filled with the bones of infants—not such as have died a natural death as Bayard Taylor asserts, but which have been thrust into this horrid monument of heathen cruelty when but a few hours old. Humanity shudders at the thought! These dazzling white baby towers, with their mockery of purity, their object known to all men, and openly inviting, as it were, the most unnatural and heartless murders, are among the most hideous spectacles to be met with in a heathen land. True, a river or a pond will be pointed out to you in other parts of China or in India, where babies are daily drowned like puppies or kittens; but they do not affect the mind with such a horror as these palpable structures, erected with the best skill of their architects for this express purpose. The water closes over the murdered infant, and no trace of the crime remains; but here is a tower—a high tower with deep foundations, filled with the bones of murdered babes that have been accumulating for ages.

"No wonder that Christian mothers, residents in the East, cannot speak of them or see them without a shudder, and never willingly pass them in their drives. Who knows but they might hear, if they approached the tower, the wail of some poor infant just thrown in, or meet its father returning from his cruel errand!

"At Shanghai the Baby Tower stands on the southwest side of the city, without the walls, but at Foo Chow, where the crime of infanticide is still more prevalent, they use no baby towers, but have provided ponds for the express purpose. It is the saddest part of this great national crime of the Chinese, but it is sanctioned by the mandarins and viewed as a disagreeable necessity, not as a crime.

"It has been the fashion of late years to deny the existence of this abomination: the doubters, wise in their own conceit, insisting that the crime is too great for human nature.

"Human nature, unfortunately, has proved but a frail barrier to crime of this character in all parts of the world, and the facts of Chinese infanticide are indisputable. The witnesses are too numerous, the crime is too public, and the evidence of it too notorious to deny its existence. The children destroyed are girls; the most common methods of destroying them are: first by drowning in a tub of water; second, by throwing into some running stream; third, by burying alive. The last named mode is adopted under the hope and with the superstitious belief that the next birth will be a boy. The excuse is that it is too expensive to educate a girl, but if some friend will take the child to bring up as a wife for a little boy, the parent will sell or give away the infant rather than destroy it. The regular price is two thousand copper cash, or two dollars for every year of their lives, for sometimes a girl will be saved for a year or two, and then sold for a wife or slave. Many instances have come to the notice of missionaries where large families of girls have been destroyed. There is one woman now employed as a nurse in a missionary's family at Fuh-Chow, who says that her mother had eight girls and three boys, and that she was the only girl permitted by her father to live. We never heard of an instance of a boy being destroyed at birth. There is a little village about fifteen miles from Fuh-Chow, which is swarming with boys, but where girls are very scarce. The people account for it themselves by the common practice of killing the girls at birth, a practice which is indulged in by the rich as well as the poor."

BRIDE AND GROOM A CENTURY AGO.—To begin with the lady: Her locks were straitened upward over an immense cushion that sat like an incubus on her head, and plastered over with pomatum, and then sprinkled over with a shower of white powder. The height of this tower was somewhat over a foot. One single white rosebud lay on its top like an eagle on a haystack. Over her neck and bosom was folded a lace handkerchief, fastened in front by a bosom-pin rather larger than a dollar, containing your grandfather's miniature set in virgin gold. Her airy form was braced up in a satin dress, the sleeves as tight as the natural skin of the arm, with a waist formed by a bodice, worn outside, from whence the skirt flowed off, and was distended at the top by an ample hoop. Shoes of white kid, with peaked toes, and heels of two or three inches elevation, inclosed her feet, and glittered with spangles, as her little pedal members peeped curiously out. Now for the swain: His hair was sleeked back and plentifully bedowered, while his quene projected like the handle of a skillet. His coat was a sky-blue silk, lined with yellow; his breeches of the same material, and tied at the knee with pink ribbon. White silk stockings and pumps, with laces, and ties of the same hue, completed the habiliments of his nether limbs. Lace ruffles clustered around his wrist, and portentous frills worked in correspondence, and bearing the miniature of his beloved, finished his truly genteel appearance.

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

All kinds of JOB PRINTING done with neatness and despatch, at reasonable rates.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1865.

THE END NEAR.

IT really looks now as though a pet phrase which has been in use since the first commencement of hostilities, "the backbone of the rebellion is broken," might be spoken without bringing the utterer into ridicule. For Charleston, the very hotbed of the damnable dogma of Secession, is ours the fortifications which first belched the smoke and fire of disloyalty are in the possession of the government against which the guns were aimed; everywhere victorious, our armies have swept over the whole length and breadth of the State whereof Charleston was the burning and dangerously restless heart. There is not a State in the whole Confederacy where the stars and stripes have not been triumphantly borne, the glory of the banner undimmed of late by a single defeat. Under these sunny influences gold has gone down with the rapidity that should be the natural consequence of its gravity, and greenbacks have risen in the opposite scale with the corresponding speed which befits their buoyancy. There is a very general impression on all sides, well founded in facts, that the war is now near its end and that the backbone of the rebellion is indeed broken.

Charleston in our hands, the question is already being agitated, What shall we do with it? In very many quarters there is a very serious inclination to interpret the old cry, Carthago est delenda, into "Charleston must be destroyed." As the city where the rebellion was fostered, "level its walls," cry they; "plough up its streets and sow them with salt, fertilizing the furrows with the ashes of its houses!" But this seems rather an extreme idea—a bitter retribution in the abstract, but a very lame and impotent revenge in reality. On the principle that the worst use you can put a man to is to hang him, certainly the worst use that a city can be put to is its destruction. It must be remembered that the North has still a slight interest in the South, for when the historical question of which side began the rebellion is ended, the historical one of who shall pay for it, will be just commenced. To destroy property and deprive the conquered people of town lots and water fronts, will be to deprive them of the privilege of paying their proportion in the final settlement which must ensue as to the fiddling. If the interests of trade demand it, and Charleston harbor is irretrievably sealed up by the obstructions which lie at the bottom of the roads, it may be well to make some adjacent harbor the port of entry; but even then it were but politic to suffer Charleston to stand, though only as a country village of inferior importance. The idea of sowing it with salt is absurd as well as impracticable, for salt does not yield as plentifully to the acre as potatoes, and our government is scarcely in the salt business if it did.

The question, too, arises, what shall be done with the people we have conquered—if present signs hold good—for we fancy that even the most rabid howlers will scarcely insist that their plan of annihilation be indeed carried out to the letter, sweeping every man, woman and child of the Gulf States into the gulf. We imagine that social amenities will have to be brought into play and that an interchange of kindly sentiment and offices will have to finish what an interchange of blows began.

Perhaps, however, it were better to wait until our turbot is fairly caught before we discuss as to how it shall be cooked. True, the fish seems to be well hooked, and the probabilities are that struggles to get free will be in vain and that it will be brought safely to land; but for all that, it is scarcely worth while to heat the frying pan yet or agitate the less important question of sauce and gravy. In this connection we cannot forbear calling attention to Oliver Wendell Holmes' "Voice of the Loyal North," published in another part of this paper. Originally printed in 1861, it has now assumed the proportions of a prophecy. For the tempest has indeed swung "the pine against the palm," and the collision has scarcely turned to the advantage of the latter tree. And the event has proved indeed that it was in an unfortunate moment that those who live beneath the palmetto's shade "played with Northern fire." Let us be prepared to "give all their country each his right," for the end seems near.

ARIZONA.

GOVERNOR GOODWIN and Secretary McCormick of Arizona are receiving much attention from our citizens. This is as it should be, for, apart from their personal merits, they are the representatives of a country in which the people of this coast have a lively interest and the development of which they much desire.

The Governor and Secretary bring to us the most intelligible account of the newly opened portion of the Territory, the region about Fort Whipple and the capital town of Prescott. This district which may be called Central Arizona was almost unknown to the white man until entered by the Territorial officials in the fall of 1863, via the 35th parallel. It is represented as vastly different from the Gila or Colorado country. The climate is exquisite, neither too warm in summer nor too cold in winter. The valleys are large and well watered. Grazing and farming lands are quite abundant and there is an immense extent of pine forest. With these marked advantages the mines are even more extensive and promising than those of any other part of the Territory—fine specimens of ore shown us are certainly worthy to compare with any we have seen from California or Nevada. The lodes are said to be wide and exceedingly well defined.

Prescott is located 150 miles north of the Gila and the same distance from the Colorado, upon a line nearly parallel with that of Williams' Fork. It was laid out in May last, and now contains about one hundred houses. It is to be connected with the Rio Grande and the Pacific by a weekly mail, and wagon roads will be constructed to several points upon the Colorado. The route from the Rio Grande via the pass of Zuni, is one of the best across the continent.

Arizona is now in the Military Department of the Pacific and under the command of General Mason. Additional troops will at once be sent there, and a vigorous campaign be made against the Apache Indians. Their power broken, nothing, we believe, will prevent the rapid settlement of the Territory, and its great prosperity. Those who have been wont to pronounce it a desert can no longer do so. Throwing out the mines below the Gila and upon the Colorado, many of which are of proven merit, those of the central region, a district as great as the State of New York, are sufficient to support a vast population, and the facilities for working them would seem to be unsurpassed.

HOW IT HAPPENED.—The Sacramento correspondent of an interior paper explains the origin of the late party excitement and "social amenity" row, as follows: "The party lately given by General McDowell and his accomplished lady at the Occidental Hotel in San Francisco, has furnished the Copperhead and Union press of the State indiscriminately with the occasion for gross misrepresentation and abuse. A young man—a Copperhead and a fool, but a clever writer—rooms at the Occidental, and is the regular sensational correspondent of the Sacramento Union. While the party was yet in expectancy he chanced to hear of it, and communicated the fact as a choice bit of gossip to the Union; and for the sake of giving it additional pungency and spiciness, accompanied it with the statement, fabricated by himself or imposed upon him by some reckless wag, that the party was to be given for the purpose of restoring social amenities and reconciling political differences between Union people and Copperheads—or something to that effect. This statement was eagerly caught up by Copperhead papers, and the supposititious "harmonizing" programme of the General applauded and defended, for the very purpose of weakening his influence and destroying his reputation among Union men."

"ARTEMUS WARD, showman," has said some very funny things, and now he notifies the gentleman who left phosphorus in his bed at the St. Nicholas Hotel, that if he will leave his name with General Dix he will hear of something to his advantage. People may say or think of Artemus what they choose; he is a genius, and a droll one, and he possesses enough shrewdness to turn that genius to practical account, making it pay him the interest, at six per cent., of about $250,000 yearly. Under these conditions he can very well afford to stand the pen-thrusts he occasionally gets.

SOME strange burglars up in Nevada, a short time since, stole a quartz mill. Kleptomania in their case could be pleaded to eminent advantage. A friend of ours who owns a quartz mill in that section declares that the stolen mill will break the parties who undertake to carry it on within three months, and that they could have had his as it stood, on the ground, without the trouble of carrying it off.

CARDINAL WISEMAN.—Telegraphic advices from Europe of the 5th February, state that the learned and eloquent Cardinal of Westminster was in a dying condition. His health had been failing for some time.

THE late "Col. Ferguson of California," (says the Boston Gazette of Jan. 21st,) was convicted of larceny in the Superior Court yesterday, and sentenced to one year's hard labor in the House of Correction. His name, also, was stricken from the rolls.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CALIFORNIAN.]

NEW YORK, January 18th, 1865.

THE talk of the week, in literary circles, after the death of Edward Everett, is the coming of Dumas, who is by this time fairly en route, accompanied by a secretary and a cargo of cap-paper. He means to convert the republic into ink and carry it away with him. He writes to a Mr. Van Norhausen here that his expenses will be tremendous and that he must have half pay for his literary enterprises in advance. The Harpers, it is intimated, have sent him a handsome remittance in part pay for a book of "eight hundred thousand letters" upon American nature, society and history, which is to be published here at twenty francs in gold, Dumas getting a quarter and the Sanitary Commission a quarter. He also proposes to write the history of Lincoln's Administration, to lecture, and to sell a rejected novel which Bentley, of London, refused. Indeed, Dumas seems to be walking toward us like the Colossus of Rhodes, to slice us with a pair of shears, spit us upon his lusty pen, and drown us in his inexhaustible ink. He is truly a genius, and greater than we on this side imagine, because we associate him with certain feverish stories merely, but the man has embellished with his grand and rapid fancy every capital and province in Europe, illustrated all phases of politics and society, and made his paltriest novels brilliant with the ease of comedy and the power of tragedy. Next to the visit Dickens made us many years ago, this of Dumas will be the most significant personal item in our international literature. It is to be hoped that, in his splendid presence, none of the mean prejudice which the more vulgar among us entertain against color will be manifested. I think it a memorable instance of the growing tolerance and equalization of our Western society that a mulatto of fame can come among us amid general plaudits and throw his genius as he has given his sympathy into the hard cause which we uphold.

NOTABLE DEATHS.

Fry, the Tribune's musical critic, is dead. Having the consumption, he went off to the West Indies, but arrived there just in time to breathe his last. His opera of Leonore will preserve his memory very long; but he shared the "craukiness" of all Tribune people, and worked like a pin-wheel in twenty directions, so that he always kept in pretty much the same place. He was an owner of the Tribune in small part.

Everett, to whom I have referred above, has left an honored name, but not a reputation built upon any grand or original conception. He belonged to the eloquent, excellent and "figure-head" school of statesmen. His oration on Washington must have been the best thing of his life, as it brought the most money. His papers for Bonner's Ledger were also very clever.

Since I last wrote to you, Schoolcraft, the prolific searcher out of themes for poetic and romantic illustration, has gone to join the Great Spirit. His was a strange and mystic life, spent upon the far hunting grounds, smoking the calumet in savage wigwags, and blending his pale, thin blood with the stronger current of those whose fading glory he loved so well to recount. The Indian people may never pass away unnoticed while Schoolcraft's mighty tomes stand hewn for their monument.

SCAN. MAO. AND A MAGAZINIST.

When I say that the "Hasheesh Eater" has reached the crisis of his mutations, you will spare me the pain of mentioning him by name. Clever but inordinately conceited, industrious but irregular, and, with all his ideality, possessing a wide streak of sensuality and a most unravellable capriciousness, the last of the younger literati has broken up his domestic arrangements, and made, through his marital infidelity, a greater sensation than by his entire intellectual career. His devotion to literature, as you know, commenced sensationally. He burned his ships behind him, like Cortes, and often walked Broadway of nights houseless but implacable. Then came his book, De Quinceyish enough, but still tolerably original, which put him far in the front, where he deserved to be. After fluctuating between daily papers, magazines, and publishers' houses, he quietly won patronage and reached a better social status than usually falls to the lot of "fugitiveists." At the same time he was eccentric and unmanageable, unable to confine his printed expression to definite space, and running wild with vagaries and errotchets. His wife was the envy of cotemporary writers—a miniature being, beautiful in the poetic standard, always girlish in face and motion, but, for the crises of his nomadic life, a true counsellor, and ever patient, charitable and loving. There may have been, behind the screen, incidents of which the reading world did not know. We only hear the sudden and sad announcement that the Hasheesh Eater—in the height of his living fame—has separated from his wife, under staggering circumstances, grieved his friends, and contemplates marriage with a woman who can afford to spare him the expense of a certificate—a half poetess, of whom the elect only have heard. With this lady the Hasheesh Eater went meandering, and it is even said that he requested his wife to visit the person who had usurped her lawful place. Having borne beyond the limit of woman's sufferance, the Hasheesh Eater's wife departed to her father's house, whither she was soon followed by the Hasheesh Eater himself. The father-in-law forbade an interview, though a ridiculously informal one took place through a key-hole, and as the matter stands H. E. is to permit his wife to sue out a separation; then he is to wed his new flame, who, meantime, and probably with an eye to the present exigency, had obtained a divorce from her own husband. Is this not odd?

On the other side of the water, Miss Evans, the novelist, has been equally derelict, residing "under the protection" at present of Mr. Lewes, author of the Life of Goethe. Must folks who think and print be only a remove from the easy disciples of Theophrastus? Verily, in these our days of cacoethes scribendi, it is the rule to err and the exception to stand fast. I fear that the Hasheesh Eater will suffer as much, professionally, from this incident as socially. He is the pleasantest magazine writer we have, but as the Atlantic has admitted Sala into its pages, it ought not to take umbrage at the actor in one scandal nearer home.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

Sala, I may say, despite the fact that he is a vagabond and mercenary fellow, who has abused our country in its calamity and written some of the foulest things of the century, found lots of work to do in New York. The Harpers gave him sundry jobs; Ticknor & Fields made an engagement with him, and his book will, I believe, be issued here simultaneously with its appearance in London. I saw Sala abroad in 1862—a dissipated fellow with a cast in his eye, an incandescent nose, and an entirely coarse, sensual and brutal expression. His life has been worse than represented in the many hard notices made of him. His extraction is one-half Italian, though in address he is a cockney of the extremest aspiration. In New York, while he was writing baseless libels against us, he was taking the turn of the town, after going home to the Brevoort House of nights, drunken to blindness, and rattling off fifty dollars worth of matter before going to sleep. In the morning he would arise, drink till the mercury went up to a certain height, and proceed to scribble again. He is an indefatigable fellow, but always poor and needy, spending an income of twelve or twenty thousand dollars a year in every possible excess. His handwriting is like copper-plate engraving in its unpremeditated finish and intelligibility. He is having sent to him all the "steep" notices made of him subsequent to his return to Europe—his agent in New York being one Hingston, a shrewd theatrical agent, who at one time wrote stories to Sala's illustrations. Sala, besides being a draughtsman and a writer, was once in commerce, and spent some years with a Greek merchant at Athens. He speaks many languages, even some of the Slave dialects, and was the first Englishman to give us a familiar account of Russia. While here he was the guest of many of the best literary people, who may yet have occasion to be ashamed of themselves for their indiscreetness.

A HIGH PRIVATE.

In a former letter I gave you some little sketches of Charles G. Halpin, or "Miles O'Reilly." I see that he has been figuring in a new or rather a public role of late, if we are to believe the Herald, which publishes for him one day and abuses the next. The Herald's story, of January 18th, is this: that Halpin, intoxicated over Terry and Porter's victory at Fort Fisher, went to a certain club-house bar, sang an improvised song, and the crowd which followed him in broke the mirrors, etc., etc., until a squad of police marched Halpin, his brother, and a confrere to the station house. The Herald states that they are to have a hearing at the "Tomb" and that the publican's loss "the county will in all probability be taxed to pay." I have not yet had time to inquire into the truth of this affair. However apt Halpin is to get up canards, he would scarcely have the impudence to print before a half-million people the fact of his arrest and incarceration. Just as I write, a friend informs me, as an on dit, that Halpin has brought suit against the Herald for $50,000. At any rate, he is a queer bird, always in for a battle, like FitzJames O'Brien, who in some respects he resembles. I quote three of his stanzas, sung on the occasion of his arrest, and may say in explanation of them that Halpin formerly fought with honor under Terry, whom he eulogizes:

Fill to Porter and to Terry,
They are names that we adore;
From Connecticut to Kerry,
Some in grog and some in sherry,
To the Admiral and to Terry,
Deep libations let us pour.

Bring the picks, and let us bury
On New England's rugged shore,
General Butler, who is very Far from feeling extra merry,
As he reads about Alf Terry
Of the old Tenth Army corps!

Mr. Lincoln, who is very Deeply skilled in classic lore,
Is devoted to his "Terry"—
His "Terentius Afer," very,
But we better like Alf Terry,
Of the old Tenth Army Corps!

BAYARD TAYLOR—DARLEY.

Bayard Taylor was forty years old a week ago, and gave a small professional party in honor of the event. He resides on Eighth street, in the rear of the Mercantile Library, in the European style, having a suite of rooms. His wife is acquiring the English language somewhat now. She is a German lady, who did not know an English word when she came here. Taylor made fifteen thousand dollars last year, two-thirds of which came from lecturing. His late indifferent novel of John Godfrey has already paid him nine thousand dollars, although it is a little below mediocrity. He publishes for himself, through George Putnam, who is bankrupt and dare not own any copyrights. Taylor has lately taken to drawing and painting. He is a hard worker and has the strength of Titian, who lived ninety-nine years and had to be taken off by a special plague at last. Taylor's taste I think to be inferior to his talent and his talent inferior to his own appreciation of it. He has written some capital ballads and some glittering pieces of superficial prose description, but we miss in all his effusions that keen and profound introspection of character and nature which is essential even to talent. Of genius he has none, I think. His mansion of Cedar Croft, in Chester county, Pennsylvania, is a strange edifice, planned by himself. It stands in an old deserted, unfruitful field, hedged round with scrub firs, but commanding a fine prospect from its brick tower; in the front thereof is set a marble slab, containing this flunkeyish inscription: "Bayard and Marie Taylor, 18—." Taylor is the "great gun" of the Quaker district, and is really a clever man, whose life has been almost cloudless. It resembles in some respects that of Darley, the designer, who stands at the head of his art here, though far inferior to the great designers across the water—Gilbert, Millais, and the like. He is, if I mistake not, a native of the same or the adjoining county with Taylor, and now lives in fine style at Claymont, Delaware. His income is about that of Taylor's also, and a large part of the year he goes off hunting and fishing. Darley has received as much as a thousand dollars for his larger designs. He has no rival on this continent, though we should hope that he will not be a quoted man in subsequent years, when art shall become too well patronized here to leave no appeal beyond one man's excellence.

ABOUT ART—ART WRITERS, AND ARTISTS.

Apropos of art, have you ever read Jarves' (James Jackson) books upon American art? They are recent publications and I am quite in love with them. Who Jarves is I do not know, beyond some idea that he is a travelled critic, aspiring to be the Ruskin of this continent. He is, at any rate, a bold, original writer, a little too rhapsodic at times, but often keen as a Jerusalem blade, and when he pins anything, scalps it immediately. He has done something to classify and explain trans-Atlantic art; but his little book, the Art Idea, is the only attempt we have ever had to give the rationale and history of American architecture, painting and sculpture. The mere fact of the appearance of this book and its profitable sale, shows me that the art-taste is expanding here. It is to be lamented that such indications are marred by the erection of such an art-temple as the New York Academy of Design—an expensive building, almost completed, in execrable taste, like the British National Gallery, and fruitful of sneers to every stranger who visits us. The Academy Committee ought to be put in it, bolted up and burnt with their structure!

I have mentioned Millais above, and am told that his sister is the wife of Lester Wallack, actor, of the theatre of the same name. "Old" Wallack is dead, you know—that associate of Sheridan, Byron and Moore. His latter days were apoplectic and waste. Millais, his half son-in-law, if you remember, married the divorced wife of Ruskin, the critic par excellence. Old Ruskin, as he grew old, was in better trim to praise Turner than to please his clever wife, so she brought suit for separation, and, as he made no objection, got it. Then she married Millais, an insular Adonis, and the two gifted people live together like a picture. Millais made his wife the model for a picture called "The Eve of St. Agnes," in a late Royal Academy Exhibition. Being a strict pre-Raphaelite, he photographed her almost literally, and so Keats' charming heroine was made to look like a skinny and bony hag whom Careveggio in his bacchanal hours would not have kissed. Millais made a thousand pounds in 1861 for twelve illustrations of the Parables, which looked to me like mummies of Giotto. This was the largest sum ever received by any designer for magazine drawings.

Among the sculptors in town is C. B. Ives of Connecticut, a resident of Rome for twenty years and held in high esteem for his figures of "Pandora," "Rebecca," "Sans Souci," etc. He is a rough, good-natured fellow, and his studio on the Via Margutta is one of the pleasantest places in the Imperial City to pass an hour. I called upon the grisly old fellow last year and had the pleasure, so far from home, of tapping a bottle of Bourbon with him. Miss Hosmer's "Zenobia" is going round the country, under contract between a Boston speculator and the sculptress. It is a very creditable figure, but laden with drapery. When the artiste executes a nude figure we may the better judge of her.

ARTEMUS WARD—FREE LOVERS.

Speaking of contracts recalls the fact that a speculator named Wilder has engaged Artemus Ward for ten months at fifteen thousand dollars, and is leading him here and there like any other gorilla, to go over and over his picture-book lecture. Society owes to "Ward," or Browne, in a small way, thanks for having so effectively burlesqued the free-lovers and socialists. These strangely defiant and brave folks are not dead yet. They have regular colonies at Oneida, N. Y., and Wallingford, Conn., and an institution in this city known as the Pantarchy (or Earth-Government) which is earthy to the last degree. The two "communities" are worth respectively $250,000 and $40,000, and seem to grow richer and better established yearly. They have about an equal number of males and females, who get along together without marriage certificates and embrace all the new dogmas, but individually are ignorant and bigoted as the citizens of Salt Lake.

A PECULIAR INSTITUTION.

The New York "Pantarchy," in Charles street, is a hotbed of theoretical vice, with a fair leaven of practical wickedness. It has been going on about three years under the conduct of Stephen Paul Andrews, a learned and sensual old man, now upwards of fifty years of age, who realizes in appearance and history the ancient ideal of Anti-Christ. He lives in the Pantarchy with a cluster of men and women, most of the latter being mediums, and one of them is his wife. Polygamy without law is the condition of things there. Old Andrews has been working thirty years upon a system of "Universology"—an exhaustive science, one of the objects of which is to form a new language for the use of all mankind, and another the emancipation of wives, daughters and sisters from all moral restraint. Andrews, Henry Clapp, Jr., and Albert Brisbane translated and introduced the writings of Fourier into this market. They were brought to this side of the water by Brisbane, a man of some wealth, who met old Fourier in Paris, where he was living upon a diluted glass of wine and a dead man's portion of brown bread. Returning, he got Horace Greeley to urge the claims of communism, which led to the celebrated discussion in the Courier and Enquirer between Greeley and H. J. Raymond. Brisbane does not live with Andrews at present, being probably disgusted with the old sinner's beastly regimen; but he has for an apostle Edward B. Freeland, an erratic being who once organized a sort of wilderness "Brook Farm"—hewing logs with his own hands and building a cabin in the vicinity of the Chipmunks. The real truth about the Pantarchy and all such places seems to be that they begin in incontinence and evil desires, and make the good of mankind their excuse for ruining it. If such reformers as Andrews had the world in their hands six hours, we should see the fable of Sodom realized and a new deluge necessary. John H. Noyes is the Oneida apostle, and he publishes a paper to vindicate it; I suggest to him to print his leaders upon sheet sulphur. The "Reformers," so called, of the Health school, meet at Dr. Trall's water-cure establishment in Eighth street. Most of Fourier's settlements in America, as everywhere, have died out. I see among the health apostles that model of manly strength and lustiness, and anything but model in other respects, Walt. Whitman, author of the Leaves of Grass. He is about to get out a book upon the phases of death, disease, sentiment, etc., as witnessed in the hospitals of Washington City, where he has been under salary from the Sanitary Commission. Walter is a graphic character, unreliable, like any practical convert to Mohicanism, and lives with his mother, who has some little property in Brooklyn.

GENERAL GOSSIP.

The Leader (weekly newspaper) has lately split in half, and one party, under Henry Clapp, has gone over to the Weekly Review, taking "Figaro" and "McArone" along with them. Literature will be benefitted by this change, as the number of its vehicles will be increased. The Leader was always able after a fashion, and its new manager, Fiske, is shrewd and hardworking. I am anxious to see which concern will drive the best team. McArone, you understand, of course, to be George Arnold, the son of an agricultural reformer, who founded the North American Phalanx—an economical society, which sailed along a little while like a nautilus and sank like a clam. George Arnold is a good writer of rhyme and prose, but fond of his dolce far niente.

The book publishers are pretty active just now, and the serial newspaper business is brightening up. An attempt will be made by Charles Gayler and others, during this session of Congress, to have an international dramatic copyright bill passed. This it is thought the publishers will not care to kill, as they did the general copyright movement some years ago.

DESULTORY.

A VERY POLITE PATIENT.

I AM a consulting-physician, as the popular phrase goes, although it does not very accurately define my employment. The younger members of my profession should rather use the future-passive of the verb, about-to-be, (or ready-to-be-at-the-shortest-possible notice) consulted; while the elder members might, if they are tolerably fortunate, adopt the past participle, and call themselves consulted physicians. The latter is the rank at which I have arrived myself. Immediately after breakfast, I install myself in my sanctum at the back of the house, and am prepared to receive patients. Every ring at the front-door bell between the hours of 10 and 12 A. M. has an auriferous sound, and is worth at least a guinea.

The halt, the lame, and the blind I am always delighted to see in my reception-room, at one pound one a head and upwards. I dare say the robust Irish lady who is so good as to sweep the crossing opposite, envies the rich folks whose carriages throng about my door every morning. But I can assure her that they repay the compliment by envying her. One must not speak evil of the bridge that carries us over the river of life, but I can't say that the majority of my rich patients are amiable people. They do not bear their cross of sickness nearly so well as poorer folks, who have so many other wearisome burdens to carry. The difference between the sick whom I see at my own house, and those, similarly afflicted, whom I visit a few hours afterwards in hospital, is very marked. Of course, they all complain; it is one of the offices—and by no means a useless one—of a consulting physician to hear complaints; it is a relief to the sufferer to pour his woes into the ear of one who will at least understand, even if too cruel to sympathize with them. It is neither kind nor wise to cut a fellow-creature very short while he is enumerating his calamities, although we may be thoroughly aware of what he is going to say. "You feel so and so, and so and so, and so and so, don't you?" say some of my professional brethren, putting question after question so fast, that the answer can be only "Yes" or "No;" whereupon the afflicted creature sighs, like one who has been interrupted in his choicest anecdote by some rude fellow's informing him that his story is as old as the hills.

Now, the poor man, although by nature garrulous, seems to be aware that on that long line of beds in the same ward there are others whose cases are at least as serious as his own, and which require to be stated at some length; and he often makes some attempt to condense what he has to say, although that is a feat by no means easy to him. He is a Patient, too, in the best sense submitting to all that is proposed, because he is convinced that the very best is being done for him, to the extent of our ability, as God forbid it should not be done. Whereas my rich friends sometimes seem to consider, conscious of having paid their guinea, and that Time is money, that a shilling a minute is a good deal to pay for enlarging not only upon their particular calamity, but upon various other matters, scarcely within my province. In consequence of which I take care to have a clock on my mantel-piece that strikes not only the hours, but the half-hours and quarters pretty loudly. This gives me the opportunity of referring politely to the flight of Time, and thereby abbreviating the narration of certain unnecessary details which seem to verge upon the confines of Eternity.

The anteroom where my patients assemble is similarly furnished, so that each may know exactly how long he has had to wait before he is admitted—an interval which otherwise is apt to be exaggerated; for not even the most engaging periodicals, or books, or newspapers, can make that period elapse quickly, at the end of which may be delivered a sentence of many years' imprisonment, without hard labor, alas! or anything to do at all—as in some cases of eye-disease; or some fell decree which involves the loss of limb; or even the dread doom of death itself. People who are in such sad straits as these, however, are generally less impatient than those more lightly afflicted; some of whom (as I learn from my servant) do not always behave themselves quite politely, but struggle with one another for precedence of interview with their unconscious humble servant, myself. Suffering gentlemen and afflicted ladies (especially) will even go the length of asserting that they came by special appointment, and upon that false pretext obtain an advantage over the rest of the company; while nothing is more common than for them to be confused as to the exact date of their arrival, and to give themselves the benefit of the doubt, to the detriment of others.

In cases of this kind, the clock is invaluable; my servant sets down to a second the time at which each arrives, and a reference to the calendar thus kept is of course without appeal. Under these circumstances, it is no wonder that he takes some personal interest in my morning visitors, and forms some opinion in his own mind respecting them, even if he is not called upon to express it—like his master. Upon a recent occasion he admitted into this anteroom of mine a very polite patient, indeed, whose behavior was altogether so exceptional, that I think it worthy of record, not so much as an example to others—although he was the very pink and pattern of patients (up to a certain point)—as for the instruction of all consulting physicians. This gentleman had never honored me by seeking my advice before, nor is it probable that the nature of our interview will lead him to resort to me again—although he may perhaps favor other members of the faculty with his society. Yet I shall never forget him while Memory holds her seat at all, and my right hand retains the faculty of recognizing a sovereign and a shilling at first touch through any amount of silver-paper.

The cases brought under my notice had been unusually serious on the morning in question, and about 11:40 I inquired of my servant somewhat anxiously how many patients remained still to be seen, as I had to be at a consultation in the neighborhood precisely at noon.

"There's only one gentleman left," said he; "he arrived an hour ago, but he is so very polite that he has hitherto declined to take his turn."

I was sorry to hear this, for according to my experience such an individual was likely to be in a critical state of health, or perhaps only postponed his interview till last, so that he might prolong it without interruption.

"I hope everybody does come in in proper time, James," said I. "You know what an objection I have to any favoritism."

"O dear, sir, I am sure I never took a shilling from any gentleman or lady in my life, in order that they might be admitted earlier."

"Really, James, I never said you did," replied I severely. "Show the gentleman in."

The patient whose acquaintance I now had the pleasure of making for the first time, had the appearance of a country gentleman; he was well dressed, but there was an absence of that undefinable smartness and completeness in his attire which is only found in town-made garments; moreover, his eye wandered all over the room with an expression very unlike the incurious gaze of a well-bred Londoner. His very politeness had probably arisen from an erroneous idea that it was the fashion in good society to make little self-sacrifices in giving way to other people.

"I am afraid, sir, you have been detained a considerable time," observed I.

"Not at all," returned he, briskly. "I was in no particular hurry. I have plenty of leisure here in London, away from all my usual country avocations, and there were several people in your ante-room who, I am sure, had more urgent need of your advice than I. In fact, I feel that I have scarcely any right to intrude upon your valuable time at all; but I have been a good deal bothered with a cough at night, and I should like to be cured of it."

"Take a seat, sir. Any pain in your chest?"

"I don't think it will be necessary to examine me," observed he nervously; "I can tell you my symptoms, such as they are."

How curious it is that those who are apparently the strongest and most healthy, are often the most morbidly apprehensive. I could not help smiling at seeing this respectable fox-hunter, as he seemed to be, hugging his coat together, as though my stethoscope had been a dagger seeking entrance into his heart.

"My dear sir," said I, "this little instrument will not hurt you."

At this moment, a very singular thing took place: the clock upon my mantel-piece struck the three-quarters past 11, and I seemed to hear the sound repeated from the clock in the next room. It was a muffled sound, but the wonder was how it could have arrived at all through two wooden doors and a baize one. I was so convinced that I did hear it, however, that I immediately strode forward to see for myself whether any of the doors of communication were open. They were all closed. When I returned, my patient had unbuttoned his coat, and assured me that he had no silly objection to being stethoscoped, if I thought it worth while, but that there was nothing the matter with him beyond a troublesome cough, for which he wanted a prescription.

His lungs seemed sound enough, indeed, and I need not have been so long in examining them but for a certain reason. Very different from most hypochondriacal folks, my new friend seemed so very anxious to cut short our interview, that he began to awaken my suspicions as to whether he was a bona fide patient at all. I knew that I should discover this if I could only detain him a quarter of an hour, and therefore I prolonged my stethoscopic investigations. At last he jumped up, and throwing down a sovereign and a shilling, with no little ostentation, upon the table, expressed himself perfectly satisfied.

"But, my dear sir," said I, "you have not got your prescription."

It wanted then one minute to the hour of noon, but I was still writing very slowly, when the clock on the mantel-piece began to strike; I thought it would never have done, so eagerly was I watching for the first of its companion time-piece, which I felt sure by this time was concealed somewhere about my polite patient's person. He had waited until he had been left alone in the ante-room, to make a clean sweep of everything valuable he could lay his hands upon, the clock among the rest. He had stuffed this at first, I fancy, into his breast pocket—whence arose his original objection to the use of the stethoscope—but had transferred it, while I went to look at the doors to some other part of his attire. Sagacious as he had been, however, he had omitted, or had not had the opportunity, to silence the voice of my faithful dial. I heard its whisper—its faint "tick, tick," all the time, and now I was waiting for its full voice in denunciation of the robber. At last it came. One can scarcely imagine a situation more embarrassing than that of my polite patient with his stolen clock striking twelve very distinctly in the pocket of his coat-tail, and in the hearing of its rightful proprietor.

"I have found out what is the matter with you, my friend," said I, pressing a hand-bell, which brought in James upon the instant. "You are troubled with the Tic Douloureux. Your symptoms are exceedingly striking. This prescription must be made up at once, and my servant will run out for it, while you remain here a minute or two."

Never was prescription so short:

"Jam. fet. a. pol. im."

Or, without any abbreviation, as I had written it:

"James, fetch a Policeman immediately."

INGENIOUS WORD CHANGES.

WHAT is called "putting the cart before the horse," in changing the beginning of words, is thus cleverly illustrated:

O H! for some deep, secluded dell,
Where brick and mortar's line may cease;
To sit down in a pot of grease—
No, no—I mean of grot of peace!

I'd choose a home by Erin's wave,
With not a sound to mar life's lot;
I'd by the cannon have a shot—
No—by the Shannon have a cot.

How fair that rocky isle around,
That wide expanse to scan it o'er;
I love a shiver with a roar!
No—I mean a river with a shore!

Romantic Erin's sea-girl land,
How sweet with one you love the most;
To watch the cocks upon the roost—
No—I mean the rocks upon the coast!

'Twere sweet at moonlight's mystic hour,
To wander forth where few frequent,
And come upon a tipsy gent—
No, no—I mean a gipsy tent.

Or, in your solitude to meet,
Some long lost friend, surprised and pleased,
And find you're by his surer pan greased—
No—I mean his grasped hand seized!

In that retirement lone I would
Pursue some rustic industry,
And make myself a boiling tea—
No, no—I mean a toiling bee!

Beneath a shadowy sycamore,
How sweet to breathe love's vow;
Your dear one bitten by a sow;
No—I mean sitting by a bough!

Or, sweet with your fond wife to sit
Outside your door at daylight's close,
Whilst she's hard hitting at your nose!
No—I mean hard knitting at your hose!

Perhaps on earthly cares you brood,
While sympathy her sweet face shows;
'Tis good to walk upon one's toes—
No—I mean to talk upon one's woes!

She smiles you into jest at last,
And pleased to see the spell is broke,
And draw from you a gentle joke—
No, no—I mean a mental joke!

Ah! how you watch that fairy shape,
A summer dress which does adorn,
Admiring much her laugh of scorn—
No, no—I mean her scarf of lawn!

AUBREY, in his manuscript collections, relates that in several parts of England, when two persons are driving a bargain, one holds out his right hand, and says, "Strike me?" and if the other strikes, the bargain holds; whence the phrase, "striking a bargain."

SOME one was praising public schools, to Charles Landseer, and said: "All our best men were public school men. Look at our poets. There's Byron; he was a Harrow boy." "Yes," interrupted Charles, "there's Burns; he was a plough boy."

"PUNCH" advises makers to be more careful. He records the case of a lady being startled and shocked, the other day, by being told that some one was waiting below for her "body."

MORE ABOUT

SEWING MACHINES!

POSITIVE PROOF

THAT THE

"FLORENCE"

TOOK

The Premium

AT THE

Oregon State Fair,

AS IT DID AT EVERY FAIR

Held on this Coast in 1864!

A NEW COMMITTEE APPOINTED

—BY—

THE CONSPIRATORS!

WHEN THE

Regular Committee Fail to

ANSWER THEIR PURPOSE,

BUT WITH NO BETTER SUCCESS!

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.

Marion County,

The undersigned, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Church, of Salem, Oregon, states as follows: On the second day of the late State Fair held at this place, I, together with Mrs. Cocran and Mrs. Gray, were appointed by the Managers of the Fair the regular Committee to examine and award premiums on the articles on exhibition in Class 9 of the Fair, in which class the Sewing Machines were entered, and we entered upon our duties as such Committee.

Among other things in this class we examined the Grover & Baker and the Florence Sewing Machines, then on exhibition, and we unanimously awarded the First Premium to the Florence Machine.

After our Award on the Sewing Machines became known on the third day of the Fair, another—a Special Committee of Five—was appointed by somebody to examine the Sewing Machines, of which appointment we were not informed until we made ready to submit our awards in writing, and then we declined to have anything more to do with the matter.

ELIZABETH C. CHURCH.

The above named Elizabeth C. Church personally appeared before me, and being duly sworn to tell the truth, says the statements which she has subscribed above are true.

J. GASTON, Notary Public.

Salem, Oregon, January 6, 1865.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.

Marion County,

The undersigned, N. O. Parrish, makes the following statement: I am the agent of the Florence Sewing Machine at Salem, Oregon. I was aware of the appointment of Mrs. Church, Mrs. Cochran and Mrs. Gray, by the Managers of the late State Fair at Salem, as the regular Committee on Sewing Machines, but never knew the award of said Committee on Sewing Machines.

I then objected and protested against the appointment of any new committee as being discourteous to the regular Committee, and that it was irregular and improper to do so, and informing him that two of the members of the new Committee were owners of the Grover & Baker Machine. I protested that it was unjust to the Florence to appoint persons known to be prejudiced in favor of the Grover & Baker. He (Thornton) curtly cut short our conversation by telling me that "he would do as he pleased in the matter." It was long after the close of the Fair before I could learn with certainty whether the latter Committee really decided in favor of the Florence or not, the records of the Fair being in confusion. I have used the utmost diligence to publish the facts at the earliest possible period after learning them.

N. O. PARRISH.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 14th day of January, 1865. Witness my hand and official seal.

J. GASTON, Notary Public.

We republish the affidavits of the three Ladies who are a majority on the last Committee of Five. They are the only ones on said Committee who were not owners of and known to be biased in favor of the Grover & Baker Machine before their appointment. At the time we published them they were not all sworn to, which is now the case, and the oath was taken at a later date than the contradictory statements published by the Agent of the Grover & Baker Machine purporting to have been made by them, proving one at least, of those presented by him, to be a base fabrication.

" * * * After a careful examination of the Sewing Machines and Machine Work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was decided and agreed by the Committee, to award the first Premium to the Florence Machine as the best Machine for doing all grades of work, and a premium to the Grover & Baker Machine for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the Committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the Committee and their final decision.

MARY A. HOWE.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.

County of Multnomah,

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, Mary A. Howe, who, being first duly sworn, says the above statement is true, as she verily believes.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, this 4th day of November, 1864.

(Notarial Seal.)

J. N. DOLPH,

Notary Public, Multnomah County, Oregon.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.

County of Linn.

I have read the above statement, (I being one of the Committee mentioned,) and the same is true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

EMILY C. GRIFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of December, 1864.

JAMES ELKINS,

County Clerk, Linn County, Oregon.

I was one of the five ladies comprising the Committee for the examination of Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and am the party referred to above as having been called away before signing our Report. I hereby say that the above statements are true as to the decision of the Committee.

MARY MILLER.

Albany, Oregon, December 13th, 1864.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.

County of Linn.

Mary Miller, the person making the above statement, being duly sworn, says said statement is true to the best of her knowledge and belief.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 6th day of January, 1865.

JAMES ELKINT, County Clerk.

By A. F. WHEELER, Deputy Clerk.

That there can be no mistake in the above statements, or that any misrepresentation was made to obtain them, the name of the respected gentleman, Rev. J. L. Parrish, of Portland, (regretting that it is necessary to use his name in this unpleasant controversy,) who took the depositions, is a more than sufficient guarantee, he being one of the oldest residents of the State of Oregon, widely and favorably known both there and in California. The documents are plainly written, signed, and sworn to, open to the inspection of any one. The idea that these statements were not given and taken understandingly and in good faith is simply ridiculous.

PORTLAND, January 26, 1865.

I certify that I am Corresponding Secretary of the Oregon State Agricultural Society; that the original copy of the Report of Committee on Sewing Machines at the Fair of 1864, has never been out of my possession more than 30 minutes since I received it from the Board of Managers, and that J. W. J. Pearson (Oregon Agent G. & B. Machines,) told me in Portland he had written to S. E. May, of Salem, for a copy of it, and that, too, nearly three weeks after the publication by the Agent in San Francisco that he had it in his possession; further that I am in no way interested in the result of the decision of the Committee, or in the final result of the investigation, except as an officer of the Society.

E. M. WAITE,

Corresponding Sec'y O. S. A. Society.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 26th of January, 1865.

LEVI ANDERSON, J. P.,

Multnomah county, Oregon.

We trust it will not be supposed, from our efforts to prove the justice of our claim to the Oregon premium, that we esteem the premium there or elsewhere, over such a competitor, of any value; to be benten, however, by a chain stitch machine, which, when exhibited in honorable competition with any lock-stitch machine, as shown by the records of previous Fairs, has been more frequently classed as second or third rate than otherwise, would be a disgrace indeed.

The instances are numerous where the Agent of that machine has attempted unfair advantages to obtain premiums which he knew could be taken in no other manner—for proof, refer to any one of the San Francisco Sewing Machine Agents.

The developments in the Salem matter show to what perfection long practice and experience in such transactions have brought him. It is certainly amusing to follow the details in this deep-laid, premeditated and wicked plan.

The Agent of the Grover & Baker machine selects a distant point for the field of his operations, hoping by distance to cover the means used to accomplish the fraudulent end in view; he selects a time also when we were engaged in exhibiting the Florence at two other Fairs, which would prevent our giving it much attention at a third Fair. With the President of the Fair apparently pledged to award him the premium if a committee could not be selected who would do so; in fact, with every arrangement made beforehand that would seem to make a failure impossible, he finally ventured to place his machine in competition with the FLORENCE. The result was such as all who know the two would anticipate: a more than disastrous defeat to the unscrupulous champion of the chain-stitch machine.

The facts in relation to the transaction at Salem, now being exposed, are known to too many for the Agent of the Grover & Baker machine to make a successful denial of them. We have hardly begun to "take testimony" yet. The investigation now commenced will be carried forward until every particular in relation to the fraud is exposed, unless the Agent of the Grover & Baker Machine, by silence or otherwise, acknowledges the truth in the premises.

Duty to the Florence will compel us to do this, and while we invite a full and most thorough investigation, we trust no one will make a statement for or against us that they cannot fully substantiate if called upon to do so. We say this not to intimidate but simply that the plain truth and only that may be given.

We would suggest to the Agent of the G. & B. machine that as we are not skilled, even if we had the inclination, in the bombastic and personally abusive style of writing, apparently so much his forte, that he should refrain from it in future as calculated to cover and obscure the real facts in the case.

That the Florence is a substantial and reliable machine, easily understood and operated, doing the heaviest or lightest work, and requiring scarcely no change to be made for anything, all who have them testify.

More than one thousand have been sold on this coast, and we do not know of one that is not giving perfect and entire satisfaction; if there is one not doing this, no matter how distant it may be, if the owner will inform us, it will be attended to without any expense whatever to the party.

Instruction will be given free to any one who may wish to learn to use the Florence, or who wish to test its merits, whether they intend to purchase or not.

SAMUEL HILL, General Agent,

1818-20 No. 111 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

CREATE A HEALTHY APPETITE!

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure Dyspepsia, Diarrhoea and Constipation.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Invigorate the System and enliven the mind.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Overcome the effects of Drunkenness and Late Hours.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure all Diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Are Palatable to the Taste.

They are the

BEST BITTERS IN THE MARKET,

And when once used will always be called for again.

They are made in the most careful manner

From Pure Old Wheat Whisky, Medicated from Roots and Herbs

Especially adapted for the cure of all Stomachic Diseases and Liver Complaints.

Try Them and You will be Satisfied.

For sale everywhere by Druggists and Liquor Dealers or by

N. B. JACOBS & CO.,

423 Front street, San Francisco.

1811-6m

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S

PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. McInturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Grimes; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Caduc, Esq.

J. E. JORGENSEN,

No. 28 Third street, San Francisco,

Who will give all information about them. 1817-3m

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

401 Battery, cor. Clay, San Francisco.

ja25-1f

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large.

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other mal-practices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

401 Battery, corner Clay, San Francisco.

ja25-1f

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGUARY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents for the Pacific Coast, 401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay, San Francisco

Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-1f

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

GLORIOUS news greets the reader's eye in almost every line of the "record" this week. When the electric bell ceased itsappings, it had only prepared the friends of the Union to receive intelligence gladdening to their hearts. We need not recapitulate the victories. Let the patriot read and rejoice, for if ever Peace and Union were at hand, there is reason to be full of hope now:

February 8.—A severe engagement took place at Hatcher's Run, below Petersburg, resulting in an advance of four miles of our lines. Strong earthworks have been erected. The ground was fought over four times, in consequence of the arrival of reinforcements on either side. In order to prevent raids, Grant has thoroughly fortified the rear, making it nearly as strong in that quarter as in front. Every road is strongly barricaded by a heavy line of works.

February 10.—A Union force, 3,000 strong, landed at Grunballs, on Stone river, two miles southwest of Charleston. Another force advanced on the Charleston road near Blue House, and opened with artillery. Some skirmishing took place but no general engagement. The army crossed the Edisto at Bennaker's Bridge and moved on Edisto.

Henry S. Foote, late rebel Senator, sailed for Europe from New York on the 11th. He represents the Confederacy on the eve of disruption, the struggle on the part of the rebels being nearly over. Foote is prepared to issue an address to the South, and urge them to stop fighting, and give up a contest which is so clearly hopeless, as no term but unconditional surrender can be obtained, and to advise them to promptly accept such terms. He says that the mission of Stephens, Hunter and Campbell was only a ruse on the part of Davis—a forced concession to the peace men of the South.

The Richmond Sentinel of the 10th says that the Union forces are making raids in Florida, and at last accounts were advancing on Ricor's Bluffs in unknown force.

February 12.—On the authority of the Richmond Whig the rebels were falling back before Sherman's advancing column, in the direction of Columbia, S. C., and would probably make a stand at the Santee.

February 13.—Repeated despatches assert that Sherman occupied Branchville and Orangeburg, and was advancing on Columbia, S. C. Portions of his army were destroying all the railroad communications with Charleston, Wilmington and Richmond. Virginia is reported as completely cut off from the South.

Reports from New Orleans state that an order was received from Richmond to evacuate Mobile, and that on the 14th of January Maury commenced at once removing stores, etc., to Selma. There are 15,000 bales of cotton in the city. Maury has ordered them to be destroyed.

February 14.—Admiral Porter, in an official report to the War Department, states that Lieut. Cushing (who blew up the rebel ram Albatross) commanded an expedition up the Little river, South Carolina on the night of the 4th inst., landed in the small town of All Saint's Parish, captured some soldiers and destroyed $100,000 worth of cotton. On the 6th, he surprised and routed a rebel force stationed at Shallotte Inlet to collect stores, and destroyed all the provisions gathered there for the enemy at Fort Anderson. On the 8th, with about fifteen men, he entered Shallotte, destroyed large stores of army supplies and provisions, and about eighty bales of cotton. On the night of the 10th he penetrated Cape Fear River up to the wharves of Wilmington. He discovered the rebel pirate Chickamauga sunk in the channel of the river.

A large Union force landed at Smithville, on the North Carolina coast, and, according to Richmond papers, have brought with them locomotives, evidently intending to use the railroad to facilitate operations after the capture of Wilmington.

From Wilmington, despatches state that the National troops formed in line of battle above Fort Fisher, stretching across the Peninsula from the ocean to Cape Fear river—Gen. Ames's division of white soldiers forming the right, and Gen. Payne's colored division the left. Simultaneously an advance was made on the two wings, and the rebels were driven from their line into their main works, and forced to yield a few miles of ground in the direction of Wilmington, which Terry's men held at night. They also lost 100 prisoners; total Union casualties, 60 or 70. Admiral Porter co-operated, subjecting Fort Anderson to a vigorous shelling, which was very feebly responded to.

Two regiments of Hood's army returned to Corinth with only eighty-four men left out of thirteen hundred.

February 17.—The Fifth Corps before Petersburg hold firmly their advanced line of works, and the railroad is now being trended to their position. Numerous wagon roads are also being constructed.

February 18.—Charleston and all its defences, with two hundred cannon, supplies and ammunition, came into our possession this morning. All the cotton had been destroyed by the rebels.

Reports from the Richmond papers state that Wilmington was being evacuated. Terry is still in the vicinity of Fort Fisher, according to the same authority, waiting for General Hoke.

Gen. Baker was in command of the rebel forces at Goldsborough on the 16th. He reports that the Federals are concentrating at Newbern. Gen. Foster commands at the latter place, and 2,000 of the Eighteenth Army Corps arrived there, making the number of troops at that post about 5,000.

The Richmond papers report that Wheeler attacked and whipped Kilpatrick at Aiken, fifteen miles northeast of Augusta, and drove him back five miles in the direction of Branchville.

The following is taken from the Richmond Dispatch of the 18th and forwarded to Washington by Gen. Grant:

"Sherman took possession of Columbia yesterday. The intelligence was communicated to us, by Beauregard, in an official dispatch. Columbia is situated on the north bank of the Congaree River, below the confluence of the Saluda and Broad rivers. From Beauregard's dispatches it appears that on Thursday evening the enemy approached the south bank of the Congaree and threw a number of shells into the city. During the night they moved up the river. Yesterday morning they forded the Saluda and Broad rivers. Whilst they were crossing the rivers, our troops, under Beauregard, evacuated Columbia. The enemy soon after took full possession. The fall of Columbia necessitates the evacuation of Charleston, which we think likely is already in process of evacuation.

February 19.—A correspondent of the New York Herald says that an expedition, consisting of three hundred picked men from the Michigan cavalry, after a march of forty miles, meeting no opposition, reached Charlotte Iron Furnace, on Water Lick Creek, which the rebels had in full blast, preparing iron for shot and shell. The establishment, with all its machinery and material, was destroyed. The force then returned, meeting with trifling annoyance from guerrillas.

The main part of the rebel army is said to be near Staunton.

February 22.—The Navy Department, to-day received the following despatch from Rear Admiral Porter, detailing a brilliant naval victory and the capture of Fort Anderson, on the Cape Fear river:

U. S. FLAG-SHIP "MALVERN," }
CAPE FEAR RIVER, Feb. 19th. }

I have the honor to report the surrender or evacuation of Fort Anderson. Gen. Schofield advanced from Smithville, with 8,000 men, on the 17th, and at the same time I attacked the works by placing the monitor Montauk close to the works, enfilading with the Pawtucket, Senator, Armado and Piquet, the wind not allowing more vessels to get under fire. The fort answered pretty briskly but quieted down by sunset. On the 18th, at 8 o'clock, I moved up closer, the Montauk leading, followed by the Huron, McKean, Sassacus, Pontatone, Norotingo, Manila, Pawtucket, Osceola, Shamout, Seneca, Calypto, and Little Ada, and kept up a heavy fire through the day till late in the afternoon. The enemy's batteries were silenced by three o'clock, though we kept up a fire until dark. We also fired through the night. In the meantime, Gen. Schofield was working in the rear of the rebels to cut them off. The latter did not wait for our army to surround them, but left in the night, taking five or six pieces of light artillery with them, and everything else of value. This morning, some of our troops, who were near by, went in and hoisted the flag on the ramparts, when the firing ceased from the mortar boats. There were ten heavy guns in Fort Anderson, and a quantity of ammunition. We lost but three killed, and five wounded.

The public buildings and many private houses around Washington were illuminated on the evening the news reached there. Every main entrance to the State Department had the following: "Peace and good-will to all nations, but no entangling alliances and no foreign intervention."

It is reported that in the occupation of Columbia by our forces, a large quantity of engraved Treasury note paper fell into our hands, also a considerable quantity of medical stores.

The condition of the roads in front of Petersburg in consequence of the recent thaw, rendering it exceedingly difficult for the movement of infantry and impassable for cavalry and artillery, it is believed that no immediate offensive operations will be assumed by Grant.

Lieut.-Col. John E. Milford, A. G. of Exchange, publishes an order that in consideration of an early exchange and the speedy delivery of all prisoners held in South Carolina, it is deemed inexpedient to forward either funds or supplies after the date of his order (22d February.) Such articles or remittances as may have accumulated or may arrive at his quarters are to be returned to the shippers.

The rebel Peace Commissioners (Alex. H. Stephens and R. M. T. Hunter) had an interview with the President and Secretary Seward at Fortress Monroe on February 3d. Nothing transpired as to the result of the mission. It is said, however, that a general exchange of prisoners had been agreed upon.

The bill giving the Postmaster General power to contract for mail service by steamships from San Francisco to China, twelve round trips per year, (the contract to go into effect January 1st, 1867,) passed the Senate, February 13th—ayes 25, noes 11.

LOCAL ITEMS.

Simon Kennedy, the soldier who some time ago murdered a fellow-soldier, at Black Point, near this city, has been sent to the Insane Asylum.

Ira P. Rankin and partners (of the late firm of Hubbard & Co.) have been sued by J. A. Fletcher for non-fulfilment of contract for the construction of mining machinery; damages are laid at $150,000.

Property on Kearny street is advancing in value in consequence of the proposed widening of that thoroughfare. W. W. White sold S. Adams a lot on the west side, south of California street, 20 feet 3 inches by 68 feet 9 inches, for $10,000.

A little son of John R. Miller, in attempting to get on one of the Central railroad cars, near Laguna street, Wednesday, fell and was caught by the axle-box, dragged some distance and so badly injured that he died next day.

M. O'Brien, a popular citizen, died on Sunday last, and was buried Monday. Broderick Engine Company, No. 1, of which deceased was an active member, draped its house in mourning, and, with delegations from all the other companies as well as citizens generally, in carriages, (comprising one of the largest funeral processions ever witnessed in San Francisco,) followed the remains to the grave. Washington Market, where Mr. O'Brien had for many years been engaged in business, was closed at 11 A. M. The funeral took place at St. Mary's Cathedral, the Very Rev. James Croke officiating.

Nine boarding-house "solicitors" attempted to board the Great Republic—or perhaps merely contemplated boarding her crew—before she had fairly made fast to the wharf. They were arrested on charges of misdemeanor. Boatswain Howard and Assistant Boatswain Ross, of the same vessel, have been arrested, charged with brutal treatment of the crew on the recent trip from New York to this port. Warrants were also issued for the first and second mates. Take it altogether, the Great Republic is likely to yield lawyers' fees and items in proportion to her size, and will prove a "big thing" in all respects.

San Francisco put on holiday attire, Wednesday, and commemorated the birth of Washington in a joyfully becoming manner. The entire Second Brigade of State Militia marched through the city "with glad and gallant tread," and were reviewed by the Governor on Harrison street, near Third; flags were displayed on all the public buildings; the news of Union successes animated every true American countenance and added patriotic enthusiasm to the pleasure of the occasion, blending a hope of swift-coming peace in our country with grateful memories of the hero and statesman to whom our Republic is indebted (more than to any one else) for its existence.

J. N. Goodwin, Governor, and R. C. McCormick, Secretary of Arizona Territory, are in this city. S. J. Poston, the contractor for carrying the mails from San Bernardino, Cal., to Albuquerque, New Mexico, left with the first through mail yesterday. An arrangement has been effected with General McDowell by which it is hoped the Indians of Arizona may be subdued and the neighboring "dukedom" prevented from putting on too many French airs. Arizona is to be a sub-Department under command of Gen. Mason.

John Jackson, an old soldier, was picked up by the schooner Shooting Star, Tuesday, between Angel Island and this city. He was a noted swimmer, and it is possible had been bathing, and becoming so benumbed as to be barely able to float, had drifted about awaiting rescue; assistance came too late, as he expired a few minutes after being taken from the water.

A telegraphic cable, crossing the Bay at the Heads, was laid Tuesday, from the Government wharf, near Fort Point, to Horse shoe Bend, near Lime Point. The frigate Niagara wasn't there, but the steam-tug Merrimac took a scow with the cable on board, at 2 P. M., and in less than fifty minutes placed the wire in position to connect with the Sacramento line. The cable weighs about eight tons, is one and a half inches in diameter, and a mile and a half long.

We see it announced that the State Guard will have a benefit at Maguire's Opera House, Tuesday evening, Feb. 28th, on which occasion Miss Heron will appear in Gamea and The Honeymoon. The company have never before been the recipients of a favor of this kind, and now that their friends have an opportunity of testifying their regard, we feel assured a crowded house will gladden their hearts and replenish their treasury. Our citizen-soldiers devote a great deal of time and are at no little expense in maintaining organizations which are a source of public pride and pleasure as well as a guarantee of safety, and a due appreciation of their merit should be cheerfully manifested.

The advertisement of Brewster & Co., carriage manufacturers, 372 Broome street, New York, is worthy the attention of all who intend to import carriages of any description. Knowing the peculiar wants of California in their line, the firm never fail to give perfect satisfaction when orders are sent from this coast. Their liberality and enterprise, it is gratifying to observe, are meeting a due reward.

USEFUL INFORMATION.

DISTANCES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

To various points:

To Fort Point, 4 miles, by omnibus, four trips a day.
 Lone Mountain, 3, street railway.
 Seal Rock, 6, cars and omnibus, two trips a day.
 Mission Dolores, street railways; Ocean House, 8.
 San Mateo, 20, railroad.
 Crystal Springs, 23, railroad and stage.
 Half-Moon Bay, 29, do. do.
 Redwood city, 30, do. do.
 Mountain View, 38, do. do.
 Santa Clara, 47, do. do.
 San Jose, 50, do., or steamer and stage, 51.
 Alviso, 46, steamer, daily.
 Almaden mines, 67, steamer and stage; or by railroad and stage, 64.
 Santa Cruz, 78, railroad and stage.
 Oakland, 8, steamer and railroad, six trips a day.
 Alameda, 11, steamer, three trips a day.
 San Leandro, 15, steamer and railroad.
 Mission San Jose, 34, steamer, railroad and stage.
 Warm Springs, 37, do. do.
 Benicia, 30, steamer leaves at 4 P. M. daily.
 Sacramento, 117, do. do.
 Stockton, 117, do. do.
 Martinez, 33, do. do.
 Pacheco, 33, steamer and stage.
 Diablo Coal Mines, 44, steamer and stage.
 Suisun, 50, steamer, or 54 by steamer and stage.
 Vallejo, 28; Maro Island, 37; Napa city, 50.
 White Sulphur Springs, 67, stage from Napa.
 Geyser Springs, 118, do. do.
 Sonoma, 52, steamer, tri-weekly.
 Petaluma, 48, steamer, daily.
 Healdsburg, 80, stage daily from Petaluma.
 San Quentin, 12, steamer; Farallone Islands, 21.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Letters to any part of the United States, 3 cents for each 1/2 ounce or part thereof.
 Drop Letters, 2 cents.
 Advertised letters, 1 cent in addition to the regular rates.

Valuable letters may be registered on application at the office of mailing, and the payment of 20 cents registration fee.

Transient newspapers, periodicals, blanks, proof-sheets, book manuscripts, pamphlets, and all mailable printed matter, except circulars and books, 2 cents for each and every 4 ounces. Double these rates are charged for books.

Unsealed circulars, to one address, not exceeding three in number, 2 cents, and in the same proportion for a greater number.

Seeds, cuttings, roots, etc., 2 cents for each 4 ounces or less quantity.

All packages of mail matter not charged with letter postage must be so arranged that the same can be conveniently examined by Postmasters; if not, letter postage will be charged.

No package will be forwarded by mail which weighs over 4 pounds.

All postage matter, for delivery within the United States, must be prepaid by stamps (except duly certified letters of soldiers and sailors); otherwise, double the above rates will be charged on delivery.

Weekly newspapers (one copy only) sent to actual subscribers within the country where printed and published, free.

Letters to Canada and other British North American Provinces, when not over 3,000 miles, 10 cents for each 1/2 ounce. When over 3,000 miles, 15 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to Great Britain or Ireland, 24 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to France, 15 cents for each 1/2 ounce. Prepayment optional.

Letters to other foreign countries vary in rate according to the route by which they are sent.

BOOK-KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete BUSINESS EDUCATION, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4 3m

BOOTS AND SHOES.—We could scarcely do a greater favor to a friend than to inform him where a boot or shoe can be obtained which will be a source of comfort, pride and pleasure, as he mingles with the passing throng on life's journey. Mr. Harkins, 151 Fourth street, achieves the highest excellence in his art, and gives perfect satisfaction to those who call on him. Ladies are always pleased with his work, and as they speak well of him nothing further is necessary.

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-plugs, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupees, Corns of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jovian's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses; and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
 'y30 1m Over Parrott's Bank.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645

Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
 Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
 645 Washington st., San Francisco.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charriere of Paris, Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
 NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
 387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
 de31 3m

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,
ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,
 No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKY.

Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge.
 fe4 3m I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,
 SAN FRANCISCO,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
GROCERIES AND PROVISIONS,

WINES AND LIQUORS,

Are prepared to offer great inducements to friends and patrons desiring goods in our line. Our stock consists in part as follows:

Old Government Java, Costa Rica and Rio Coffee.
 Powdered, Crushed, Granulated, New Orleans and Coffee Sugars.
 Imperial, Young Hyson,
 English Breakfast
 And Comet Oolong Tea. Japan
 Tea, the BEST ever imported to the State,
 Expressly for our Family Trade. Genuine New Orleans Molasses, Golden Syrup, Corn Oil, Choice Isthmus Butter, Extra Family Flour, Corn Meal, etc., etc., together with a great variety of

FANCY GROCERIES,

Not usually kept by Grocers. Quality always guaranteed as represented. Goods delivered at the Wharves and Railroad Depots Free of Charge. The finest WINES AND LIQUORS DIRECT FROM BOND.

ENGLISH ALE AND PORTER

For Family or Medicinal use.

BOWEN BROTHERS.

oc6 1f

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, AND JOHN COLLNER

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"

Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,

SAN FRANCISCO

M. HARKINS,

MANUFACTURER OF

LADIES', MISSES', AND CHILDRENS'

Boots and Shoes.

Also, GENTLEMEN'S BOOTS, SHOES and SLIPPERS
 MADE TO ORDER.

No. 151 FOURTH STREET,

Second door above Howard, east side,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Repairing of all kinds neatly and promptly done.

GOODWIN & CO.,

HAVING RECEIVED AT THE

LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,

—THE—

First Premium,

—ON—

FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES,

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such

Consisting of

Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,

DINING ROOM AND

OFFICE FURNITURE,

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,

no12

No. 525 Washington street

PRINTING! PRINTING!!

DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Montgomery, - - San Francisco;

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city.
 fe4 1f

ATKINS MASSEY,

UNDERTAKER,

(At the Old Stand.)

No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,

First house below Kearny street.

Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases. Office of the City
 de3 1f and County Coroner.

NATHANIEL GRAY,

UNDERTAKER,

CITY AND COUNTY SEXTON,

641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,

Sole agents for BARTON'S PATENT METALLIC BURIAL CASES and CASKETS.

de17 3m

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:40
FROM THE CITY.
10:00	10:40	11:20
And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before,
 my25 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

VANDALL, CARR & CO.,
BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,
NO. 410 CLAY STREET,
(North side, between Sansome and Battery.)

Particular attention paid to the printing of Briefs and Records. feb11-1f

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING
HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY AND 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

CALIFORNIA
Home Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Doering, A. B. McCreery, C. Dusenbury, C. J. Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heynemann, R. G. Sneath, C. F. MacDermott, J. C. Wilmerding, Levi Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Thibault, S. Henrway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.

B. F. LOWE, President.

JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5-3m

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent. no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE
COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $750,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $600,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Douchoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
206 Front street, corner of California.

THE REASON WHY
EVERYBODY USES
THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED
ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,
OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.
Second—It is more effectual.
Third—It saves labor.
Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally. Manufacturing, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco. ja7-3m

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.
Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. ny25

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Constipation, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S
no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in my style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platinum, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anæsthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. de10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL!

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. de3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. jul8

PHINEAS BANNING,
FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

CARPETS.

We have just received and are now opening
NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF

WILTON

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCADELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!
KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets.
no12

RUPTURE.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington Street,
Between Montgomery and Kearny.
Manufactory, 232 Sulter street. de3

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS offered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salubrious and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRETIEN PFISTER,

no15-1f No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,
SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,

Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,
(Near Post-office.)
SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,
AND
Importers of all Classes
OF
SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz.: Colt's, Sharps', Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharps', Wesson's, Ballard's, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. ja5-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, Etc.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharps' Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco, and 122 J street, Sacramento. de3-3m

ALTA MILLS,

STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large; Hominy, Small; Oatmeal, Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order. de17-3m

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of FEBRUARY, 1865:

FEBRUARY 23d SACRAMENTO
From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,
FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,
ja28 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—
Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO
FOR RED BLUFF,
EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5-1f J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY, Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.
ju25

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every description, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT
Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or

Gentlemen's use or wear, or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-order to a steam engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, FIVE PER CENT.

Address: CARRINGTON & CO.,
no6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant:—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—on judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By G. C. LITTON, Deputy Clerk.
Chas. McC. Delany, Plaintiff's Attorney. de24-3m

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you eaut, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere

ja25-tf

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATEDSalt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers, Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, FIFTY CENTS.
Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by

MRS. A. GRIDLEY,

Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,
AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.
TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,

Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,

SAN FRANCISCO

ja25-tf

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!DE GRATH'S GENUINE
ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES.
Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,

416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

ja25

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin.
CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles.
CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roseate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,

416 418 Front street,

San Francisco.

ja25-tf

ALLEN'SLUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

au27

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

au27

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED PREPARATIONFOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND DRESSINGTHE
Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Fetridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

ja25-tf

Agents, San Francisco.

BREWSTER & CO'SCarriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA,

will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE,
and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES,
and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of Broome street,

The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of No. 372, Broome street,

NEW YORK.

dc17-5m

FARRAND'S OSCILLATINGAmalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,

Southeast corner of Montgomery and California street,
San Francisco.

WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are combined with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Bunnbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "utmost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass. and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY

Is for sale by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,

San Francisco.

And by all Druggists.

ja28-1m

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
Fine Clothing
—AND—
GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 17

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2 & 4, San Francisco.

y2

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

MISS MATILDA HERON,

Supported by

THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

This Saturday Evening, February 25th, 1865.

In the Play of

MATHILDE;

OR, THE LONE CHATEAU.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, February 25th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

BY THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

And a Musical Melange by

The Eureka Minstrel Troupe.

MONDAY EVENING,

THE HUNCHBACK.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

BENEFIT

—OF THE—

State Guard, Company A,

On Tuesday Evening, February 28th, 1865.

Miss Matilda Heron

Will appear in two pieces on the same night, for the first time in San Francisco.

First, in the very interesting play of

GAMEA;

OR, THE JEWISH MOTHER.

Second, in Tobin's capital Comedy of

THE HONEYMOON.

She will be supported throughout by Maguire's talented DRAMATIC COMPANY.

Mr DUBBIN VAN VLECK, (a Member of the State Guard,) will recite, between the plays, Lover's

SHAMUS O'BRIEN,

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, $1; Reserved Seats, 50 cents extra; Parquette, 50 cents; Gallery, 25 cents.

Box Sheet open at nine o'clock on TUESDAY morning.

METALLURGIC INSTITUTE,

FIRST STREET,

McKibbin's Railing Works (up stairs.)

CONDUCTED BY

G. F. DEETKEN,

MINING ENGINEER.

The only Thorough Metallurgic and Engineering School on the Coast.

THEORETIC-PRACTICAL INSTRUCTION in Metallurgic Roasting Operations, Amalgamation, Chlorination and Smelting of Gold and Silver Ores.

Also, on Mechanics, Mine Surveying, Topographic and Mechanical Drawing.

The attention of Superintendents of Mills and Mines is particularly directed to this excellent facility of acquiring a thorough knowledge of Metallurgic operations.

HOMESTEAD FOR SALE!

ANY PERSON DESIROUS OF PURCHASING a valuable HOUSE AND LOT at a bargain, for CASH, can hear of a chance, by applying immediately at the office of THE CALIFORNIAN. The property is within 10 minutes' walk of the corner of Clay and Montgomery streets, is in the southern part of the city, and in a neat private street and pleasant neighborhood. The House contains two Parlors (with sliding-doors, gas chandeliers and marble mantel), a dining-room and kitchen on the first floor, and four bed-rooms on the second. Planked yard, flowering vines, outhouses, etc. Water in three different places on the premises and gas fixtures all through the house. It is built in a thorough and substantial manner, and is now under a monthly rent of $30. Size of Lot, 24 feet, by 80 feet in depth. Title, PERFECT.

Satisfactory reasons for selling will be given to a purchaser by applying as above. fe19-1f

DISSOLUTION OF CO-PARTNERSHIP.—The firm of DALY, GEORGE & CO. is this day dissolved by mutual consent.

San Francisco, Feb. 20, 1865.

PETER DALY,
HENRY GEORGE,
ISAAC TRUMP.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Pine street, below Montgomery.

THOMAS MAGUIRE, Proprietor.
LEW RATTLER Manager
C. F. SHATTUCK Musical Director
J. L. SCHMIDT Leader of Orchestra

GREAT

COMBINATION OF MUSICAL TALENT,

BY THE STAR TROUPE OF

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

D. S. WAMBOLD,

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
P. B. Isaacs, W. Bernard,
Lew Rattler, Mons. Charles,
C. F. Shattuck, M. Lewis,
Sig Piuto, S. Wasburg,
W. Sheppard, Tommy Peel,
Frank Medina, H. Groh,

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL

Sacred Concert!

Every Sunday Evening, by the Troupe,

Messrs W J Hill, John Gregg, J. Schlotte, and

50 INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Dress Circle and Parquet, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra; Private Boxes, $5.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

Saturday afternoon performances by the Minstrels, at the Opera House.

THE CALIFORNIA ART UNION,

OVER THE STORE OF

JONES, WOOL & SUTHERLAND,

No. 312 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Is Now Open,

And will continue to receive Visitors DAILY from 10 A M until 10 P M.

Terms of membership Five Dollars
Single Admission Twenty-five cents

Annual Subscriptions, Five Dollars, which entitles the subscriber to free admission to the Gallery; also, to an Engraving or Photograph of some Picture in the exhibition and a chance in the distribution of the property of the Association at the close of the season, according to the plan of the various Art Unions of Europe and the Atlantic States. ja28-1f

OPPOSITION STEAMER-DAY,

MARCH 13th!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK!

VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE!!!

THROUGH IN 21 DAYS!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

AMERICA,

W. L. MERRY COMMANDER

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON MONDAY, MARCH 13th

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely,

Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 Tons, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit of the Isthmus is a pleasant trip. Meals furnished free by the Company while crossing. A baggage-master will be sent through by each steamer. Insurance on Treasure at the lowest rates.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets.

fe25 Up stairs, San Francisco.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES,

adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of

SUPERIOR CARRIAGES,

ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

ja2 SAN FRANCISCO.

CATHOLIC GIFTS,

IN GREAT VARIETY!

Consisting of—

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,

STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,

MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES!

And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

For sale by

MICHAEL FLOOD,

Catholic Bookseller,

del7-1f

No. 423 Kearny street, San Francisco.

P. J. WHITE & CO.,

SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN.

BUTTER, LARD, HAMS, BACON, PORK,

SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,

And a general assortment of

GROCERIES,

Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Battery, San Francisco.

de10-1f Your trade is respectfully solicited.

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PIC-

TURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, Etc.

Especial attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDS

ENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

ja28-1f

THESE PLASTERS have the compactness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove. They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly hump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms. For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.,

"Brandreth Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

San Francisco.

de17-3m Sold by all Druggists.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late east INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' instrument by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my25

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;

JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;

STEAMBOAT GIN;

OLD TOM GIN;

IRISH WHISKY,

(from Bond direct.

For sale by

V. SQRZA,

ja28-1f 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.

A. Roman & Co.,

TAKE PLEASURE in announcing the following list of NEW BOOKS just received from the East:

Enoch Arden. 1 vol. small quarto, elegantly illustrated. Blue and Gold edition.
Clever Stories of many Lands, by John G. Saxe. 1 vol. 4to, illustrated.

The Queens of Song. Being memoirs of the most celebrated female vocalists. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portraits. All lovers of the Opera will be delighted with this charming volume.

The Poems of Winthrop Blackwelder Praed, with a memoir. 2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, tinted paper.

Doran's Complete Works. 9 vols., cloth and half Turkey, with the "Annals of the Stage."

Arctic Researches and Life Among the Esquimaux, by Charles F. Hall. 1 vol. 8vo, illustrated. Ranks next to that of Dr. Kane.

Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. 1 vol. 12mo. The latest contribution to the great Theological Controversy in England.

John Gifford's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor. 1 vol. 12mo. An absorbing story of American life.

Golden Leaves from the American Poets. 1 vol. 16mo., vellum and morocco. A tasteful selection from our most popular Poets.

The Gentle Life 1 vol. 16mo. An elegant series of Essays on the Formation of Character.

Following the Flag, by "Carleton." A fascinating juvenile.

Eliana, by Charles Lamb. 1 vol. 12mo. Being the heretofore uncollected writings of "Elia."

Autumn Holidays in the Country, by the "Country Farmer." 1 vol. 12mo.

The Queen of the County, by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids. 1 vol. 12mo.

A New Atmosphere, by Gail Haddon. 1 vol. 12mo.

Looking Towards Sunset, by L. M. Child. 1 vol. 4to, Love and Duty. 1 vol. 12mo.

Lost Love. 1 vol. 12mo.

Margaret Denzil's History. 1 vol. paper.

Bohemians of London. 1 vol. 12mo.

Autobiography of Gen. Scott. 2 vols. 12mo.

Woodcliff, by Harriet B. McKever. 1 vol. 12mo.

Hymns of the Ages. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

Old Merchants of New York. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

In addition to the above we have a large list of other NEW BOOKS, together with a complete stock in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

All are cordially invited to call and examine.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

ja28-1m

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of

GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

S. W. H. WARD & SON,

NEW YORK, 323 Montgomery street,

387 Broadway. San Francisco, Cal.

de31-3m

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

Terms easy.

fe18-1f

FRANK JOHNSON.

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!

CANTY & WAGNER,

(SUCCESSORS TO J. REGAN.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS,

113 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Between Bush and Sutter, San Francisco.

N. B.—All CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.

Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to. de3-3m

The Californian

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER
AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II., No. 14.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 4, 1865.

TERMS $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

Things—by "Inigo."
Meg Merrilliana.
The Last Hours of Louis XL.
Odd Names.
Thackeray's School Days.
The Davenport Brothers Exposed.
Perverted Ingenuity.
The Porplexities of a Soinnambulist.
Franklin Preparing for the French Court.

ONLY A CLOD—Miss Braddon's New Novel, Chapter XVII.

EDITORIALS:

Libel Suits.
The Steamship Pioneers.
Paragraphs on Minor Topics.

LOCAL AND INTERIOR ITEMS:

The News at Home and Abroad in Brief.

POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

White Lilies—By C. W. Stoddard.
At the Ball—By C. H. Webb.
Outcasts.
God Save the People.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS:

A Condensation of the Telegraphic War News of the Week.

NEW YORK LETTER:

From our Lady Correspondent.

DRAMATIC MENTION:

The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, March 4th, 1865.

THE date which I have just written reminds me that it is precisely four years ago that the united voice of the nation spoke to the weak-kneed gentleman whose aged limbs quietly reposed in the Presidential chair, telling him the time of day and the day of the month in the two expressive words; March Forth!

If I joined in the celebration to-day I should become festive, not so much over the inauguration of Lincoln as the dismissal of Buchanan from the public service, with a month's wages instead of the customary warning, and without a character to recommend him to another place.

Lincoln is a friend of mine—I might say a long friend—and I am heartily glad he was elected, but San Francisco when it becomes festive is too much for me, and I invariably put out into the country to spend the day. At the present moment I am balancing the respective temptations of the Cliff House and the Bay View Park as quiet places of retirement from the sin, folly and ingratitude, of a world where people are expected to pay what they owe, and no money is loaned over the counter.

My pious friend, the proprietor of the Bay View, who has a mania for disseminating tracks, and is known to be outrageously addicted to prayer, tells me that at last he has got his race-course shelled. Of course it ought to be by this time, for while he has been bothering with that little road of his, Gillmore has shelled every street in Charleston besides husking the city.

I advised Billy, Son of William, to change his course some time since, or there was no telling where his ponies might land him in the gray of some of these fine mornings; and of course he took my advice and laid down a substratum of coarse couchifera for the benefit of coursers. For it must be understood that he never does things by halves, being so particularly opposed to anything on the half shell that in this instance he purchased the finest and most lively oysters and clams the market afforded; and now they have the most exciting races out there in the world. I do not mean that many matches are made between these mollusks, but if any dispute that when in proper condition the shell fish are pretty lively on their feet, let them go out to the Bay View and see them make tracks!

When I was out there last week I saw a brown gelding oyster cavorting around, that I'd back against Ingomar or any other clam any day in the week for any sum that the owner of that rare but not rapid animal is willing to lend me, the terms being play or pay and repeat—emphasis on eat.

The Cliff House is an excellent place to go to, but now-a-days the proprietor suspects every one who comes Cliffward without a certificate of good moral character of an intention to steal his marine glasses. He has lost four of these telescopic contrivances within the past six months, and I am authorized to offer in these columns reward of fifty dollars to the man who recovers the property and whales the thief.

The idea of making this corner an advertising medium I borrow from my friend McCormick, late of Arizona, and proprietor of a paper in that flourishing Territory. He tells me that his subscription list isn't large, which is principally the fault of the Apaches, the presence of those hostile savages interfering materially with a country circulation and confining one chiefly—Apache Chiefly—to the limits of the town. But he says he has the Government printing and advertising, by means of which he contrives to pay his way comfortably, as his advertising rates are five dollars a square for the first insertion and ten dollars for each subsequent one. This is doing things on the square with a vengeance.

One piece of advertising, as regards the Cliff House, I will do here without charge to anybody. This is it: The firm of Inigo and Foster was last Saturday dissolved by mutual consent, and I hereby warn and caution people against trusting that gentleman hereafter on my account, as I will not be responsible for any debts, either of his or my own contracting after this date.

The reasons for this seemingly harsh announcement are as follows: When last out there it puzzled me to decide what to order for lunch, and he suggested an Oregon grouse—serving me up a salt mackerel, thinking, perhaps, I didn't know the difference. Again: he has had L. S. engraved on all the glasses about his establishment, and when people ask him what the initials mean he winks and says: "L. S.—locus sigili—Place of the Seal, me boy," but he doesn't put quotation marks in his speech, nor in any way does he intimate that I am the patentee of the joke.

How the celebration is to be conducted to-day I have not the slightest idea, but I imagine the programme is the stereotyped one, varied perhaps by Samuel Brannan—who has lately gone into partnership with one of the largest glaziers in the city and become of course a supporter of the glazing interest—bringing a battery or two of field-pieces into the streets and firing salutes, until every window-pane in town is broken. The last time he tried this experiment there was not a pane of glass left within four blocks, which was doing putty well for a new beginner, I think. If there be any City Ordinance for such a demonstration, please show it me.

I would like to stay in town and assist in celebrating the acquisition of Wilmington as a new Terry-tory, but I haven't time. To tell the truth I am so busy now a-days that I can scarcely find time for dissipation, let alone anything else. Occasionally, however, I manage to steal an hour away, and if any do not think that I contrive to make that hour tell, they can win my money.

The first real leisure that comes I intend to devote to the service of the Dashaways. A friend of mine across the way and myself have imported at large expense a reformed drunkard, and are loaning him out to those who need his services. In our own cases he effected a cure some time ago, and latterly we have placed him at the disposal of our acquaintances. He has his hands so full just now, however, that he has to be spoken for three days in advance, like seats at Miss Heron's performances.

Apropos of this lady, I discover that a wine-maker in France has stolen the title of two of her plays as a brand for his bottles. Margo and The Lone Chateau he has yoked together as "Chateau Margeaux," which infringement of her copy-right is right wrong.

I have hinted at going out of town to-day, but, to tell the truth, I haven't told the real reason of my going yet. I'm afraid of the waiters!

About five hundred of these noble but misguided individuals—I'm in the laboring interest, you see—laid down their arms, on Wednesday, and struck. With great ingenuity, they contrived to strike while the soup was hot, leaving the guests at the various hotels half served—thus serving their friends as badly as they did their employers.

An acquaintance, or rather a distant relative of mine—very distant, for he lives out in the neighborhood of the Mission—remarks that "They also serve who only stand and wait," but I scarcely think the author of that quotation intended it to apply in this connection.

The gallantry of the gentlemen guests at my boarding-house was remarkable. As with one accord they rose from their seats and waited on the ladies, sometimes bringing hash instead of hominy, but it is gratifying to know that in all cases their intentions were honorable.

I took up a tray the moment these waiters played the deuce, and departed myself with that conspicuous grace and polished politeness which has made the name of INIGO a household word in the mouths of all intellectual and appreciative ladies.

There was considerable fun at the Occidental on the occasion. Mr. Leland went so far back on his dignity as to go around among the tables asking his friends what they'd have to eat—once or twice by mistake he asked them what they'd have to drink. Jerome, with a white skull-cap on his head and a white sheet tucked under his chin, glided around like the ghost of Julius Caesar, a carving knife in one hand and a soup-plate in the other—his assistance was wholly superfluous. Mr. Olmstead, as usual, was quiet and didn't say much, but did more than any other two men in the house. Mr. Forbes took a short cut to promotion by carving the mutton in the back room, while the accomplished head-cook jumped around in a fashion that furnished a remarkable example of spring in Auguste. Mr. Cunningham was exercised to an unprecedented degree, and really made himself remarkably useful. A close observer going into the meat-room could not have failed to observe the features and form of the Hon. Wadsworth Porter, who stood at a dresser with bared arms, washing dishes as though he had never done anything else in his life. It was always my private impression that he could clean out plates more rapidly and thoroughly than any other man in the house, and as for washing tumblers—contriving at the same time to rinse out his throat—I have long known that he hadn't his equal in town. But on this occasion he surpassed even his usual self. Any one who does not think he can wash more dishes in less time than any ten Chinaman in town can just break me!

I have spoken as flatteringly as I could of all these gentlemen, because, if another strike occurs among the boys, I wish to be sure of getting something to eat.

To make the affair a sort of a stand-off, the Occidental refuses to re-employ any waiter before employed there, and not without reason. For I do think that they used the propriety of that hotel badly. It grieves me to think that I shall no more see the plush-covered pate of my faithful friend James, and never more hear the persuading accents of his voice as he proposes to give my cold mullins to the Sanitary Commission and assures me that warm ones "are on the coals." Then there is Michael, always an angel in disguise, whose soothing words and attentions fell on one's soul as kindly as dumplings; the gentlemanly-looking Stanly, who was always forcibly connected in my mind with Marmion; the good-natured and ready Tom—but why call over the roll of these boys who will never again bring rolls to me. They are traitors, and I defy them forever.

Mr. Leland proved himself equal to the emergency. The next morning he marched a regiment of dragoons—he acted on the spur of the moment, I suppose—into the breakfast-room, and they have been stationed there ever since. They make pretty good waiters for new beginners, and that they will arrive at perfection in the course of time is possible. But that there is room—a whole dining-room, in fact—for improvement, cannot be denied. They try to make themselves useful, and are very particular about placing the knives and forks in geometrical order and brushing away crumbs, but they sometimes commit the mistake of putting the soup into my lap or an egg into my ear, when I do think it would be better to lay either, the latter especially, upon the table.

Looking at the number of this slip, for which the impatient printer stands waiting, I find to my surprise that it is marked ten. Here I simply prove that I have not learned the lesson of life properly, for at my age a man should be able to put all he cares for on this earth in two sheets. With a respectful submission of which proposition, I affix to it the green seal and signature of INIGO.

THE PERPLEXITIES OF A SOMNAMBULIST.

I HAD been for twenty years a clerk in a merchant's office, without a hope of ever rising much higher or of being able to do more than secure a modest provision for old age by dint of small economies and much self-denial. One morning I awoke and found myself a man of property. The post had brought an announcement of the death of an old uncle of my father's to whose property I was heir-at-law; no will having been found since his death.

After all, it was not a very grand inheritance. But it was an independence, and quite enough to satisfy all the modest wants and wishes of a merchant's clerk.

The notary who had announced my succession to my grand-uncle's property met me at the railway station near my future home. My first question was how he knew of my relationship to the deceased, who had long ceased to hold any communication with his family, and had been almost forgotten by them.

"I knew it from a will that I made for him last December," he said, "which document if it had still existed would have deprived me of the pleasure I now enjoy of making your acquaintance. I must tell you that some five years ago your grand-uncle took a young girl into his family, the orphan daughter of a farmer whom he had known many years. This girl assisted the housekeeper, Madame Lemaitre; and, when the old gentleman was ill, nursed him with the affection and devotion of a daughter. To her he left all his property, except a small legacy to yourself as his sole living relative."

"But the will? What became of it?"

"It was not to be found after your kinsman's death, and the housekeeper asserts that he destroyed it himself, and was about to make another in her favor, but was prevented by his sudden death."

"Why had he altered his intentions?"

Doricourt shook his head.

"The old woman asserts that he had had, of late, some cause to doubt the honesty of the young girl Suzanne. He had lost a great many articles of value. Suzanne has a brother who bears a very bad character, and Bornand believed (according to Madame Lemaitre) that the girl had robbed him to supply the necessities of this good-for-nothing relative."

"Truly," said I, "he was right, then, to change his mind. But it is fortunate for me that he did not execute another will, since a servant was still to have been preferred to his kinsman. What has become of Suzanne?"

"Well, you see," replied the notary, with a little hesitation, "she takes charge of the poultry, and is invaluable as a dairy woman; therefore I would not dismiss her until you arrived and could suit yourself with another maid. I must beg your charitable consideration for this poor young girl who is homeless and destitute, and at present without a character to obtain another place."

"And who hoped, doubtless, to possess the farm itself," I added, considerably touched by the sad change in this unfortunate's circumstances. We talked of her and of the property, till Doricourt, suddenly pointing with his whip over his shoulder, exclaimed:

"There is your farm."

It was a substantial-looking house, with tall chimneys, surrounded by apple orchards, but certainly not possessing any claim to be considered a picturesque dwelling.

We drove up to the door, which was opened by a young girl of nineteen.

As we passed into the house I looked at her with interest. She was a tall, well-made young woman, with a fair, fresh complexion, large blue eyes, and light brown hair. There was a certain pathos in her voice, and a resigned sadness in her countenance which excited my pity.

My dreams that night were all of Suzanne—of this disinherited, accused orphan.

The jealous eye of old Lemaitre detected an understanding between me and my servant, and it was not long before Suzanne suffered for it. One day, as I was passing an open door of one of the bed-chambers, I heard Lemaitre scolding the poor girl cruelly. She reproached her with deceit, with artifice, and with unmaidenly forwardness. At first Suzanne made no reply; when she did at last answer it was with angelic mildness and patience. Her meekness appeared to provoke the old fury still more, and she actually struck the young girl a blow on the face. This was more than I could endure. I entered the room, and sternly demanded what she meant by such conduct? Her answer was a storm of accusations against Suzanne, whom she called a thief and a hypocrite.

"If you wish to be safe in life and property, you had better dismiss her at once," she screamed. "She won't get honestly angry—not she! She is waiting her time to give me a quieting potion, I suppose."

A low ejaculation of horror from Suzanne interrupted her. "Madame Lemaitre," said I sternly, "you cannot know what you say. But I will not suffer so ungovernable a temper. You will quit my service at once."

"Very well," she replied, insolently. "If it hadn't been for an evil chance or worse I should have been mistress here."

That girl has got round you with her big blue eyes and her calm face—but she will sell you yet to Jacques."

(Jacques was Suzanne's brother.)

Poor Suzanne murmured words of meek sorrow and gentle reproach. My own temper was fairly roused.

"You shall quit the house this very day," I said; "I wonder you dare to be so insolent. Suzanne, leave the room, and do not see this woman again."

Thus I dismissed Madame Lemaitre. I installed Suzanne in her place.

The days went on smoothly but monotonously. Winter at last stole on us. The weather was dark and dreary; the cold intense.

One evening I bade Suzanne bring her work, and come to keep me company. I found this young girl well-read in our best authors, shrewd, intelligent, even witty. I desired her to come again the next evening, and it became an established custom henceforward that she should make my coffee for me.

One evening I was amusing myself when she entered by looking at the few family jewels which I had inherited from my great uncle. Doricourt had given me the old casket containing them on the day of my arrival at the farm; but hitherto I had had neither time nor inclination to examine them.

They consisted of a pair of bracelets of enamel, clasped with diamonds, which had probably belonged to my great-grandmother, judging from their antique fashion; a huge pair of massive gold buckles, and a garnet necklace; there was also an old watch inlaid with stones. While I still held the bracelets in my hand Suzanne entered the room. She uttered an exclamation of surprise and admiration. "Oh, sir, what beautiful bracelets!"

"They are very handsome," I answered; "did you never see them before?"

"Oh, no, sir. Our poor master kept that casket and the plate at his banker's. Doricourt only brought them here the day you came."

"Why were they kept at the bank?" I asked.

"For fear of robbers, I suppose, sir. This part of the country is not very safe. They would cut a man's throat for less than one of those bracelets."

"But," I said, after that first startled pause, "no one but yourself, Suzanne, knows that I keep these jewels in the house, or that the plate is in my dressing-room."

"That is true, sir," she answered, simply.

"Then mind you mention it to no one," I commanded.

"You shall be obeyed;" and her eyes lingered admiringly on the ornaments.

"I have not forgotten," I said, more gently, "that you once were to have possessed this house and these very jewels. Tell me, Suzanne, why did my grand-uncle destroy the will made in your favor?"

She blushed crimson, up to the very roots of her hair.

"Sir," she said, tremulously, "I was wickedly belied to my master. I do not know by whom. But I have my doubts and suspicions as to my secret enemy. I have a brother—alas! a very bad young man. He is always in some trouble or another. He came here to try and obtain a little help from me in his sore need. Now, when I came into service here I did so on condition that I should hold no further communication with my brother. But one day Jacques stood at our kitchen door, looking as if he were nearly dead with hunger. I could not see my brother perish! He was at the last extremity of want and misery; I gave him food; but I went without dinner myself that day that I might not even thus rob my good master. I gave him also my wages—but nothing more—oh! nothing more, I assure you, sir;" and she clasped her hands in earnest asseveration.

"Madame Lemaitre came into the kitchen and found me speaking to Jacques," she continued, "and she was very angry. She told my master, and declared she should be afraid to sleep at night lest Jacques might come to rob and murder us. But though he was wild and idle, Jacques was incapable of such a crime. Imagine my distress, my anguish!—the very next day there was missing from master's own room his silver snuff-box, his watch, his purse! No one had broken into the house; the doors and windows were as safely fastened as when we went to rest. The whole house was searched for the lost things in vain. We never saw them again. My master was very angry, and, alas! still more grieved. He accused me of having stolen them, and given them to Jacques. He was deaf to my protestations—to my grief and shame and misery. He told me had left me his property, but that it should never now be mine. And he burned his will before my face. Madame Lemaitre says he intended to have made another in her favor, but, happily, he did not."

"And he did not dismiss you under these circumstances of grave suspicion?" I said, seriously.

"No, sir. My master was the most benevolent of men. He well knew the value of character to a woman! He retained me. He had pity on my youth, he said. He was kind and good to me to the last."

"It was a frightful position for you to be placed in," I said.

"Have you any idea what had become of the lost articles?"

"At first I feared Madame Lemaitre had been very wicked and had hidden them to get me into trouble; but I don't think now she had—I watched her so closely, I searched so constantly.... No, it is a mystery which only the good God can reveal in His own good time."

I talked but little that evening. I took a book, and the women conversed in whispers. But my thoughts wandered constantly to the strange robbery which had deprived Suzanne of my inheritance. It vexed me greatly that such a doubt should have rested on Suzanne, and my feelings about it revealed to me the fact I had wilfully ignored hitherto, that I—a staid man of forty, who had never yet felt the slightest tenderness for living woman, and had been long ago set down as a confirmed bachelor—had absurdly fallen in love with my female servant! It was a severe mortification to me.

I determined to struggle against my misplaced passion to the best of my power. Now, I resolved to send Suzanne away with an annuity for her life; then, again, to sell my farm. In the midst of these perplexities I fell asleep.

But the next morning found me reluctant to make myself miserable. I had not sufficient pride to be heroic in the matter. I determined to keep my own secret and wait. And... every day made Suzanne dearer to me.

Love, like other juvenile diseases, is worse when we take it late in life. Assuredly my infatuation for Suzanne would have raised my youthful scorn had I witnessed it in another. It made me very unhappy. I could not bear the thought of marrying my servant. I could not bear to part from her. I can never forget the nights I passed while this struggle was going on between my pride and my love. And then, as if to make matters worse, I suddenly began to doubt Suzanne's share in the singular robbery from my predecessor's chamber.

I had slept in it hitherto; I vacated it now and went into another, for a fancy possessed me that there might be some hidden entrance into it.

On the same day I effected this move Lawyer Doricourt came to see me on business, and remained the night. I put him into that same chamber.

In the morning he descended, looking a little uneasy.

"Bornand, my friend," he said, "did I leave my watch down stairs last night?"

"No," I replied; "I saw you look at it just as we were saying 'good-night' outside your chamber-door."

"It is very strange," he observed; "I thought I remembered winding it up and putting it on the table last night. To-day it is gone."

"But who could have taken it? The house has not been entered. Do you fasten your chamber-door?"

"No; I am afraid of fire. And do you know that once in the night I woke and heard a movement in my room. I asked if any one was there, and received no answer. My night-light had gone out."

I felt seriously uneasy. We summoned the servants and told them of the loss. Suzanne turned visibly pale and trembled. The sharp eye of the lawyer instantly detected her emotion.

When the women had left the room, ostensibly to search for the lost watch, Doricourt said to me:

"I trust I have not led you into harm by begging you to retain Suzanne. Did you notice her change of countenance just now?"

"Yes; but surely it was natural, when you recollect that a similarly mysterious loss ruined her worldly prospects. You can not," I continued, warmly, "you cannot really think she would be guilty of so barefaced a robbery?"

"Not so impossible as you believe. You know that Suzanne has a worthless brother?"

I nodded assent.

"Well, I saw him, only yesterday, hanging about your premises, and warned him off. I said nothing about him, because I thought he meant to obey me, for he turned and walked off in the direction of the town."

I felt troubled and alarmed, I confess. Had Suzanne been so foolish as to admit the man into the house? I rang at once. When she obeyed the summons I asked her if she had seen her brother the previous day.

"No; she had not seen him since I had arrived at the farm."

And she looked the image of candor as she spoke.

But Doricourt was not so willing to place faith in her as I was.

"I don't believe her!" he exclaimed, after I had dismissed her. "With your permission, I shall at once place this affair in the hands of the police."

But I persuaded him to wait an hour or two and to let me accompany him to the town.

"Have you lost any thing yourself?" he added, while we waited for luncheon.

"No; at least not that I am aware of; but since this place is so mysteriously haunted by an invisible robber, I think I will take my few valuables with me and place them in the care of my banker."

With this intent I went to my bureau for the casket. It was not there! . . . I fancied I might be mistaken; that I had locked it up with the plate which was not in daily use, and I hastened to ascertain the fact. Alas! some of the best pieces of plate were also gone, and the casket was not to be found. Nor did my losses end here. Many small treasures, only precious as heir-looms or souvenirs of dear friends, were also gone, and all had been removed from places of which I myself retained the key.

The amazement of Doricourt and myself was extreme.

"This can not be endured," he said, indignantly. "I have to ask your forgiveness for exposing you to such wholesale plunder. False keys have undoubtedly been used. Only a domestic traitor could have done this! I expect that some day you will awake and find yourself utterly stripped, and Suzanne gone."

What could I say? What could I object to his determination?

He ordered his carriage and drove off.

Suzanne, with a white, despairing face, brought in my early dinner. My heart ached as I gazed on her. Even if she were guilty (and I could not quite doubt her even yet), I loved her still.

"Suzanne," I said, "do you know what Doricourt is gone to do?"

"I can guess, sir," she said, sadly.

"Listen," I continued, "I do not wish to expose you to a long imprisonment, nor even to the questioning of the police. Fly while there is yet time!"

Large tears rolled down her pallid cheeks.

"You are too good, sir," she said, gently; "but you will pardon me if I say I would rather die first. No! let them torture me if they will. I am innocent; and sometimes I think if my good old master had not hushed up his losses to save me it had been better for me. The dreadful mystery might have been explained before now."

"You are quite innocent, then, Suzanne?"

Her look of pitiful surprise and rebuke answered me.

"Oh, sir! But why should you not doubt me?"

And she left the room weeping. I certainly was a very foolish elderly man! I could scarcely resist following her and telling her how I loved her.

Towards evening Doricourt returned with the police. They instituted a rigorous search all over the house, but without effect. No trace of the lost property could be found.

Then they questioned and cross-questioned Suzanne for an hour, which seemed to me endless.

And yet never had I seen her beauty so touching as when she stood meekly answering their impertinent interrogatories. Once and again I interfered in her behalf, to their no small amazement, especially as I saw they had no doubt of her having at least admitted her brother, and aided him in robbing me.

She was to go to jail; but it was too late to convey her thither that evening. The roads were nearly impassable, and the officers were not unwilling to partake of my hospitality for the night. Ah, that night! I can never forget it!

Before we retired to our rooms we were startled by a loud crash in the kitchen, and for the moment believed that a gang of robbers, headed by the redoubtable Jacques, were effecting a violent entrance. Doricourt and I hastened to the spot. It was only a stupid servant, who, having to get supper for the police (Suzanne was a prisoner in her room,) had broken a bottle of wine to shivers on a kitchen-table. I scolded her for her awkwardness; but as the table was only one standing by the side of the wall—not that on which the supper was spread—the loss was supplied, and the meal not interrupted.

I paced my room for more than an hour after I had wished Doricourt good-night. My anguish of mind was unspeakable. I felt that even if nothing could be proved against Suzanne, the mere disgrace of a trial, and the apparent improbability of clearing her from suspicion, would divide us forever.

I did not then feel that any former pride or reluctance on my part had already divided us.

But if she were found guilty?—if the property were discovered in the hands of her brother? . . . I could not bear to think of it. I suffered tortures. Oh! my despised desk; my strict, but just employers. You were avenged! How I wished at that moment that my grand-uncle had left a will!

At length, exhausted by my emotions, I threw myself on my bed, and fell into a feverish slumber, and dreamed.

My dream was only a repetition of one that had recently haunted me; i. e., that robbers were in the house, and that I was endeavoring to conceal my treasures from them. I awoke from it, fancying Suzanne's brother had just swept off my foot with a reaping sickle.

But the pain I dreamed was real and sharp; and where was I? I uttered a shrill, piercing cry of alarm. I was standing on the table by the kitchen wall, amidst the broken glass of the bottle, and the blood was flowing from my wounded feet!

My cry roused the man who was watching in the sitting-room. He came out, bringing his lamp.

"Why, sir!" he cried. "What are you doing? You are hiding your pillow!"

And it was true! I was trying, or rather had been trying, to squeeze my pillow through a small hole in the roof or ceiling above the table; it was still protruding from the hole over my head, and one of my hands grasped it.

His words awoke me fully; and like lightning the truth flashed on me. I was a somnambulist! I had hidden my property myself! Doricourt was called by my desire. He came; and one of the officers, after removing the glass, mounted the table and examined the hole, while I wiped and bound up my bleeding feet.

Yes! there was Doricourt's watch! and there were my casket, and my plate, and my small souvenirs, and—double marvel!—there also were the silver snuff-box, watch and purse of my late kinsman! Could it have been that somnambulism ran in our family, or that Madame Lemaitre had made the hole to conceal the articles she wished her master to believe were stolen? I am inclined to think the latter; though Suzanne prefers believing that the good old gentleman actually had robbed himself as I had. The hole had very much the appearance of having been made on purpose, and artfully designed to escape notice, as, in fact, it had that of the young girl.

Of course her innocence was at once fully established.

"And so it was you who stole my watch, Mr. Somnambulist!" laughed Doricourt, the next morning. "What could have caused such a disease? Have you been subject to walking in your sleep?"

"No," I replied; "I never did such a thing before. But the truth is, Doricourt, that a country life doesn't suit me—I have grown watchful and restless at night. It is not pleasant to sleep in fear of cut-throats; and my lonely life makes me nervous. So, if you will be good enough to sell my farm I shall be satisfied with the proceeds and my uncle's savings, and return to my old life."

And so it was settled. We sold the farm, and returned to town—I say "we," for, of course, the reader has divined that I made Suzanne the only reparation I could for the unworthy suspicions my kinsman and myself had cast on her—I married her.

We live very happily. It is not known in town that I married my servant.

Suzanne is well educated, pretty and genteel; and her humble origin is as little suspected as that the grave Antoine Bornand, now a prosperous merchant, was once guilty of robbery—in his sleep.

FRANKLIN PREPARING FOR THE FRENCH COURT.—Dr. Franklin, we are informed, began his preparations by ordering a wig; since no man had yet dared to contemplate the possibility of exhibiting uncovered locks to a monarch of France. Mr. Austin used to say, that not only was the court costume exactly prescribed, but each season had its own costume, and if any one presented himself in lace ruffles, when the time of year demanded cambric, the chamberlain of the palace would refuse him admission. Readers of Madame Campan remember her lively pictures of the intense etiquette which worried the soul of Marie Antoinette in these very years. So Dr. Franklin ordered a wig. On the day appointed, says tradition, the peruquier himself brought home the work of his hands, and tried it on: but the utmost efforts of the great artist could not get it upon the head it was designed to disfigure. After patiently submitting for a long time to the manipulations of the peruquer, Dr. Franklin ventured to hint that, perhaps, the wig was a little too small. "Monsieur, it is impossible." After many more fruitless trials, the peruquer dashed the wig to the floor, in a furious passion, exclaiming, "No, Monsieur; it is not the wig which is too small; it is your head which is too large." It was too late, continues the anonymous chronicler who recorded this anecdote, to procure another, and, therefore, the audacious philosopher resolved to approach the presence of majesty "without a bag." "The size and appearance of Franklin's head," he concludes, "became a subject of common conversation." "Yes, sir," was the usual remark, "Ile a une grosse tete, et une grande tete." He has a big head, and a great head." Having abandoned the wig, he ventured to discard the still more indispensable sword, as well as the universal chapeau that was carried under the arm. On the morning of the great day he dressed as he would have dressed if he were going out to dine with the President of Congress—in a suit of plain, black velvet, with the usual snowy ruffles at wrist and bosom, white silk stockings and silver buckles. And a more superb costume than that has never been worn by an old gentleman in any age or country. So General Washington was attired on occasions of State, with the addition of yellow gloves, a cocked hat and plume, and sword with steel hilt and white leather scabbard. Dr. Franklin's costume, I need not say, was a most brilliant success. Mr. Austin intimates that the chamberlain hesitated a moment about admitting him, but it was only for a moment; and all the court were captivated at the noble, well-timed effrontery of his conduct. Better for the whole tribe of chamberlains if that chamberlain had done his duty, and sent the American home for his wig. The recoil from the French Revolution (in which we are now living) has given the chamberlain class another century of life, but Franklin really announced their departure when he went to court without a court dress, amid the extatic applause of Europe. Mr. Dean and Mr. Lee, as was proper, conformed to the custom, and wore both wig and sword.

OUTCASTS.

THEY haunt the streets of the city by night,

But are banished from day forever;

They come and go like the shadows cast

By clouds on a flowing river;

The ghost of a sweetness long since lost,

Unpitied and dead to pity,

They wander lonely and tempest tost,

Where blackness covers the city.

They live their lives, forgotten and dead

Forgiveless and unforgiven—

But the angel of childhood seems to smile

Them back through the portals of heaven;

While far away among eastern dales,

In beautiful country places,

Old couples whisper in hed o' nights,

And talk of the absent faces.

The old, old tale with doleful end!—

A heart either wicked or broken,

A vacant place by the ingleside,

A name that is never spoken.

The end?—It is yonder beneath the grass;

The sin, the pain, and the patches;

Or in yonder house where a woman dies

To a chorus of drunken catches.

The end?—a shriek from the moonlit bridge,

A plunge to the death beneath,

And a bubble of light 'round a fluttering dress

Where the waters circle and seethe.

What curse lies yonder without the town,

Where the blue fresh rivers run.

There, in the pastoral homes whose hearts

Are smiled upon by the sun?

What taint is alive in that free, clear air

Which comes not hither to woo us,

That it sends this pitiful shadow forth

To mock and to undo us?

What light is upon it that it gives

These wandering daughters to us?

They load the girl with their homely gifts,

They rear her in wifely arts,

They dream of the girl in her bridal dress,

While she sins and breaks their hearts.

Ah, me! to see the faces that haunt

The streets with ghastly mirth,

To watch the vacant delight, and see

The woman so gross with earth,

To see the sinner sweetening sin,

Mad with a wild unrest—

And then to think of the mother's hope

As she smiles on the babe at her breast!

O City, rich in money, and mirth,

Richer in work divine!

Whose is the sorrow, and whose the sin?

And how much of the sin is thine?

Enough to know that the sin was born

Of a bitter delight or sorrow;

That the sorrow and sin can be cleansed away,

Neither to-day nor to-morrow;

Enough to know that the broken heart

Needs the beauty of Christ to mend it,

That ere we labor to kill the sin

We must labor to comprehend it.

We men are narrow, and harsh, and vain,

We are petty amid our scorn!

But, oh! to gaze on the crowded street

Where the sinners wander forlorn,

And then to kiss our daughters and wives

And our little babes new-born!

To see the sin and sorrow that flaunt

When the beautiful day is done,

And then to think of the homeless heart

Which mourns for the absent one—

Of the free, blue air and country dales,

Where the bright fresh rivers run—

Of the girl that sings in her mother's house,

And the children that laugh in the sun.

A CONVENIENT GARMENT.—Messrs. Jay, of Regent street, London, have produced a dress which they call the "Neoclaiue," the object of which is kindly and useful, namely, to save the trouble of changing from a morning to an evening costume, when time presses, or the occasion is not convenient for so doing. The rearrangement of this new dress is so perfect, that none could suspect the dress which appears now, as a beautiful evening costume, was the one of so totally a different character for graceful morning wear.

WAAT'S IN A NAME?—A bookseller in Philadelphia lately received an order for a book called "In a Garden." He sent what was desired—Tennyson's Enoch Arden, which the rural bibliophile, having heard somewhat hastily pronounced, understood to mean what she wrote. Washington Irving used to make his friends merry about an English bookseller who ordered "The Earl of Hamboro," instead of The Alhambra.

(For the Californian.)

WHITE LILIES.

THE Lily is the nun of flowers;
For her whiteness, for her whiteness
Is as lucent as the moon
When with perfect round it lingers
Just above yon breezy bowers,
Where the glory of its brightness
Slideth down in sudden swoon:
Then dim fingers, then dim fingers
Stir the cool and quiet stillness
Of the lake, and break the chillness
Of the holy silent hours—
Gentle Lily, nun of flowers.

Lily, hily, swing thy cup;
Fairest chalice, fairest chalice;
Floateth from its ivory walls
Fragrant breath as from a censer:
Night will fold thy beauty up;
May no bitter tongues of malice
Wound thee; Heaven heed thy calls
As sweet dispenser, sweet dispenser.
Lo! thy hidden heart of hearts
Is transfixed with fiery darts;
Lily, bow thy purest brow,
Very truly, nun art thou!

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 4th, 1865.

(DELAYED LETTER.)

NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, January 3, 1865.

BETWEEN Christmas and New Year's, household records are meagre, with the exception of those of dyspepsia. The domestic Fate compels us to eat odds-and-ends of salads, mince pies, bon-bons and made-over dishes till the demon of indigestion issues from the casket of the stomach, and appears a worse and bigger genius than the one in the Arabian Nights.

The most remarkable social event which cast its shadow before has been the prevalence of a fashion of sending cards to gentlemen with the intimation that visits were expected on the second of January. What the female sovereigns will do with the gentlemen who do not comply with their mandates remains to be seen.

More money, it is said, has been spent in these last holidays than in former ones. Magnificent presents have been given and exchanged. Tough Admiral Farragut received a handsome New Year's gift from the merchants, in the shape of a package of bonds worth $50,000. A great many happinesses arose on the occasion of exchange of presents. Here is an example: McEntee, the landscape artist, sent Stoddard, the poet, one of his delicious pictures, and Stoddard sent McEntee a sonnet with a characteristic gift. They paid each other in kind, on the plan of trading at the country stores—yarn tea and eggs for calico. I copy the sonnet, and should be pleased to copy the picture if I had the power, for it is better than the poem:

TO JERVIS M'ENTEE, ARTIST.

JERVIS, my friend, I envy you the art
Which you profess, and which possesses you,
To mimic Nature; unto her so true,
Your pictures are what she is to the heart,
The Mystery of which it is a part,
That gladdens when we brush the vernal dew,
And saddens when leaves fall, and flowers are few;
Nor quite forsakes us in the noisy mart
Whence she is banished, save in ships of sky
That swim in mist, or drip in dreary rain,
No glimpse of peaks far off, nor forests nigh,
Only dark streets, strange forms, a barren pain;
Till to my wall I turn a longing eye,
When you restore me mountains, woods again!

We are as extravagant as the Romans were in the last days of their Empire. What does it denote? It is a bad sign to see Gerry selling a pate de fois gras at six dollars, yet he sells it. It is a bad sign for the villain Frenchmen to sell chocolate candy at four dollars a pound, and bon-bon boxes at a hundred dollars each, yet they sell them. I think chocolate bon-bons are better this year than they ever were.

Speaking of presents, reminds me that the President has released Mrs. Hutchinson, who was sentenced to five years imprisonment in the House of Correction for attempting to send a sword to the rebel Major Harry Gilmore. It seems that "Peace on earth and good will to man" does not include the sending of gifts to our enemies. [Scarcely, when the "gift" is palpably a long way in advance of the "plough-share" era of which the sacred authority quoted gives promise.—ED. CAL.]

That amiable, veracious, and spirited sheet, the Richmond Examiner, in its comments on the fall of Savannah, decries the merits of that town greatly; in its opinion, Savannah is a place of no account whatever. It also criticises Sherman, and says he has done nothing more than a band of escaped galley slaves could have done.

The Unitarian minister, Richard Frothingham, has written a book which he calls A Tribute to Thomas Starr King. It is scarcely a "Life" of King, but rather a synopsis of his career as minister, lecturer, and orator, with a few of King's own letters interspersed, and the opinions of his friends regarding him. I quote a readable passage, and a correct one probably: "Thos Starr King was not considered as profoundly learned; he was not regarded as a remarkable orator; he was not a great writer; nor can his unrivalled popularity be ascribed to his fascinating, social or intellectual gifts. It, to quote another writer, 'was the hidden interior man of the heart, the invisible character behind all the rich possessions, intellectual and social of this gifted man, that gave him his real power and skill to control the wills, to move the hearts, and to win the unbounded confidence and affection of his fellow-beings.' He was one of the magnetic men—a modern and Christian Alcibiades."

The Dead of the Year are illustrious. Hawthorne, Savage Landor, Schoolcraft, Starr King, George P. Morris, Mrs. Kirkland, Catherine Sinclair, Dr. Potts, Professor Silliman, Meyerbeer, Robson the burlesque actor, Wallack, who died on Christmas Day, as Thackeray died on Christmas Eve, Captain Speke, Giddings and Leech. These names I have selected from a list of nearly a hundred celebrated persons who have joined the "innumerable caravan" in the last year, and who are on the way to the world of souls, where no anniversaries occur unless they are those of earthly remembrance.

"Carlyle said he wanted to know all about Margaret Fuller, even to the color of her stockings," quotes the compiler of the new volume of Elia, "and the admirers of 'Elia' want to possess every scrap and fragment of his inditing." It is perhaps a tribute to the fame of Lamb, that an American should search out and discover in old musty periodicals the neglected essays of this charming writer. The contents of this volume consist of essays, sketches, tales, poems and letters; they are not to be compared with the best productions of Lamb, but they contain more or less of his humor, sense and observation. The reader who remembers the dissertation on "Roast Pig," will value this collection, and keep it on his book-shelves.

Roberts Brothers have issued the first reprint of Leigh Hunt's The Seer, in elegant form, color, paper and print. In this case, Lamb and Hunt, friends in life, in death are not divided. The Seer is a collection of papers taken from the London Journal, the Liberal, the Tatler and the Round Table, by Hunt himself. In its preface he says: "Given at our suburban abode with a fire on one side of us, and a vine at the window at the other, this nineteenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and forty, and in the very green and invincible year of our life, the fifty-sixth."

If ever there was a writer that could claim the titles of "dear" and "darling," it is Leigh Hunt, even if he deserved the name said to be given him by Dickens in one of his novels, "Harold Skimpole." The papers of The Seer are tender, pathetic, cozy, and witty. They are the delightful kind of lazy, appetizing, suggestive reading. Read for instance, "Windows Considered from Inside," "A Rainy Day," "A Pinch of Snuff," or "A Human Being and a Crowd." Each and all are excellent. "The Cot by the Fire," is a bit of natural history, with a vein of philosophy running through it that is unsurpassable.

Mrs. General Lander, née Davenport, is about to return to the stage; she will open at Niblo's next month, and intends to bring out some translations of French plays. Mr. Charles Pope, an actor who has been absent from New York a long time, will support her. The death of the veteran Wallack makes a gap in the annals of the stage; in point of taste, his management was first rate, his pains-taking unwearied to the last. It was the fashion in the Wallack family to make a tableau of itself, and I have often seen old Wallack, Lester Wallack and the handsome grandson of the former, a boy of a dozen years, posed in photographs and posing at the Maison Doree, and in Broadway. It was a spectacle which made me smile, but I am rather sorry that I shall never see the sight again.

E. D. B. S.

SAFELY HOME AGAIN.—Mr. Warren Leland, who knows how to keep a hotel on two oceans, has recently completed a trip across the continent—from the Metropolitan in New York to the Occidental in San Francisco. His object was a benevolent one—to find out the cheapest and best places for securing supplies for his cuisine. Among the incidents of the journey he witnessed an execution performed upon a warrior of the Snake Indians. The sentence was carried into effect by the Chief, who not only maintains justice but administers it. The unpleasant duty consisted of killing and scalping the unfortunate red man. This gave Mr. Leland the idea of a capital way of serving hair. At Utah he was introduced to twenty of Brigham Young's wives, and it is needless to say that he regards the Salt Lake Ducks with much favor.—New York Weekly Review.

A WESTERN paper chronicles as follows the recent explosion of a steamboat, on one of the great rivers: "The captain swam ashore." So did the chamber-maid; she was insured for $15,000, and loaded with iron."

THE LAST HOURS OF LOUIS XI.

"Waugh! waugh! who is this strong God that pulls me down?"
[Dying Exclamation of Clovis, King of France.]

IT is true that every death is the final scene of a solemn tragedy, though that death be a peasant's, the bed a heath; but it is also true that some of those scenes, although the grand lesson of mortality is taught by all alike, are infinitely more impressive, illustrate the supreme warning with a more startling commentary, a more vivid illustration, than the daily deaths of thousands of ordinary men and women.

Take, for example, the death witnessed on the last day of August, 1483, in a spacious apartment, hung with leather, stamped with fantastic golden devices, of a fortified castle on the banks of the Loire, at no great distance from Tours. The dying man writhing with torture upon a state bed is Louis the Eleventh of France, whose general character has been traced with sufficient accuracy by Sir Walter Scott in Quentin Durward. The pitiless King, who had played with human lives as if no more precious than those of the beasts that perish, to whom a decree of instant death upon the slightest suspicion, sometimes from mere caprice, had been little more than a pastime—now that his own hour had come, was shrieking for help to be saved from death, furiously threatening his attendants with death themselves if they did not relieve his agony—drag him back from the terrible tomb! Few of those who have read the narrative—not that penned by Philip de Comines, the historian, and perhaps the only worthy man who really esteemed Louis the Eleventh—but must still, as the fearful scene surges up from the depths of memory, distinctly hear those shrieks, entreaties, threatenings, through all the roar and tumult of intervening centuries.

Present in the death-chamber were the King's physician, Jacques Courtier; Oliver le Dain, commonly called Oliver the Devil, his Majesty's barber; Philip de Comines, the historian of his age; Francis de Paul, a monk and pilgrim not long arrived from the Holy Land, since beatified, and the bearer of a rich reliquary, the touch of which Louis, in his agonizing despair, tries to hope will bring back health and strength. The sixth and sadly observant person present was Jean Burnet, a priest belonging to the church of Notre Dame de Cléry, and generally resident at the castle palace. In a corner of the apartment lay a white hound, which had been gored by a wild boar a few days previously. The King, a skilled hunter, had been fond of the hound, and yet when Jacques Courtier told him the animal would recover, Louis fiercely resented the intelligence as an injury and insult to himself. Why should a dog, for whose preservation no lavishly paid-for prayers went up to heaven, for which relics possessed no healing virtue, have life, and not he—an anointed king? Twice anointed, indeed: for when some years before he had been in great danger, Louis had sent for the ampoule, at Rheims, and had the sacred balm, the portion which had not been used at his coronation, poured upon his head. His Majesty was unquestionably a believer in the solemn verities of the Christian religion, though its teachings in no wise influenced his actions. The names of Christ, of the holy Virgin, of numerous saints, were forever on his lips, their leaden images in his hat; but the examples of their lives he never for a moment dreamt of imitating in the most distant degree. A liberal benefactor of churches, too, but only in pursuance of his plan, suggested by a perversion of the sacred injunction to lay up treasures in heaven—a working for wages, in fact, making an immeasurably profitable investment of the gold of earth, to be repaid by the joys of heaven. And yet it would seem that his Majesty must have had fearful forebodings that his offerings had not been accepted, or he would scarcely have trembled with such horror when summoned to receive his reward.

On a pillow, within easy reach of the King's hand, lay a silver whistle. With that his Majesty could summon his guards stationed on the top landing of the winding, narrow stone stairs leading to the chamber, every turning of which was commanded by their arquebuses. Louis the Eleventh had but to sound that whistle, and in one minute, had the command issued from his lips, every man in that chamber would have been a corpse. He had committed atrocities equal to, if not surpassing that, which might not perhaps be possible. All there knew this, and it may have been this knowledge that had so blanched the cheeks of Oliver the Devil, and of Jacques Courtier, the physician. Philip de Comines could scarcely have apprehended danger from any delirious access of rage on the part of the furious monarch, nor could the priest of St. Cléry: and as to Francis de Paul, he, from what is known of him, would have disdained the danger, if by his presence there he might help to save a sinful soul.

Francis de Paul is kneeling by the King's bed, praying aloud that his Majesty's malady be healed, but above all supplicating for his soul's health. Louis, I should state, had been struck for the second time by apoplexy; but it was not that attack which was thrusting, primarily thrusting him into the grave. It did so in a secondary sense only, by having weakened his power to bear up against the internal disease which was killing him with torture. The King has not, it seems, unbounded confidence in the success of the monk's prayers.

The relics have not been tried as yet, for his anxious, glaring glance is fixed upon the physician's countenance, whilst that functionary feels the royal patient's pulse. Hark! Breaking in upon the monk's prayers you hear the chantings of the priests in the King's chapel, where they swell to a louder strain than usual. You hear more than that: a scream of agony, more than once repeated, finds a faint echo in that chamber. Those screams are wrung from Philip Gaultier, an obscure individual, suspected of being concerned in some absurd plot against the life of Louis: and they are torturing the wretched man to make him confess who were his accomplices. The probability is, that to be relieved of that maddening agony he will give the names of men utterly innocent of the "plot," if there was one. Those piteous screams do not arrest for a moment the attention of Louis the Eleventh. They are old familiar cries. Perhaps he doesn't hear them, nor does he apparently Francis de Paul's prayers. His eyes continue fixed upon the face of the physician, who having satisfied himself of the state of the King's pulse, retires softly to the foot of the bed, without uttering a syllable. Then the countenance of the King fell, and over his white, wasted features the shadow of an unutterable despair visibly deepened.

The physician is about to speak. "Stop! stop!" cried Louis, in shrill, screaming tones, in part due to the intense agony he was suffering—"stop! If you, Courtier, will relieve me of this agony—if you will save my life, if only for a few months—nay, weeks—I swear by the holy saints to double your salary. Where you have now twenty thousand livres you shall have forty thousand."

The physician replies, only by a look and a sardonic smile. Within an hour, as he well knows, Louis the Eleventh will be as poor as the most miserable beggar that ever died.

The physician's look and smile threw the King into a transport of rage. "Ha!" he shouted, rage lending him momentary strength—"ha! traitors! fools! I am not so ill as you pretend to believe. It is the closeness of this room which weakens, stifles me. Let my horse be saddled, I will ride out—ride out at once!" and he actually got out of bed, and bade Oliver the Devil help him to dress. The wounded hound, amazed by his master's voice, and seeing him, ran feebly towards Louis, and was at his feet when the King fell back, fainting, upon the bed, into which he was immediately helped. "It was the dog—the dog," feebly murmured Louis, whilst big drops of agony and fear stood upon his clammy forehead. "The dog threw me down; I could else have gone out, I am sure I could."

Francis de Paul had continued praying aloud—not ceasing for the incidents just related; he knowing, as well as the physician, that, unless the relics worked a miracle, Louis the Eleventh would pass to his account ere another hour chimed from the palace belfry. Despairing of medical, the King, as a last hope, sought spiritual help. "The reliquary, holy Francis! the reliquary! Miracles have been worked ere now by sainted relics, and—quick! quick!" Francis de Paul rose from his knees, took the reliquary in his reverend hands, and approached the King.

"One moment! one moment! If by virtue of these holy relics my life is preserved, I solemnly promise to endow the church to which you belong more richly than any other in France."

The monk smiled a sad, compassionate smile; and on his knees presented the relics to be touched by the King, he himself praying fervently in silence the while.

There was no help in the relics. The King screamed in a more than usually severe paroxysm of pain. When it had partially subsided, Louis beckoned Philip de Comines to approach. "Bend down your ear close to my mouth," he feebly whispered. "This illness may, I say may, terminate fatally. That is not likely—but possible. Should Courtier tell you that it must so terminate, tell me yourself, in a whisper. Say only, 'You must compose—tranquillize yourself.' Nothing more I shall understand, and will devote what days and nights may remain to me in prayer to the saints. Enough!"

Whilst this incident was passing, Courtier was talking, sotto voce, to Oliver le Dain, or the Devil. Oliver had been encouraged by Louis for many years to treat the monarch, when alone, with great freedom—to tell him disagreeable truths. Oliver the Devil imagined he might, without danger to himself, exercise the same privilege now.

Gliding with his customary cat-like steps to the head of the bed, he "loudly, rudely," says Philip de Comines—"not gently, soothingly, as a mighty monarch in his last agony should be spoken with—loudly, rudely said, 'It is time this farce were finished. You will not live half an hour. The holy Francis de Paul and his relics cannot prolong your life a moment. Prepare, then, to die as a King of France ought.'"

The royal barber's words acted as a galvanic shock might have done upon the moribund. Louis rose on end in the bed, his haggard face, his darkening eyes aflame with rage. "Audacious traitor!" he screamed, "dare you so speak to me? But whether I live or die, I am master here whilst I do live; and your life, Oliver the Devil, is, with all others, in my hand. I swear to you by my soul's salvation, as I hope for heaven, I will not be the first in this room that shall die. That I swear, invoking all the saints to bear witness to my oath. Oliver le Dain, you shall precede your master to the tomb."

Louis snatched the silver whistle, and was putting it to his lips, when Francis de Paul interposed. "In the name of God, King Louis, before whom you must shortly appear, do not at this supreme moment stain your soul with murder. Put down that whistle, for the sake of your own eternal welfare."

The King hesitated, still eyeing Oliver the Devil with ferocious hate. That person said nothing; but the cold sweat which covered his face, and no doubt the whole surface of his body; his trembling knees, which knocked against each other, showed that he felt the imminence of the peril he had rashly drawn upon himself.

"Oliver the Devil is a villain, an assassin, a poisoner, guilty of a thousand crimes," gasped Louis. "It will be a meritorious act to end that wicked life."

"It will be murder, without excuse."

"God will absolve me! You, holy father, will absolve me!"

"That I will not, dare not do! O King of France, descendant of Saint Louis, put away these bloody thoughts. Fix your eyes, your thoughts, upon this image of Him by whose passion and sacrifice you can only be saved from eternal perdition."

Louis seemed to be most affected by the declaration of St. Francis de Paul, that he would not—dared not give him absolution if he took the life of Oliver le Dain; and the monarch directed his inquiring gaze to Jean Brunot, the priest of Notre Dame de Cléry. The absolution of one priest, he no doubt argued, must be as efficacious as another. There was no encouragement in Brunot's answering glance. He continued praying, as could be seen by the motion of his lips.

"But my oath—my oath, just uttered!" resumed Louis, in rancorous but feeble tones. He was loth to lose his murderous clutch of Oliver le Dain. "My oath! Have I not sworn by my soul's salvation that I will not be the first in this room that shall die? Shall I appear before the judgment-seat—if I must so soon appear there—but it is not—cannot—shall not be true! You are all combined to cheat, to terrify, to madden me! Shall I—should I appear before the dreadful judgment-seat with an unfulfilled oath upon my conscience?"

"I can absolve you from that. God will absolve you. It is a fearful crime to fulfil a wicked vow, especially when warned not to do so by the Church; and the Church through me warns you. O son of the sainted Louis, lose not your own soul for the gratification of a miserable craving for vengeance."

Louis the Eleventh was startled—awed. Still, the orthodoxy of even Francis de Paul might be at fault. That hideous oath which he had uttered but a few minutes since, might he not in the unseen world have to make a terrible expiation for its non-fulfilment?

At that moment the hound gave a faint howl, caused, no doubt, by pain. A sparkling light gleamed in the eyes of the dying King. "Ah, my oath was, that I would not be the first in this room to die. I remember the words clearly. I did not say the first man. Oliver, kill the dog!"

Oliver obeyed with alacrity; he killed the dog, which expired with a loud howl.

King Louis the Eleventh rapidly sank after this; his failing brain, revealed by the childish comments that he made, gave unmistakable token that the end was very near. He tried to talk of governmental policy, to send instructions to his son through Philip de Comines; but every topic slipped from his mental grasp. He commanded that the slain hound should have a monument; declared that he had always intended to build four churches in honor of the Virgin Mary—seven for the Seven Dolours, seven for the Seven Joys, of the Mother of Christ,—would do so; it should be his first work were his life spared.

The darkness grew thicker, the icy hand of death colder. The King went on muttering prayers by habit, of whose purport his mind must have lost all perception; and thus, with the prayers of Francis de Paul, the chantings of the priests in the distant chapel; the screams of poor Gaultier, which had not yet ceased, though now but faintly heard, the soul of Louis passed to its account.

And yet it cannot be denied that Louis the Eleventh was a great, sternly wise monarch. His remedies for the times were the gibbet, the sword, the rack; but they were successful remedies to a great extent. France, as a nation, owes him much; and, what should recommend him to a certain party in this country, he was pre-eminently a "peace" man. One thing, too, is certain. He laid the basis for the union of the provinces of France, only finally consummated when they were fused in the flaming crucible of the great Revolution.

A GENTLEMAN in Scotland has preserved an old number of the Greenock Advertiser, containing the following announcement: "Notice to Correspondents: T. C.—The lines commencing, 'On Linden when the sun was low,' are not up to our standard. Poetry is evidently not T. C.'s forte."

INTERIOR ITEMS.

Louis R. Sowers, an estimable citizen, and chief clerk of the State Treasury under Finley, died Feb. 25th.

Lieut. A. J. Sansoni, Company G, Fort Alcatraz, has been presented with a splendid watch by citizens of Marysville.

Lassiter of Vallecito, Frank Gardner, S. W. Whitmore and Jacob Sherr (as we learn from the Wilmington Journal) have all been recently murdered by Apaches in Arizona.

It is reported (says a correspondent of the Call) that Curtis, late of Shasta, has been appointed U. S. District Judge for Nevada.

The "Pennsylvania Petroleum Oil Company" was incorporated at Santa Cruz on the 25th instant; the intention is to bore for oil on the Refugio rancho. Capital stock, $100,000.

James Brooks lost both hands by the premature discharge of a cannon while a Union-victory salute was being fired at Dutch Flat, Feb. 27th.

The Pajaro Times says: "The whale which was 'captured' a few weeks since, after it had washed ashore, at Soquel, by Mr. Fred. Ray, yielded twenty-eight barrels of oil—worth $12 per barrel."

A building belonging to B. S. Ward, and used as a school-house, in Shasta county, lately took fire from an ash-box, and was entirely destroyed, together with the school-books and other materials.

A Chinaman offered a quartz nugget for sale, recently, (says the Weaverville Journal), which weighed sixteen ounces. It yielded, when pulverized, about $160; the nugget is supposed to have been taken out at Long Bar, above Lewiston.

A. T. Nelson, of Sacramento, on behalf of residents of Lowell, Mass., desires information concerning Eben James, who is supposed to be in California, and who has not been heard from by his friends since September last.

An exchange tells us that the mining claims of Patrick Cody, in Downieville, have been sold for $35. A few ciphers have probably been omitted by the printer; if not, Patrick is getting a great deal of advertising for very little money.

Henry I. Thornton, once a member of the California Legislature, has been heard from. It is said he has been on Bragg's staff, and was at Charleston. He ought to be there now; he was always regarded as a "bright" boy, is still young, and doubtless Schemmelfinnig would make something of him.

From the Nevada Transcript we learn that the Bear Valley and Dutch Flat ditch, owned by the South Yuba Canal and Water Company, has been completed, and the water will soon be turned into it. The ditch is twenty-four miles long; it has cost about $80,000.

We have seen (says the Marysville Express) some elegant specimens of coal oil taken from the oil springs in the Coast Range, Colusa county, which we think surpass anything of the kind which has been found on this coast. This oil will burn freely in lamps without being rectified, in its rough state, just as taken from the spring.

Twenty-three buildings were destroyed by fire at Mokelumne Hill on the night of Feb. 25th. The Union Hotel (insured for $7,500) was the first building consumed; from it the fire extended to all the wooden structures on the north side of Stockton street up to McFadden's store, nearly opposite the Court House, and east and west of Main street, down to Weighes' dwelling. Loss not stated.

C. T. Wheeler, of Sacramento, one of the incorporators of the Alacran Mining Company (working a mine in Copala District, Sinaloa, Mexico), has received from one of the persons interested a specimen in the shape of a silver goblet weighing one pound and two ounces. The silver (says the Union) had been smelted from the ore, and by the patient and ingenious labor of a blacksmith, with anvil, hammer and other tools, had been skilfully wrought into its present form.

Many improvements are noted in the Sacramento papers as about to be made in that city. A "high grade" is the popular demand; and we observe that in the pending election for City Trustee, the question is, which candidate is most earnestly and unfalteringly in favor of placing the entire city above the danger of overflow? Think of that, after all the trials our strong-hearted Capital city has undergone, and the taxation to which she has been subjected! The world cannot show a parallel for the faith, courage and perseverance of her citizens.

The Marysville Appeal has been shown a letter from Mazatlan, from which it appears that there is rather an uneasy feeling among American miners there. The writer makes a suggestion which should be heeded, but which we presume will have little effect upon the "heavy-article" gentlemen who straighten up the affairs of the nation at so much per column. He says: "Please tell your newspaper folks that the agitation of the Mexican question and the Monroe doctrine is jeopardizing the lives and safety of all Americans here; and as paper pop-guns do not kill any one, they had better keep still and let Uncle Abe do what he thinks best when he is ready."

GOD SAVE THE PEOPLE.

WHEN wilt thou save the people;
Oh, God of Mercy! when?
Not kings and lords, but nations!
Not thrones and crowns, but men!
Flowers of thy heart, O God, are they;
Let them not pass like weeds away—
Their heritage a sunless day!
God save the People!

Shall crime bring crime forever,
Strength aiding still the strong?
Is it thy will, oh Father,
That man shall toil for wrong?
"No!" say thy mountains; "No!" thy skies;
Man's clouded sun shall brightly rise,
And songs be heard instead of sighs.
God save the People!

When wilt thou save the People!
Oh, God of Mercy, when?
The People, Lord, the People!
Not thrones and crowns, but men
God save the People! thine they are—
Thy children as the angels fair;
Save them from bondage and despair
God save the People!

—Ebenzer Elliot.

MISS. M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

SOMETHING LIKE FRIENDSHIP.

MAUDE HILLARY did not rise very early after that New Year's entertainment at the Cedars; painful emotions, troubles, doubts, and perplexities that had been unknown to her through all her previous lifetime, had crowded suddenly upon her within the last few weeks, and it was scarcely strange if she well-nigh fainted under the burden. She slept for some hours on that first night of the year—slept the feverish, heavy slumber that waits upon trouble of mind and exhaustion of body. The winter sun shone with a chill brightness between the rose-colored draperies of her window when she awoke from a painful dream to a dim sense of actual trouble that was still more painful; she remembered the scene of the previous night, her own desperate appeal for help, Francis Tredethlyn's avowal, and Julia's indignation. She remembered all this with a burning sense of shame, and with a tender and pitying regret for Julia's wrongs.

"And he did not love her!" she thought, "when I fancied they were so happy and united, so much what lovers ought to be; it was all false, after all, and he had deceived her. But why? What motive could he have for doing her so great a wrong?"

Miss Hillary pondered upon this mystery while she dressed—unaided this morning, for she did not care to endure her maid's sympathetic remarks upon her pale face and heavy eyes; unaided, for how soon that pretty Twickenham paradise, with all its dependencies, might pass away from her, unsubstantial as the fairy palace in which Princess Balroubadour floated away to Africa. Maude put on her plainest morning dress and went straight to Julia's room, intending to make her peace with that young lady, at any cost of self-humiliation. No base thought of Julia's obligations, no remembrance of the favors that had been heaped upon the Irish girl in that hospitable habitation, had any place in Maude Hillary's mind; she thought of her friend as tenderly as she might have thought of an only sister, and she remembered nothing except the great wrong that had been done to Julia by the defection of her lover. The breach between them was not to be narrowed. When Maude entered her friend's bedroom, she only found an empty and desolate-looking apartment, in which open wardrobes and drawers, and a dressing-table cleared of all its pretty frivolities, bore witness to the angry Julia's departure.

Miss Hillary's maid came running along the corridor, while her mistress stood amazed in Miss Desmond's deserted chamber.

"Oh, Miss," cried the girl, "to think as you should get up and dress yourself without a bit of help, while I've been waiting and listening for the bell these last two hours! Miss Desmond, she have gone, Miss, above an hour ago, and have took all her boxes in a fly to the station, but wouldn't have none of the servants to go with her; and oh, Miss, she looked as white as that toilet cover."

This was all Maude could hear of her sometime friend's abrupt departure from that pleasant dwelling-place in which she had enjoyed such a luxurious home. This was all that the servants could tell their young mistress about the splendid Julia; but in the study, where the scene of the previous night had been enacted, Maude found a letter directed to herself, in Miss Desmond's handwriting. It was a very brief missive; almost such a one as an English Elizabeth, or a Russian Catherine, might have written.

"For your father's hospitality," wrote Miss Desmond, "I shall always remain grateful, and shall be sorry to hear of any evil that may befall him. The debt I owe to you I shall also know how to remember, and shall wait the time and opportunity for its repayment.—J. D."

Maude sat for some time musing sorrowfully upon this oracular epistle. She was not in any wise terrified by her friend's threats; she was only sorry for Julia's disappointment.

"She must have loved Francis Tredethlyn very dearly," Miss Hillary thought, sorrowfully, "or she would never feel his conduct so deeply. And yet I have often fancied that she spoke of him coldly, almost contemptuously."

Poor Maude Hillary's lesson in the mysteries of every-day life had only just begun; she had yet to learn that there are other disappointments than those which wait upon true love, other pains and sorrows than those which have their root in the heart, and that there are such things as marrying and giving in marriage for the love of thirty thousand a year.

She spent a weary day in the pleasant drawing-room, where the red glow of a great fire illuminated as much prettiness in the way of china, and Parian, and bronze, and ormolu, and enamel, as would have stocked a bric-à-brac shop in Wardor street. She spent a tiresome day, that seemed interminably long, lying on a low sofa near the fire, thinking of her father's troubles and Julia's desertion. She thought also of that cruel scene, in which she had seemed to play so contemptible a part. What bitter humiliation it was to look back upon, now that the mad impulse of the moment, the desperate courage that had made her snatch at any chance of help for her father, had altogether passed away! How mean and pitiful the whole business seemed now to her calmer judgment, looked upon in the cold light of common sense! A borrower, a beggar almost, a miserable suppliant to her friend's affianced husband. What wonder that Francis Tredethlyn had basely taken advantage of that false position, to avow a passion whose least expression was an insult to her on the lips of Julia Desmond's lover? And then what wasted humiliation, what unnecessary shame; for had not she turned upon him and upbraided him in the next moment, forgetful of her father's desperate need!

Such thoughts as these were scarcely pleasant company all through that brief January day, which seemed so long to Maude Hillary. The slow hours crept on, and she still lay tossing restlessly on the sofa, which offered all that upholstery can offer for the consolation of a troubled mind. A servant brought lamps, and crept from window to window, drawing the curtains as stealthily as a burglar would have cut a square out of the iron door of Mr. Hillary's plate-room. The first dinner-bell rang out in the old-fashioned cupola upon the roof, and informed all Twickenham that it was time for the people at the Cedars to array themselves for the evening meal; but Maude still lay upon the sofa, hiding her flushed face in the pillows, and trying to quiet the throbbing in her burning head. What did it matter? The poor inexperienced girl broke down all at once in her social comedy. She could act the wearisome play no longer; she wanted to give up all her share in this world, and to go to bed and lie there quietly till she died. All the common business of life seemed unutterably loathsome to her—the dressing and the dining, the simpering small-talk, the finery of a grand house no longer honestly maintained. Oh that it could all be swept like the vision engendered out of some troubled slumber; giving place to a suburban cottage and a life of toil!

"I have seen girls—well-bred, good-looking girls, trudging in the muddy London streets, with music portfolios in their arms, while I have been out shopping in my carriage," she thought. "Oh, if I could only be like one of these, and work for papa, and see him happy, smiling at me across our little table as I gave him his dinner, and not brooding as he does now, hour after hour, hour after hour, in this grand drawing-room, with the same settled look of trouble on his face."

It was not only of late that Maude had watched her father anxiously and sadly. Very often during the year just past, and even in the year preceding that, the girl had been alarmed by Lionel Hillary's moody looks and long gloomy reveries, out of which it was his wont to rouse himself in a mechanical kind of way when strangers were present. But the merchant always gave the same explanation of his sombre looks. Those headaches, those constitutional headaches, which came upon him constantly through the fatigue and worry of business—those terrible headaches made an excuse for everything, and Maude's fears about her father related solely to his health. How should she understand the dismal diagnosis of commercial disease? How should she imagine that there was any limit to the fairy purse of Fortunatus, any chance of a blight in Aladdin's orchard of jewelled fruits?

The second dinner-bell rang, and there was no sign of the merchant's return. It had been a common thing lately for Lionel Hillary to keep his cook in a fever of vexation over the hot plates and furnaces, where the viands for the dinner banquet simmered and frizzled in their copper receptacles. Maude felt no special alarm about her father. Why should he hurry home to lengthen the long evening of brooding thought and care? Why should she wish him home: when, out of all the depth of her love and devotion, she could not conjure one word of comfort wherewith to greet him?

She was thinking thus, when the door was opened suddenly by an eager hand, and Mr. Hillary came into the room.

His daughter rose from the sofa, startled by the suddenness of his entrance. It is a small action, that of opening a door and entering a room: but there was as great a change in Mr. Hillary's performance of it as if twenty years had suddenly been lifted from his life.

"My darling!" he cried, taking his daughter in his arms, "it is you whom I have to thank. It was your doing, was it not?"

"What, papa?"

"The money—the twenty thousand pounds."

"Twenty thousand pounds!"

She thought the burning pain in her head had engendered some sudden delirium. She could not believe that this was her father's face, lighted by a hopeful smile, such as she had not seen upon it during the last three years.

"What twenty thousand pounds, papa?"

"The sum that has been placed to my credit to-day, anonymously. The bank people refused to tell me the name of my benefactor. I look to you, Maude, to solve the mystery. There is only one man whom I know of, rich enough to advance such a sum of money—young enough to do it in so Utopian a manner. There is only one man, Maude, and his name is Francis Tredethlyn. Tell me, my dear, have I guessed rightly?"

"You have, papa. Yes, I am sure you have. Poor fellow! and I was so angry with him last night. It was very good of him to do this, papa."

"Good of him!" cried the merchant—"good of him to lend twenty thousand pounds, without a halfpenny worth of security! Upon my word, Maude, it is good; and I can assure you it's a kind of goodness that is very uncommon in the City."

(To be continued.)

THACKERAY'S SCHOOL DAYS.

IT was when he was between the ages of thirteen and fifteen and a half or sixteen that I knew Thackeray best. He was then a rosy-faced boy with dark curling hair, and a quick, intelligent eye, ever twinking with humor, and good humor. He was stout and broad-set, and gave no promise of the stature which he afterwards reached. It was during a short but severe illness, just before he left school, that he grew rapidly, leaving his sick-bed certainly a good many inches taller than he was when he entered it, and heading at once nearly all his contemporaries. No man ever owed more of his mental growth to time and exercise, and less of his bodily stature.

For the usual schoolboy sports and games Thackeray had no taste or passion whatever, any more than in after life for those field sports which seem to have been the delight of his school-fellow and fellow humorist, Leech. Such amusements would have come, probably, next to Euclid and algebra in his list of dislikes. But he was by no means what a good many men of genius are said to have been in their youth—disposed to isolation or solitary musing. For a non-playing boy he was wonderfully social, full of vivacity and enjoyment of life. His happy insouciance was constant. Never was any lad at once so jovial, so healthy, and so sedentary. Good spirits and merriment seemed to enable him to dispense with the glow of cricket or foot-ball; and if in his still earlier days he ever "fagged out," it must have been most bitterly against his will. We were now and then, indeed, out together in small fishing parties, but it was for the talking, and the change, and the green fields, and the tea abroad instead of at home—cakes, etc., accompanying (for he was always rather gustative, never greedy)—that Thackeray liked these expeditions.

I have just now lying on the table beside me, in Thackeray's handwriting of some forty years ago—his handwriting was always beautiful—a little programme of "Bombastes Furioso," enacted by himself and some three or four of his schoolfellows, in which he took the part of Fusbos, and to the best of my recollection, did it very well; but the thing dropped through, and there were no repetitions; the rest had very little dramatic zeal. This was almost the only amusement in which I ever knew him to join, con amore. He had a passion for theatricals, of course kept under restraint at school, but now and then gratified when he visited friends in London, on the half-holidays.

There was also a little speaking club in which he would sometimes take part merely out of good nature, for he hated speaking then, and I do not believe he liked it much better afterwards.

He was eminently good-natured to all, especially the younger boys, and nothing of a tyrant or bully. Instead of a blow or a threat, I can just hear him saying to one of them, "Hooky," (a sobriquet of a son of the late Bishop Carr, of Bombay) "go up and fetch me a volume of Ivanhoe out of my drawer, that's a good fellow; in the same drawer you will, perhaps, find a penny, which you may take for yourself." The penny was, indeed, rather problematical, but still realized sufficiently often to produce excitement in the mind of the youth thus addressed, and to make the service a willing one. When disappointed, it was more than probable that the victim would call Thackeray a "great snob" for misleading him, a title for which the only vengeance would be a humorous and benignant smile. In the two or three years that I am recording, I scarcely ever saw Thackeray seriously angry, or even his brow wrinkled with a frown. He has been called a cynic; it is doubtful whether a real cynic could ever be manufactured out of a boy who had such powers as he had of sarcasm, and who used them so little unkindly. Nor is it to be believed, by those who knew him well, that, though in after life he had his eruptions of wrath, and moments of severity, after he had undergone the tremendously searching hot and cold ordeal of great trials and great triumphs, his nature was radically changed.

Thackeray had nearly all the materials that usually go to the making of a first-rate classical scholar. He had a wonderful memory, an absolute faculty of imitation, which might have been employed in following the great classic models of verse and prose; he had the power of acquiring language; and, it is needless to say, an intense admiration of the beautiful. He got to love his Horace, and was, no doubt, actually a better scholar than many of our first-rate writers of English; but he was not, and never pretended to be, a high classical scholar. I speak of the fact; none but a pedant would think of detracting from him on that ground: we have five hundred, five thousand high classical scholars, without getting a Thackeray out of them. "Son esprit était libre allure," as Lamartine says of one of his school friends. He had no school industry. One would be sorry to let any schoolboy read the long list of great literary men of whom the same might be said. Probably, too, as a younger boy he had been ill-grounded, and so lost confidence when he came to cope with those who had been better initiated, and gave up the race in which he thought he might fail, for he had plenty of pride and ambition. Not one of us would have given him credit for that "stalk of earl hemp" with which he met subsequent misfortunes and difficulties, and that firm and noble perseverance with which he worked his way gradually upwards, when the cheers of encouragement were comparatively faint and few. No one could in those early days have believed that there was much work in him, or that he would ever get to the top of any tree by hard climbing.

Thackeray, then, experienced the usual amount of nausea, and perhaps of difficulty, in making verses and translations, and was, at fourteen, more thankful, perhaps, than most boys are for a helping hand. I see now, on the back of one of his drawings, on the same sheet with a portion of an old exercise, this acknowledgment in intentional doggerel:

These verses were written by William Ewbank,
And him for his kindness I very much thank.

His exercise was, indeed, constantly left to the very last moment, while he was busy with a burlesque sketch of its subject, or deeply engaged in a volume of Shakspeare, Scott or Southey, from whom he took his real lessons, not from Chapman or Churton.

Though keenly ambitious, and very sensitive of failure, Thackeray was wonderfully free from anything like vanity or conceit. He had small confidence in his own powers, and was naturally inclined to rate himself below his mark. The better scholarship of many of his contemporaries may have had something to do with this. However, the want of confidence showed itself in many ways afterwards, and even at a time when his genius and his fame were at their full growth. For example, he was, even to the last, sensitive of blame, to a degree scarcely ever found in men satisfied of their own powers. Like other great but inwardly modest men, his first impulse was to overrate rather than underrate the ability of others, and he readily accorded the "clever fellow," uttered in perfect sincerity, though when he came to a thorough examination of their performance, he was keen critic enough. Not many years ago, he complained to me, with most earnest sincerity, of the poorness of his memory, when every book that he wrote was giving fresh proof of its retentiveness, and the readiness with which it recalled everything that he had read or seen—a faculty that gave him a power of varied allusion without cram, in which he seems to have only one rival among the writers of fiction of the present day. To his friends he talked freely of the difficulties he experienced in writing. His own final and great and deserved success, he never anticipated. Some years before the publication of Vanity Fair, he told me, while passing a day with me in the country, that he had a novel in his desk which, if published, would sell, he thought, to about seven hundred copies. Could this have been Vanity Fair? I rather think it must have been.

I dwell the more upon this point, because it appears to me to be a key to a certain characteristic of his writing, the construction of the non testis est, both as regards things in general and his own lucubrations upon them. His first sobriquet of "Michael Angelo Titmarsh" had a great deal of meaning for those who knew him well. His beau-ideal was serious and sublime; he was too familiar with, too much a master of, the humorous, to think as much about that mystery as his admirers did. I have heard him speak in terms of homage to the genius of Keats which he would not have vouchsafed to the whole tribe of humorists. But when he himself launched out of the playful into the serious, how often do we find him half "mocking himself and scorning his spirit," not for "smiling," but for the contrary. He seems to shrink from the idea of incurring the satire conveyed in these lines of Churchill:

When humor was thy province, for some crime
Pride struck thee with the frenzy of sublime.

And he descends quickly again to the humorous, were he fancied himself, though he was not, more at home.

Let me be pardoned for this excursion if I have struck upon a key which has been missed in the general criticisms on Thackeray, by those who knew little or nothing of his early character.

Men are reluctant enough—boys, perhaps, even more than men—to allow more than one forte to the same individual: all would have accorded two to Thackeray. First and foremost, his power of drawing, especially caricature; it was probably the high esteem in which this was held by his friends and school-fellows, that led him afterwards to think of the pencil as a resource before the pen. Leech, at Charter-house, was too much his junior to cope with him, and so he was facile princeps in drawing of an amusing kind; indeed, very much of his time was taken up with it. I have now in my possession a great number of his sketches and drawings, long carefully guarded in affectionate remembrance of those early days, when I little anticipated the fame of the draughtsman. It seems to me sometimes, as I look them over, that his power of drawing fell rather back as he advanced in authorship: at least, in his early drawings the types were much more varied—indeed, they seemed scarcely to have any limit.

From Homer, from Horace, from Scott's poems, from Cooper's novels, from an author he happened to have in hand, he found subject for fantastic and humorous illustrations; while we looked on, wondering at the quickness of his brain and fingers.

Thackeray was decidedly musical as a boy, and had a capital ear: but just as he disliked formal speaking, so it was his nature to shrink from the small amount of personal display involved in singing a song—i. e., after the age of self-consciousness. In short, he was highly nervous in all such matters, and could never, I think, in his earlier years, be made anything of as a small "show-child of genius." However, if a school-fellow hummed or whistled the air of one of his favorite songs, it would often set him embodying its subject.

There are very few, I believe, who have acted more faithfully up to what they thought and wrote than Thackeray did. Instances of the contrary in great writers are endless. I will take one: Goldsmith's Essays are an epitome of keen observation, sound common sense, and worldly wisdom; his life was full of imprudences and weakness. Though sadly swindled in early life, from too much generous confidence, Thackeray had great practical common sense; nor was the following use of the word by the deed easy in his case, for the conceptions of the just and the generous were of a heroic compass. One consequence, however, of this was, that every "break-down" of human nature striving after good, contributed rather to feed that rive la bagatelle feeling, to which other peculiarities of his mind also tended as I have endeavored to show elsewhere.

Thackeray had an intense dislike for anything like meanness, shabbiness, pretentiousness, or tyranny, and a very quick eye for discovering them; he had, too, just a smack of social pride, which led him afterwards, in his "Snob Papers," to deal rather hard measure not merely to snobs in heart and feeling, but to sheer imbecility, foolish dressing, and helpless ignorance of conventional manners and good breeding. This, however, he observed, never prevented him in his days of prosperity from holding out the hand of aid and fellowship to men his inferiors in what is usually called social position. Let me add that it was his high gentlemanlike feeling which, in spite of great natural love of ease, saved him from that lapse into a state of dependence into which a vast number of men of genius have been content to fall, which made him trust to himself, while he aided others, and wrestle with the dark angel of adversity till she brightened and blessed him.

A kindred accomplishment to that of caricaturing was his art of parody, afterwards brought to a climax in his imitations of eminent novelists. This, however, he practiced rarely, comparatively speaking. I subjoin what I believe to I have been about his earliest essay in that line; it has never been in print. He must have been about fourteen when it was written. The parody I copy from memory, for the original I have been obliged to refer to poor L. E. L.'s poems, who in those days wrote in the Literary Gazette, where I fancy Thackeray caught sight of the hues, and thought them over sentimentally:

VIOLETS.

VIOLETS! deep blue violets!
April's loveliest coronets:
There are no flowers grow in the vale,
Kissed by the sun, wooed by the gale,
None with the dew of the twilight wet,
So sweet as the deep blue violet.

I do remember how sweet a breath
Came with the azure light of a wreath,
That hung round the wild harp's golden chords
That rung to my dark-eyed lover's words;
I have seen that dear harp rolled
With gems of the East and bands of gold,
But it never was sweeter than when set
With leaves of the dark blue violet.

And when the grave shall open for me—
I care not how soon that time may be—
Never a rose shall blow on my tomb,
It breathes to much of hope and bloom;
But let me have there the meek regret
Of the bending and deep blue violet.

CABBAGES.

CABBAGES! bright green cabbages!
April's loveliest gifts, I guess,
There is not a plant in the garden laid,
Raised by the dung, dug by the spade,
None by the gardener watered, I ween,
So sweet as the cabbage, the cabbage green.

I do remember how sweet a smell
Came with the cabbage I loved so well,
Served up with the beef that beautiful looked—
The beef that the dark-eyed Ellen cooked.
I have seen beef served with radish of horse,
I have seen beef served with lettuce of Cos,
But it is far nicer, far nicer, I guess,
As bubble and squeak beef and cabbages.

And when the dinner-bell sounds for me—
I care not how soon that time may be—
Carrots shall never be served on my cloth;
They are far too sweet for a boy of my broth,
But let me there have a mighty mess
Of smoking hot beef and cabbages.

If the reader can bring to his mind and instance of biography in which the school-boy bon mots of a great man have been carefully recorded, he may blame me for not making here a record of Thackeray's. They have passed away with the hours which they enlivened, and the laughter, or more often the smiles, that they raised. He was, as may easily be believed, our great humorist, and touched most of our weak points good-naturedly and without offence. Nothing in character escaped him.

He was not, I think, in those days an inventor of stories: certainly I never knew him try his hand at a plot; this power was gained afterwards, and gradually, as must be very evident to those who have followed his works in their series. He was an omnivorous reader, that is of good English books; a trashy volume he would have thrown down in five minutes. His taste selected good books, and so his style was in a continual course of formation on good models. Memoirs, moralists like Addison and Goldsmith, and fiction and poetry from the best hands, were his favorites; but in those days he never worked in earnest at anything serious in the way of composition, or put his power to the stretch in any way. Extract from an article in Once a Week.

TAKING A CUP TOO MUCH.—A certain charming lady, called Mlle. Charlotte, who gives the most delightful supper parties in Vienna, was about to retire, one night, when her maid entered her room in great consternation, telling her that a theft had been committed in the house. Mlle. Charlotte, much alarmed, asked what had been stolen. "A teacup," was the reply. The mistress laughed, and said that most likely the maid had broken it. The latter persisted that this was not the case, and on being further pressed, owned that she had seen a certain M. de — put it in his pocket! A moment's reflection revealed to the fair supper-giver the nature of this strange robbery. M. de — was one of her most ardent admirers, and the cup, by one of the many new appliances of photography, was ornamented with the owner's portrait! It is needless to say that the thief was not prosecuted.

SOLITUDE, though silent as light, is, like the light, the mightiest of agencies; for solitude is essential to man. All men come into this world alone; all leave it alone. Even a little child has a dread, whispering consciousness that if he should be summoned into God's presence no gentle nurse will be allowed to lead him by the hand, nor mother to carry him in her arms, nor little sister to share his trepidations. King and priest, warrior and maiden, philosopher and child, all must walk those mighty galleries alone. The solitude, therefore, which in this world appals or fascinates a child's heart is but the echo of a far deeper solitude through which he has already passed, and of another solitude deeper still, through which he has to pass; reflex of one solitude—prefiguration of another.—De Quincy.

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

All kinds of JOB PRINTING done with neatness and despatch, at reasonable rates.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1865.

LIBEL SUITS.

IT is seldom, probably, that a day passes in a newspaper office without some man rushing in with a grievance done him by a neighbor which he wishes made public, or the story of a wrong which he desires to have redressed in print. The general impression seems to be that a paragraph acts as an alleviating plaster on the woes of the aggrieved and as an intolerable blister on the back of the aggressor, and that there is no way in the world to get even with the man who has kicked you down stairs or swindled you in business like persuading an editor to put him in print. Here we have an acknowledgment of the power of the press eminently gratifying to those connected with it, but a nuisance as well which is at times excessively annoying. The multitude cannot be made properly to understand that it is no part of a newspaper's business to publish to the world that John Smith trod upon the toes of Thomas Jones without cause or provocation, or that Bridget Mullony sold a pint of peanuts, which proved utterly rotten and worthless, to Widow Callahan's little boy. Men of the world, sensible men, when they find that a disadvantage has been taken of them by others, and that there is considerable doubt whether or not legal redress can be obtained, quietly pocket the loss or swallow the injury—and endeavor to get even the first convenient opportunity. Fools, under similar circumstances, either go to law or to a newspaper office—and if in the latter place they meet with fellows—by fellows we mean generous and impulsive editors—the thing is done, and the path to a libel suit opened up at once.

A case has lately been decided in the Twelfth District Court which admirably illustrates the point we wish to make. Several confiding gentlemen were induced to purchase mining stock at prices varying from $30 to $150 a share, under the impression—an impression confirmed by the vendor, that in a very short time it would go to at least $1,000. On the contrary, however, it went down with that rapidity which is only equalled by the descent of a kite when its tail gives out, and never stopped until it reached a value somewhat less than nothing. One or two of the gentlemen who bought went to the Bulletin and told how they had been duped and swindled. The case was clear enough; and that generous, warm, uncalculating sheet rushed into the arena in defence of its friends with that unhesitating glow of good feeling that has always distinguished it. The world was made acquainted with "The story of a promising mine and what came of it," and everybody laughed and declared that a more readable article had not appeared in the columns of any city paper for a long time. But the man at whose expense the story was told did not admire it much, and took legal issue with the Bulletin, not upon its literary merit, but as regarded the right of the publishers to tell a story, wherein he appeared as hero, without first consulting him. He thought that he should have been consulted in the premises, and was so fortunate as to find twelve men who agreed with him in opinion, the result being a verdict in his favor of damages to the amount of $7,500.

This verdict has been variously received by the public; some thinking it unjust, while others endorse it to the full. As one of the newspaper guild, we should, perhaps, side wholly with the defendant in this matter, but our ideas of what newspapers have and have not a right to publish have always been rather peculiar. We are in favor of seeing the libel lines drawn pretty closely and tightly. Where the public service is concerned, where public interests are at stake, it is the duty of the press to speak out like the great Netherlands bell, of which Motley tells us, which was tolled whenever the State was in danger; but with private affairs it has nothing to do. If a man be appointed to office who is unworthy, let the appointment be denounced and protested against—let the public good be subserved on all occasions. But with private business transactions the press has legitimately nothing to do. There are some thousands of men in this city engaged in the arduous occupation of seeing which can cheat the other, and sometimes the game goes fluctuating, now turning to the advantage of this man and again of that. A leader on each one of the mining transactions, where one party has lost or some one has been swindled, would necessitate twenty editorials a day, to the utter exclusion of news and advertisements. It were well enough, when a story came like that which filled the Bulletin's sensitive ears, to speak in a general way; advising the people to buy shares in no mine they had not seen and to be very careful even if they had; telling them that sharpers were on the constant lookout for soft snaps and were sometimes so temerarious as to tackle hard ones; that cases every day occurred where men were ruined by their ventures, and imploring every one to look before he leaped, if leap he must. Further than this we do not think the Bulletin had a right to go. It had not been swindled and had no wrongs to redress—consequently it meddled with something which was scarcely its business. If a palpable fraud had been perpetrated, the law offered its aid, and if it could not be made clear to a jury that fraud had been practiced, how was it to be demonstrated to a newspaper? The public were not concerned, and no bulkhead interests or widening of streets were at stake. In short, no newspaper has a right and is not called upon to hold up any man before its readers as a swindler, without at least consulting him and hearing what he had to say in his defence. The contrary practice, however, has prevailed in this city to an almost unlimited extent; and we are not at all sorry to notice in the result of a late trial that the day for that species of journalism is well nigh done.

THE STEAMSHIP PIONEERS.

ON the morning of the 28th day of February, 1849, the steamer California came to anchor in this port—the first steamship to ruffle with its wheels the waters of our beautiful Bay. She brought 400 passengers, principally from Panama, but many of them picked up at various points along the coast; for in those days the rush was for California, and people starting from Eastern shores got as near to it as possible, trusting to Providence, canoes, or some other chance to bring them the balance of the way. The California herself, however, made the perilous passage of the Horn, tossing the smoke from her black pipes to mingle with the pale Magellan clouds and astonishing the Patagonians with the fires that flashed from her decks across the darkness of the southern nights.

It may be taken for granted that the California was crowded on the passage up, for her dimensions by no means equalled those of the magnificent ships which have replaced her. But the remnant of the four hundred could find passage back on her comfortably enough, for sixteen years have rolled their round since then; many of the number have been called to make a voyage to the shores of that distant sea from which there is no return, and others have been scattered by the freaks of fortune and the vagaries of fate until now scarce a corporal's guard can be mustered to the annual celebration of the anniversary of their landing. For it has been the custom of these steamship pioneers for the past eight years to gather together on the evening of each 28th day of February, dine in company, recall reminiscences of the past, and travel their memorable trip on the California to California over again. Though known by the generic name of Steamship Pioneers it would scarcely be correct to band these veterans together as a Society, for their meetings are informal, the result of a mutual understanding, and not compelled by any rules or by-laws, and they occur only annually. One year one steamship pioneer claims the privilege of entertaining his fellows, the next year another insists upon being host, and so the regular round is kept up like the signal torch of the feudal times, by being passed from hand to hand. Each year, however, the circle narrows down; and the day is not very far distant, perhaps, when the last of the number will sit down to his lone dinner in solitary grandeur, with none to clink glass with his or exchange words of kindly greeting. Last year Alexander Austin, our well-known pioneer drygoods man, gave the dinner: this year it fell to the privilege of H. F. Williams, Secretary of the Society if Society it can be called—to furnish the entertainment.

It was given at Gamba's. Only seven who rightfully belonged there were present: Dr. A. B. Stout, President of the Society, who came around the Horn in the California as surgeon to the ship; H. F. Williams, Secretary and Macenas of the evening; Hon. H. E. Robinson; Rev. C. C. Wheeler; Alexander Austin; Capt. A. Jones Jackson, and Edward Tichenor. It must by no means be supposed, however, that all the balance of the band are to be counted among the dead. Eugene L. Sullivan was prevented from attending by business engagements in the interior; some of the number are in Europe, some are astonishing the natives of a green-back country with glimpses of the gold they have gathered hereaway: some are in one place, and some in another—but none, we believe, are in San Quentin. Of invited guests there were present, Col. L. D. Stevenson, who as a pioneer can discount even the steamship pioneers; Gov. H. P. Burnett; Abel Stearns; E. V. Sutter, son of the general of that name, who as a pioneer can discount Col. Stevenson; Mr. Winous, President of the pioneers who came out here the best way they could; Capt. W. F. Thompson, who commanded the Falcon, the first ship that sailed from New York for these shores; Dr. Gerry, and C. H. Webb. An introduction of the guests to Mr. Williams, as their host of the evening, was made by Dr. Stout: a blessing was pronounced by the Rev. Mr. Wheeler, and the party sat down to a most generous entertainment. The only trouble was that the bill of fare was printed in French, and this occasionally got our pioneers, for very few of them travel on their acquaintance with that language. Mr. Austin, however, being well versed in its mysteries and a native Parisian, acted the part of translator for those who desired one, though the majority were content to rest in the assurance that nothing was there but what was good, throwing the burden of selection upon the waiters. Each guest had a bouquet at his right hand—and the wine had a bouquet as well. Sociality was the order of the evening. The contrast between the fare then enjoyed and that spread before them on the up-trip they celebrated, was forcibly and humorously drawn. Allusion was made, too, to the advantage they now had in the point of elbow-room to what was afforded them on the crowded California—but the thought that each year this elbow-room increased checked much mirth in that direction. The roll was read by the Secretary, and against the names of those who had gone to join the innumerable caravan during the year, the sad word "dead" was written. One was reminded of the non respondat of the old Roman legions when the muster-roll was called after battle. Remarks, full of interesting reminiscences, were made by both the pioneers and those among the invited guests who were authorized by fellowship as early comers, and an occasional "speech" was volunteered by indiscreet ones who did not consider the fact of their not being invited guests any bar to their taking and keeping the floor. Well in the morning the "party," with its social amenities, broke up, and the guests went their several ways to dream of the days of '49, and pray that none of the number might be missed from the social board when next the 28th of February comes around.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

ON Monday night the Hunchback was put upon the Opera House stage, Miss Heron appearing as "Julia." The play scarcely affords her scope for that breadth and power of delineation wherein she excels, nor does the character furnish her opportunity for the wild sweeps and gusts of passion which she so well portrays. On Tuesday evening she appeared in Gamea and The Homecoming for the benefit of the State Guard, to a crowded house, winning enthusiastic applause. As "Juliana" she satisfied not only the audience, but also, a more difficult task still with an artist, herself. Wednesday evening witnessed the production of Edith or The Earl's Daughter. The plot of this play is borrowed from East Lynne, but the names are changed and the text is not identical with that of the novel. Miss Heron's "Edith" is Miss Bradon's Lady Isabel. The story is an exciting and thrilling one, and of course the play is equally exciting. The misery and remorse of the erring and suffering wife were excellently portrayed, and the transformation into "Madam Vine" was startling in its effectiveness. Edith was repeated Thursday evening; Friday evening Fazio was put upon the stage, Miss Heron of course as "Bianca;" to-night she will appear in her great character of "Camille"—really her best part. Monday and Tuesday evenings of next week Gamea will be given. There is the usual afternoon performance at the Opera House this afternoon.

Owing to no connecting steamer at Aspinwall, the departure of Birch, Backus and Shattuck is postponed for ten days, and they will appear during this time at the Academy of Music in conjunction with the newly-organized minstrel troupe, consisting of Geo. H. Coes, A. J. Talbot, J. B. Howe, P. Loomis and J. H. O'Neil. The benefits with which the minstrels have preluded their departure have proved immensely successful, and they will go East, as Birch would say, "healthy in the pocket." We wonder whether Manager Magnire would have an equally crowded house were a benefit announced for him, and whether the public ever think to whom they are really indebted for their entertainment and one of the handsomest theatres on the continent. Whether profit or loss accrue to him, still his engagements go on, and still his people draw their salaries with unfailing regularity. Very few actors of note visit America without his managing that our public shall see and hear them at their own doors. It was wholly owing to him that we had the Keans, and therefore few managers anywhere that would have dared take the financial risk he did in securing them. Some day, perhaps, the theatre-goers of San Francisco will come to understand to whom they are really indebted for their amusement.

Cold winds, hail and frost have made San Francisco feel their presence during the week. Such a general shivering, grumbling and exchanging notes as to the thickness of the ice in various parts of town had not been known for years. Carrying a red nose does not carry conviction of intemperance, this weather. Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath an empty wood-shed? Be on the alert, philanthropists! for while it is well to receive Jack Frost as good-naturedly as possible, let us not forget that there are thousands of families in this (individually) wealthy city who find it very difficult to give him a warm reception.

AT THE BALL.

IS the ball very stupid, ma mignonne?
Pauvre petite! you look ennuied to death—
There is Bête-n'est-ce pas? in your eye,
And a soupçon of yawn in your breath.

Of a truth, it is stupid, ma mignonne;
The giver is wrinkled and gray!
The dances are older than Rome,
And the dancers as well are passé.

The wine that they give us, ma mignonne,
Is but vin ordinaire, thin and poor—
It comes from a shop in Rue Jacques,
And it costs but ten sous, I am sure.

There's a ghost stirring somewhere, ma mignonne;
The lamps all burn dimly and low,
And the music would do for la Morgue—
Allons? . . . Not quite yet. . . . I won't go.

Come, sit on this fauteuil, ma mignonne,
And show me the make of that glove:
It is Jouvin, I think . . . Now you're wicked,
Reste tranquille un moment; that's a love!

Who called the ball stupid, ma mignonne?
'Tis the best we have had for a week;
The dances are lively enough,
And for music—j'attends, please to speak!

One glass à ta santé, ma mignonne;
On the rim of my cup print a kiss—
Never tell me again of Bordeaux;
There's no red wine in life like to this!

Who said lamps burned dimly, ma mignonne?
Look! the salon is brighter than day—
It was queer to find fault with the light;
Not enough! there's too much, verité.

At what time did ta maman, ma mignonne,
Suggest that the carriage should call?
Sainte Vierge! it is striking the hour—
Do you wish to go home from the ball?

C. H. WEBB.

MEG MERRILLIANA.

A DECLARATION OF FIRST LOVE.

I HAVE an exceeding great affection for the fair-haired Liliputian who carries THE CALIFORNIAN;—(the best carrier it ever had, by the way, since he does not keep one waiting two-thirds of the day for its arrival)—said weakness on my part being identical in date with that which witnessed my appearance before the public as the author of a certain non-intercepted letter. On hearing his plaintive voice at the hall door, on that memorable occasion, I rushed wildly down stairs—to the astonishment and alarm of Bridget, whose feelings were strikingly depicted upon her classical and expressive features—with the desperate determination of asking him in to take a drink; such being, as a friend of mine who knows, informs me, the invariable rule among modern authors. Unfortunately, I was too late to catch more than a parting glimpse of a very short hat and abbreviated coat-tail disappearing 'round the nearest street-corner; so I gave him my blessing, mentally, swallowed the disappointment in lieu of the wine, and, assuming a masculine and consequently very thoughtful demeanor, walked into my room and THE CALIFORNIAN, by way of ascertaining how I looked in print. That I was not very well satisfied may be inferred by my second appearance in these columns.

NOT TO BE DISCOURAGED.

I remembered reading several years ago—and perhaps, some of your readers during their literary perambulations may have met with the same—a very vigorous, terse and moral little poem, commencing:

"'Tis a lesson you should heed,
Try, try again;
If at first you don't succeed,
Try, try again!"

It made a great impression on me at the time. It does now. So much so, that I never listen to its melodious measure, without that same delicious and indescribable thrill which one experiences upon hearing the sharp, sudden stroke upon a slate of a very jagged, multitudinous-pointed pencil.

I took its precepts very much to heart; and I think by continuing to do so, and following them up occasionally, I will become a second Dickens, or—who is the best writer for THE CALIFORNIAN?

AN OPEN CONFESSION.

I have a confession to make. Confession, they tell us, is good for the soul, and I don't doubt it; especially when you are confessing the faults of your neighbors. I have become sadly addicted, of late, to the street-cars. It is a horrible habit, I know—only equalled by those which the ladies drag through the streets, during this dirty weather; but then I am influenced by a very laudable motive, which is nothing less than the study of phrenology, physiognomy, and human nature generally.

It serves to amuse one, too; and is infinitely better than going to the theatre to cry one's eyes out, and blow one's nose into a state of distracting inflammation over counterfeited sorrows in some play wherein everybody dies and nobody is miserable—I mean nobody dies, and everybody is miserable—bah! I can't get it right, and would defy any one else to, so long as that piau keeps up its drum-drum-drumming, next door. I wish the Camanche were anchored off our yard for about five minutes, and I was her "Cap'n."

I'd have a neat little bullet from one of those Deringers she carries plumped right through the corner of the room occupied by that infernal instrument; and if that didn't make sharp work with the notes, why, I'd be content to let them pursue the natural tenor of their way, thenceforth. As it is, it's a downright double base outrage upon the peace of the neighborhood; and that's flat!

ABOUT THE STREET CARS.

But I was speaking of street-cars and confessions, and the valuable information respecting the characters and dispositions of our fellow-citizens generally, to be derived therefrom. I don't mean from confessions, (Heaven preserve me from ever turning father or mother confessor to any one—having sins enough of my own to answer for, without being burdened with those of other people!)—but from those very convenient vehicles first mentioned, and by close observation of your fellow-sufferers—passengers, I should say—both masculine, feminine and neuter.

To make my meaning clear, my very dear reader, won't you jump in this approaching car with me, and ride to its North Beach terminus? Observe, first, with what a graceful and majestic sweep of the hand the moustached and be-"Jocky-Club"-ed Conductor motions you to the opposite corner of the street, as the only point whereat the obliging conveyance could possibly stop for you. Of course, he does not perceive that, whereas our present position is in all respects a desirable one, the other to which we are motioned, is a standing pool of mud and water, and that not having adopted the—upon such occasions—very desirable bloomer-costume, neither being apparelled in our liege lord's unwhisperables, we must, perforce, sacrifice something of the immaculate neatness of our attire at the very outset of our excursion. However, with a harmless feminine oath, uttered sotto voce, we step upon the platform, and—carefully, my friend! evidently you are unaccustomed to this species of locomotion. Don't you know they never wait for one to be seated?—and that if you do not balance your step by the motion of the car you are bound to be precipitated into the lap or arms of some unfortunate individual near by?—just as you were into those of the obese, little old gentleman who was evidently settling himself for a nice, comfortable, five-minutes' nap. How unpleasant of you to disturb him! Stop, though; let me have a look at him. Short in stature, standing much in need of advice from Dr. Banting; face of a brilliant tint, approaching Solferino; mouth small, nose ditto, eyes ditto-er. That bald head with its side fringes of white hair is, doubtless, very venerable; but veneration in him, together with all the higher "moral faculties," as you will observe, is sadly deficient. I didn't envy you the look he gave you from under those heavy brows when you disturbed him by the manner of your entrance, although he covered it with a beaming smile, than which nothing could be more charming. I do not like that way he has of rubbing his soft white hands, continually, one over the other. In fact, though at first sight he appears such a dear, innocent, good-hearted old fellow, I don't like him, and am not a bit sorry that you discomforted him by rendering him a temporary stumbling block; for, if I'm not very much mistaken, he has been a stumbling block in the way of many people of more worth than himself, before now.

Some one has said that fat people are never ill-tempered—seldom if ever wicked; in a word, that vice and obesity are sworn enemies. I don't believe a word of it. Persons grow fat for the same reason that they grow lean, because they can't help it. It's a way they have, and temper has nothing to do with it. Your two-hundred-pounders may, perhaps, never fly into a passion, because they are physically incapable of the exertion; but for a quiet, persistent, malicious, most-provoking-of-all tempers they can beat Pharaoh's "lean kine" all hollow. As for the rest, I think they come in for a full share of the vices "which flesh is heir to;" their consciences, as I have learned by personal experience, being much like their waistbands—capable of great expansion, and fully as often called upon to exercise their yielding capacity.

I like that lady on the opposite seat much better. Now don't toss your head contemptuously, at my having called her a lady, although she is plainly dressed, and her fingers are less white and soft than those of our fat friend yonder—unlike his, also, in their total want of diamond hoops. She wears her diamonds, and they are of the "first water," in her heart, my friend. Her face is expressive of patient suffering, of perfect health, of clear, honest, upright purpose. I'd trust that woman to the uttermost ends of the earth. She is as pure and free from guile as the darling little golden-haired child she carries in her arms.

Whom have we here? A party of fine looking, dashing, well-dressed women, talking dry-goods and milliners. Pass them over; there is nothing of them but their clothes.

And this young girl, who is just entering, and who is evidently no stranger to the conductor? Beautiful as an houri, (what lovely girls there are in San Francisco!) attired in the "latest style"—which is at once pretty, jaunty and picturesque. But how rudely she conducts herself; with what an unfaltering stare she returns the glance of her fellow-passengers. Ah, my child, you are very fair, very youthful, very vain and froward. God pity and protect you!

If I were a young man, and wanted a wife, I'd make love to that young lady in the far corner of the car. She is just pretty enough to be pleasing—with that peculiar kind of face which grows fairer to our eyes the oftener we behold it; she is neatly apparelled, in a costume which suggests the idea of perfect fitness and harmony, is quiet and modest in demeanor, and evidently a dear, sweet, sensible girl, who has been well brought up by a good mother, and will never do injustice to her teachings.

But do look here! Tripping daintily across the street, balancing his light walking stick in his gloved fingers—a perfect walking advertisement of his tailor—comes an individual who, I think, falls properly under the designation of neuter. For he is not a man, most certainly, though in masculine form he appeareth; and woman he is not—or I forswear my sex. Enter Dandy: parts coat-tails carefully before sitting down, adjusts moustache, and leisurely raising his gold-rimmed eye-glass, coolly proceeds to the inspection of the company, dwelling longest upon the face of the young lady in the far corner. Evidently he is amused at the indignant flushing of her face at finding herself the object of his prolonged scrutiny; for he turns away with an impudent smile which says, just as plainly as words, "Chawming assumption of modesty; aw—weally quite we-fweshing, you know!" Confound the fellow—I'd like to chuck him out of the car!

Ring, ring! what, still another passenger? Why, we are full now! No, we are not; it's one of Uncle Sam's boys, and there is always room for our soldiers.

Carefully, conductor; don't you see the man is crippled? Help him in, and here is a seat for him.

Did you see how Dandy gathered up his coat-tails, for fear of their coming in contact with the soiled dress of the soldier? Why, yon atrocious little jackanapes, don't you know that one square inch of that old blue coat, worn and faded as it is, is worth ten times more—ay! a thousand times more—than the whole of your broadcloth suit, with the Dummy which it contains thrown in!

In proof of which, instinct as well as reason comes to my aid; for just look at that little "Golden Hair" whom we imagined fast asleep in her mother's arms. She has crept softly down from her parent's knee and toddled along to the soldier's side, putting her round, dimpled hand in his, and looking up half-timidly, but wholly loving into his face. Dear little baby! I am almost certain that some strong, stalwart arms have gathered you lovingly to a heart which throbbed beneath a coat like that, and, giving you a father's last fond kiss, commended you, in the agony of the parting moment, to the God of Battles and of Right! It's no use talking, friend: I never see one of our returned soldiers, but I feel like going up and giving him my hand as freely as does that little child. But, dear me, here we are at the "terminus." North Beach is not so bad a place, after all. How grand the Bay looks with its white waves dashing on the shore, and stern old Alcatraz yonder, standing like a tried and faithful sentinel keeping watch and ward over the hidden treasures of the deep. Confess, now, we've had a pleasant ride. I would like to say something about those gentlemen on the platform—especially that fine, manly young fellow who helped the lame soldier to alight, and slipped an apple into little "Golden Hair's" hand when she passed him. He's a "good boy," whoever he is.

Monsieur Dandy, I perceive, has gone into the bathing establishment. I hope he'll get half-choked with salt water.

Good-by, my friend, I'm off for a ramble along the beach! but when you take another ride in the cars, and desire a companion by the way, just call on

MEG MERRILL.

SOMETHING IN NAMES.—The Philadelphia Transcript of Jan. 29th publishes an extract from an article which appeared in THE CALIFORNIAN of Nov. 26th, over the signature of INIGO, as a "moral essay" sent to that paper by "Harding, the Confidence Man, alias William the Whistler." The "essay" being purely a local one, it is rather remarkable that "William the Whistler" had not stolen something better adapted to the latitude and longitude of the oil wells. The fact that both preface and story are taken bodily from these columns shows that the enterprising Whistler is not in the habit of doing things by halves, and our Philadelphia cotemporary proves the admirable adaptation in its case of name to character, in this as in several other instances, by furnishing its readers a perfect "transcript," while its contributor fully establishes his claim to the sobriquet of "Confidence Man" by claiming the production of another as his own.

THE DAVENPORT BROTHERS EXPOSED.

ANY person witnessing an ordinary conjuring trick for the first time, will probably find himself so baffled by the rapidity of the performance as to be unable to give any explanation of it; it is precisely the same with the spectators of the Davenports' exploits. But when the tricks of the Davenports or any juggler are watched time after time, and the peculiarities and short-comings noted, it is then only that a tolerable explanation can be arrived at, if the tricks are not positively seen. The following brief account gives a narrative of the information gained by repeated visits to the Davenports' séances, a rigid examination of the cabinet, and one or two things really seen:

The performance is divided into two parts, totally different in themselves, although the lecturer attached to the Brothers strives to his utmost to make them appear alike. The first part is where the Brothers are tied in the cabinet, by some uninterested party from among the audience; and the second part where the Brothers are tied in the cabinet, by themselves or by spirits, or by "preternatural philosophy." The performance under the last condition is quite unlike the first-mentioned. The next point is, that the construction and arrangement of the cabinet should be well understood. If the manifestations were really straightforward, and no duplicity necessary, two doors would be sufficient for this thing, but the peculiar nature of the manifestations require three; if there were no tricks to be found out, these three doors might all fasten from the outside, but the tricks make it convenient to fasten the two outer ones from the inside, and the middle door only on the outside. It will be seen from this that should any hitch unfortunately occur, the middle door being opened first from the outside, the party opening the case (generally the lecturer) will then thrust his hand in to open the two side doors from the inside—a convenient design for giving a minute or two for the performers to settle themselves or for the lecturer to rectify any shortcomings.

Keeping to the cabinet, a mysterious bar runs across the middle, on the level of the Davenports' knees. To a person examining the case before the exhibition began, it would not be at all clear what this bar was for; but in the second part of the performance, the Brothers are invariably tied by the legs to it. One might think this was what the bar was inserted for; but it really answers a far more useful purpose, viz., to take the part of the bow when the guitar is played, for be it noted the guitar is never fingered, but always performed upon as a violin. This will be explained directly.

The cabinet is so made, without glue or screws, that it takes to pieces very readily, so that it may be packed up in a box. This is extremely useful to the Brothers, inasmuch as the seats are fastened to the back and front by small tenons, slipping into mortice holes. These holes are shallow of necessity, as the cabinet is so very slight (made only to exclude the light.) We now come to various holes drilled into the seat, to run the ropes through; by this cunning trick the Brothers can only be bound to the seats, and not to the cabinet, for, on a slight pressure being applied from the inside to the back of the cabinet, the seats are immediately disengaged (this thrust is generally applied by the lecturer when he puts his arms in, as he always does just before he shuts the middle door;) the Brothers can then stand up with the seats bound to them, and move about the case, and then, bound as they are, they pick the instruments up in their mouhls, and one shakes the bell or tambourine, while the other scrapes the guitar on the bar (generally with one hand.) This accounts for the imperfection of the music; on the signal being given, the Brothers sit down again, and shuffle the tenons into the mortice holes; of course, the instant the doors are opened the Brothers are found bound hand and foot to the seats, apparently just as they were left; and at the moment the middle door is opened, and the light turned on, out flies the tambourine and bell, propelled by a dexterous jerk from the Brothers' mouhls. It will be seen that sealing the knots, filling the Brothers' hands with flour, etc., makes no difference, as the knots are never untied at all during the concert.

The above description principally applies to the first part of the performance. When the Brothers are tied by strangers, it always happens that a considerable time elapses before they are untied, sometimes six or eight minutes; but when they tie themselves, as soon as the doors are shut the music begins, for the simple reason that knowing the trick of tying they can readily disengage a hand to ring the bell or shake a tambourine, or to slip a hand through the opening in the middle door. The lecturer is always very emphatic in saying that in the position the Brothers are bound, they cannot reach the opening: but when the seats can be disengaged and as readily slipped into the mortice holes again, this truism falls to the ground. In the first part, again, six or eight minutes frequently elapse before the hand appears out of the opening; but when they tie themselves, no sooner is the middle door shut (after some haggling with the side doors) than the hand is thrust out; this hand is always the one that is nearest to the back of the case when the Brothers are sitting, and without doubt that is where the artful knot is that can be so readily untied after they have bound themselves. When a troublesome spectator is present, and he insists on opening the door as suddenly as the case will permit, the guitar does not play—that is too difficult under the circumstances; but the tambourine and bell do, for this simple reason, that when the Brothers are bound, the seat is so placed, that they can only possibly be tied up in a certain manner, and that admits of their stooping as they sit and picking up the two instruments mentioned in their mouths. These they shake about till the rickety door is about to open; and on the instant of the opening they jerk them from their mouths, while the guitar is stationary at the bottom. This instrument is seldom thrown out. When it is, it is thrown from one of the hands nearest the back of the case, that can be readily slipped into a complicated coil of rope. It is never thrown out but on one occasion—that is, after they have tied themselves and understand the knots. It can be observed that when the tambourine is thrown from the right compartment, the lecturer opens the right door the last of the three, so as to give this Brother a minute more time. These statements have more value than mere speculations or surmises, as they have been positively seen; and by taking a seat so as to get an oblique view of the structure, they can be seen by any other spectator.

Neither is the coat trick a feat of extreme difficulty if two or three minutes are given. The Brothers tie themselves, and the ropes are examined. As soon as the doors are shut the Brother loosens the seat, stands up and slips all off, including seat, for in this as in other tricks, there is a great advantage in having two in the cabinet, for if one gets undone first he soon gets the other out of any difficulty. On one occasion a gentleman who tied one of the Brothers caught the hand just as it was going back, and held it for three or four minutes, but he could not expose the performer inside, as he could only just reach the opening at a stretch, and could not with his left hand undo the door; besides he had the Professor hovering unpleasantly near him all the time.

One word in conclusion, suggesting how the best half of the manifestations could be put an end to. This could be done if some one among the audience would insist on tying the Brothers' heads back to the ends of the case, or by tying their mouths effectually up. As the cabinet is at present constructed, however, it is not clear how this could be readily done, and the Professor constantly ignores all suggestions likely to mar the prompt execution of the "manifestations." In the meanwhile the above facts regarding the Brothers may be of some value to the uninitiated, gathered as they are from repeated observations of the performers and personal examination of the cabinet.—Once a Week.

EFFECTS OF CHLOROFORM.—The last volume of "Transactions" issued by the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society contains the elaborate report of a committee of the society appointed "to inquire into the uses and the physiological, therapeutical, and toxical effects of chloroform, as well as the best mode of administering it and of obviating any ill consequences resulting from its administration." The report is accompanied by many details exhibited in a tabular form. The following are the "Physiological Conclusions:" "Chloroform at first increases the force of the heart's action; this effect is slight and transient. When complete anaesthesia is produced by chloroform the heart in all cases acts with less than its natural force. The strongest doses of chloroform vapor, when admitted freely into the lungs, destroy animal life by arresting the action of the heart. By moderate doses of chloroform the heart's action is much weakened for some time before death ensues: respiration generally, but not invariably, ceases before the action of the heart, and death is due both to the failure of the heart's action and to that of the respiratory function. The danger attending the use of chloroform increases with the degree of stupor it induces. Apparent irregularities in the action of chloroform mainly depend on the varying strength of the vapors employed, on the quality of the chloroform, and on the constitution of the patient." The committee state that the results of 2,586 capital operations performed before, and of 1847 performed since, the introduction of anaesthetics, collected from all authentic available sources, show that anaesthetics have in no degree increased the rate of mortality.

FOLLOWING THE DRUM.—The New York Review says the prevailing modes for ladies were never so bizarre and brilliant as now; and the sudden irruption of crimson, yellow, blue, green and scarlet, gold braid and buttons, can only be traced to the effect of the prevailing military spirit of the country. Our gay Zouave and Chasseur uniforms have produced a sort of contagious fever for bright colors and singular patterns, which has at once seized upon the sex, with which dress is an important consideration. And this military origin of the fashion further shows itself in the actual insignia of the soldier, which are complacently adopted by the ladies. Chevrons, army buttons, corps' badges, etc., are now a standard portion of the modiste's wares; and if the rage continues, we may expect to see our wives and daughters actually wearing swords and carrying cartridge-boxes.

PERVERTED INGENUITY.

IT is lamentable to think how many instances of remarkable and even wonderful ingenuity, misapplied to useless and in many cases ridiculous purposes, are found in the history of the mechanic arts, and how much more advanced might have been the civilization of the world had that ingenuity been devoted to the obtainment of useful results.

The great aim of the earlier mechanicians seems to have been to inspire a feeling of wonder, for some of the earliest Greek historians have left us accounts of wonderful statues, which imitated the various movements of living beings; some centuries later, Archytas of Tarentum, who flourished about four hundred years before the commencement of the Christian era, added to his renown as a truly wise man and a great mathematician the reputation of having constructed a wooden pigeon, which was "animated by a concealed spirit," and could fly; and Archimedes, who is considered the greatest of the earlier mechanicians, has also the reputation of having constructed similar automata, but of these we have no particular account. Descending to comparatively modern times, we find that a water-clock was presented Charlemagne by Haroun al Raschid, in the dial-plate of which there were twelve small doors, corresponding to the hours, which doors were opened to allow of the egress of twelve little knights on horseback, who struck the hours upon a brazen bell. A few centuries later, Albert, Bishop of Ratisbon, spent thirty years in constructing a human figure, which advanced to a door when any knocked, opened it and saluted the visitor. Subsequently John Muller made a wooden eagle, which is reported to have flown to meet the Emperor Maximilian when he arrived at Nuremberg, on June 7th, 1470. After saluting him like a good loyal subject, the sagacious bird flew back to the gate of the city, and perching upon it waited the Emperor's approach, stretching out its wings and making other signs of welcome. Of about the same date we have accounts of an iron-fly and a crawling steel-spider. At a still later period chemistry was called to the aid of mechanism in producing those wonderful imitations of animals; for it is related of the peacock of Vergennes and the duck of Vaucanson, that not only were both externally perfect imitations of nature—one walking about and picking up grains of corn, and the other muddling in the water, eating, drinking, and crying "quack! quack!" but they actually laid eggs for their fortunate owner. The last mentioned inventor also constructed automatic-players of musical instruments; and according to his own account of his flageolet-player, the pressure of air required for the highest note was fifty-six pounds, and that for the lowest only a single ounce! Since the date of these last mentioned inventions, we have had accounts of an automaton which drew human figures and other objects, another which performed wonderful feats of "ground and lofty" tumbling; and there are still in existence miniature-birds, which not only hop from branch to branch of a tree, but warble like the feathered tenants of the woods.

We have now become so familiar with the automatic machinery employed in our manufactories that mechanisms of the above description have, in a great measure, lost their interest; and surprising as they may appear even to the scientific spectator, the astonishment speedily wears off, leaving a feeling only of regret that so much ingenuity has been perverted from useful purposes. We have, however, still the satisfaction of believing that such inventions have not been entirely without result, for there is no doubt that many of our most useful mechanical movements were invented and first applied in these otherwise useless automata. The same combination of the mechanical powers which made the crawling-spider, contributed in future years to purposes of higher import. The elements of the tumbling puppet were revived in the chronometer which guides our ships through the ocean; and the irregular-shaped wheel which directed the hand of the drawing automaton has served, in the present age, to guide the movements of the embroidering-machine. Sir David Brewster has remarked on this subject: "In whatever way the power of genius may invent or combine, and to whatever low or ludicrous purpose that invention or combination may be originally applied, society receives a gift which it can never lose; and though the value of the seed may not be at once recognized, and though it may lie long unproductive in the ungenial soil of human knowledge, it will some time or other evolve its germ and yield to mankind its natural and abundant harvest."—American Artisan.

A SAILOR'S LOVE OF FAIR PLAY.—In a ship-yard the other day, a tar from a man-o'-war was observed watching two men dragging a seven-foot cross-cut saw through a huge oak log. The saw was dull, the log very tough, and there they went, see-saw, see-saw; pull, push; push, pull. Jack studied the matter over a while, until he came to the conclusion that they were pulling to see who would get the saw; and as one was an immense big chap while the other was a little fellow, he decided to see fair play; so, giving the big one a blow under the ear that capsized him, he jerked the saw out of the log, and giving it to the small one, he sung out, "Now run, you beggar!"

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.
And for sale everywhere ja26-tf

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATED Salt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers,
Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, — FIFTY CENTS.
Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by MRS. A. GRIDLEY,
Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,
AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.
TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.
REDINGTON & CO.,
Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,
SAN FRANCISCO
ja25-tf

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!DE GRATH'S GENUINE ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES.
Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetters, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.
REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.
ja25

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and rosy hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.
REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
San Francisco.
ja25-tf

ALLEN'SLUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,
ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOTSETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.
au27

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOTSETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.
au27

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND DRESSING
THE Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicate dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sole sold by all Druggists.

HOTSETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Edridge & Co."

HOTSETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
Agents, San Francisco.
ja25-tf

BREWSTER & CO'SCarriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA,

will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE,
and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES,
and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to
BREWSTER & CO.,
Of Broome street,

The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,
Of No. 372, Broome street.

del7-5m NEW YORK.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATINGAmalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,
Southeast corner of Montgomery and California street,
San Francisco.
cl7-5m

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

CREATE A HEALTHY APPETITE!

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure Dyspepsia, Diarrhea and Constipation.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Invigorate the System and enliven the mind.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Overcome the effects of Drunkenness and late Hours.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure all Diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Are Palatable to the Taste.

They are the

BEST BITTERS IN THE MARKET.

And when once used will always be called for again.

They are made in the most careful manner

From Pure Old Whisky, Medicated from
Roots and Herbs

Especially adapted for the cure of all Stomachic Diseases
and Liver Complaints.

Try Them and You will be Satisfied.

For sale everywhere by Druggists and Liquor Dealers
or by

N. B. JACOBS & CO.,423 Front street,
San Francisco.

fe11-6m

OPPOSITION STEAMER-DAY,

MARCH 13th!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK!

VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE!!!

THROUGH IN 21 DAYS!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

AMERICA,

W. L. MERRY, COMMANDER

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON MONDAY, MARCH 13th

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely, Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

2,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit of the Isthmus is a pleasant trip. Meals furnished free by the Company while crossing. A baggage-master will be sent through by each steamer. Insurance on Treasure at the lowest rates.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,
Up stairs, San Francisco.
fe25

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
Fine Clothing
—AND—
GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CARRY BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624 CLAY STREET, (Old No. 17)

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,624 Clay street, San Francisco.
my28GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2 & 3 and 4, San Francisco
y2

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

STILL another victory for the National arms! Wilmington and all the forts surrounding it fell into our hands on the 22d, thus effectually closing against the rebel army the greatest of all their sources of supplies. Gen. Terry, after properly garrisoning the city and its defences, was at last accounts pursuing the retreating Confederates. The latest despatches are ominous of a great impending struggle. A battle was expected hourly: Sherman, marching resistlessly onward, was closing up on the south, and was in co-operation with Schofield's entire army on the southwest; Grant, in front of Petersburg, is ready to strike when the opportune moment arrives. From nearly every point the Federal armies are pressing towards Richmond. Meantime, Lee is concentrating all his powers: Beauregard was retreating along the line of the railroad from Charlotte to Salisbury. Sherman is between that rebel and Hardee. The rebel leader sees the circle which environs him narrowed every day; all his strategy, all his bravery, all his indomitable generalship fail before the consummate skill and genius of our Generals. With Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington in our hands, is it not safe to say that the game is our own? The Southern soldiery have become disheartened, the Richmond press howls despondingly; but the leaders will not give up. They are determined to prolong their resistance to the torrent which they know full well they cannot stem—like prize-fighters they show a disposition not to throw up the sponge until a final blow knocks them entirely "out of time." But the wires are out of order again! Just when the anxiety for important news is raised to the highest pitch, the magnetic clock stops ticking, and the people are compelled to wait feverishly for the next raising of the Overland Telegraph signal flag.

February 21.—The N. Y. Tribune's correspondent, writing from Charleston harbor on the 18th, gives the following particulars of the evacuation of the city:

Early last evening, Gen. Schemmelfinnig, commanding the Northern District of the Department of the South, discovered indications which led him to believe that the rebels were about to evacuate Charleston and its defences. Accordingly, he ordered the pickets and the picket boats to keep a bright lookout, and report immediately any movement on the part of the enemy. About half past three o'clock this morning, a terrific explosion took place in Charleston, which shook every ship in the harbor and on the bar. Almost simultaneously with the explosion, flames broke out, and could be distinctly seen in different parts of the city. It appears that the first explosion took place at the Wilmington Depot, the fire from which rapidly communicated with the adjoining buildings, causing a general conflagration of all the dwelling-houses in the vicinity, the inhabitants trying to extinguish the fire. The second explosion which took place resulted very disastrously, causing a terrible loss of life among women and children, who are represented as having been horribly mutilated.

About six o'clock this morning Schemmelfinnig moved his force and occupied the city and its defences. The formidable earthworks on James Island were found abandoned and the guns spiked. At eight o'clock a detachment was sent to take possession of Fort Sumter, and raised the flag which Anderson hauled down nearly four years ago. At nine o'clock the flag was raised amid deafening cheers. As fast as the forces could be thrown into the city they were set to work to put out the fire, which up to the time of leaving was raging fiercely in different parts of the city.

The old men, women and children were rushing frantically to and fro in an agony of despair, at the loss of their homes and the killing and mutilating of their friends. It is impossible to estimate the amount of cotton destroyed by the rebels. Several thousand bales were collected at different parts of the city, and were set on fire almost simultaneously with all the principal depots and warehouses. No doubt the rebels intended to burn the city to the ground, despite the misery it would entail on the thousands of women, children and old men, of which class the inhabitants of Charleston are now almost entirely composed.

Following is Gen. Gilmore's official despatch:

Charleston and all its defences came into our possession this morning, with about 200 pieces of good artillery and a supply of ammunition. The enemy commenced evacuating all the works last night. Maj. McBeth surrendered the city to the troops of Gen. Schemmelfinnig at nine this morning, at which time it was occupied by our forces. Our advance on Edisto from Bull's Bay hastened the retreat. The cotton warehouses, arsenals, Quartermaster's stores, railroad bridges, and iron-clads were burned by the enemy. Some of the vessels in the ship yard were also burned. Nearly all the inhabitants remaining behind belong to the poorer classes.

On the report of the news of the capture of Charleston, the Army of the Potomac was in great glee, and fired a shotted salute throughout the whole line in honor of the event.

A party of rebel cavalry dashed into Cumberland, Va., before daylight on the morning of the 21st surprised and captured the pickets, and carried off Gens. Crook and Kelly. Cavalry were sent in pursuit, but were unsuccessful in rescuing them.

February 22.—The national forces marched into and took possession of Wilmington to-day. The following is an extract from Rear Admiral Porter's official report:

After the evacuation of Fort Anderson, I pushed forward the gunboats as far as the water would permit. The army pushed up at the same time on the right and left banks of the river. After sounding and buoying out the middle sound at Big Island, I succeeded in getting five gunboats over and opened fire on Fort Strong—a work commanding the principal obstructions, where the rebels had also sunk a large steamer, the North Eastern. Our fire soon drove the rebels away from the fort. Now and then they would fire a shot, one of which struck the Sassacus below her water mark and set her to leaking badly. No lives were lost. On the night of the 20th the rebels sent down 200 floating torpedoes. I had a strong force of picket boats out, and the torpedoes were sunk with musketry. One got in on the Osceola, and blew her wheel-house to pieces and knocked down her bulkhead. No damage was done to the hull. Yesterday evening Gen. Ames with his division moved within a short distance of the fort and had a sharp encounter with the rebels. On hearing the musketry and seeing where our troops were, I opened a rapid fire on the fort and all along the enemy's line. The fort responded with three or four shots, but was soon silenced, and this morning we heard that Gen. Terry was within the works, and the road was clear to Wilmington.

Speaking of Fort Anderson, the capture of which was mentioned in the last "record," a correspondent says:

It is a work of great extent, covering nearly as much ground as Fort Fisher, and is of immense strength. The front is like that work, being a series of large mounds or traverses rising 25 to 30 feet above the waters of the Cape Fear river, on which it fronts, and to the northeast, extending in alternating mounds, traverses, angles, embrasures and ditches, enclosing an area of about four square miles.

A special despatch to the Democrat from Nashville the 23d, says: Intense excitement exists at Knoxville from a report that Longstreet's command was moving on that place.

Gov. Vance, of North Carolina, says that the struggle for freedom shall never be given up, and he prayerfully entreates the people to rise, and says all the disasters the South is suffering are caused by the soldiers being absent without leave.

February 24.—Correspondence from the Army of the Potomac states that 200 rebels left for their homes from one brigade. Hoke's division of Longstreet's corps is the only large body of troops which has been sent south from Lee's army. It is estimated that the strength of the rebel army around Petersburg is 30,000. When the news of Sherman's successes in South Carolina became generally known throughout the rebel army, it caused a feeling of universal depression.

February 25.—The Richmond papers say that Sherman is pushing rapidly north for Charlotte, Salisbury, Greensboro and Danville, thence to join Grant in an attack on Richmond. Unless Sherman is soon checked, he cannot be stopped at all. They also state that a telegram from Goldsboro, the 19th, says: A Union force has set out from Newbern for Tarboro to cut the road from Wilmington to Richmond. Another force was moving up on the south side of the Neuse river to cut the railroad. A Yankee force is also reported moving east from Tennessee to join Sherman in his march north.

The rebel journals give some Texas items of interest, including accounts of the defeat of a rebel force on the South Concha river, in that State, in January, by the Indians. The fight is said to have been a most desperate one. The Indians are giving the rebels there much trouble. The Austin Gazette is suspicious that present operations are the forerunners of a grand advance of the Union troops on Western Texas in the spring by way of Red river. The works found at Galveston are being improved and enlarged. It was said that the Mexican town of Matamoros has ceased to be a free port.

February 26.—A letter to the N. Y. Herald from the Sixth Army Corps the 23d, states that several brigades of Hill's corps have gone south to reinforce Beauregard, and the whole of Lee's army is under marching orders. Deserters state that a great portion were ordered to take four days' cooked rations and to carry considerable ammunition.

February 27.—The Charlotte (N. C.) Democrat says it is rumored that a fight took place between Ridgway and Columbia last Saturday, in which the Union forces were defeated.

Great preparations are making in Virginia for a most desperate struggle between the two armies. Lee is concentrating his forces, and Grant is collecting his great strength for the conflict. A corps of surgeons and nurses has been sent to Wilmington, which is to be Sherman's base of supplies.

The Richmond papers are in a fever of excitement. They view their situation with the most intense alarm. The Enquirer calls upon Jeff. Davis to arm the slaves without authority of law. It says these States and this cause stand to day in need of a man who will take the power of the people and use it for their preservation. Farther on it says: "Sherman is rushing through the Carolinas like an avalanche. Report says he has captured 100,000 bales of cotton at Columbia. Grant is gradually, perhaps surely, extending his lines around Petersburg and Richmond, threatening every moment to burst over the lines that intervene, and the Senate are doing the conservative. History furnishes no parallel for this."

The City Hall Bell was removed, Wednesday, to the old Union Hotel building, where it will hereafter sound the alarm in case of fire. Hand-power will soon give place to electricity in directing the fire-ladders where to report for duty, as Mr. Kennard promises to have the fire-alarm telegraph in complete working order by the first of April.

LOCAL ITEMS.

There are indications that throughout the State the recent Union successes and the second inauguration of President Lincoln will be celebrated to-day by a general jubilee. In this city ample preparations have been made to demonstrate popular feeling on the occasion. Standing-room in the vicinity of Platt's Hall will command a premium to-night.

Diphtheria has been quite prevalent in this city of late, particularly among children; many of the cases prove fatal.

For the current year the school revenue of this city is about $325,000.

Apples recently brought from Oregon, of superior quality, were sold at prices ranging from $3 50 to $4 25 per box.

The San Francisco and Alameda Railroad has been finished to San Leandro, ten miles; four trips each way will be made daily.

William Naemyer, a sailor, was stabbed by Barrega, at a house on Pacific street, Saturday night last; he died at the County Hospital, Tuesday.

The Tehama House is to be removed, (having been sold at auction for the sum of $2,350;) in its place the California Bank Company propose to erect a brick building.

The new (consolidated) water company has elected as Trustees: John Bensley, Nicholas Luning, H. S. Dexter, Charles Mayne, Erwin Davis, W. F. Babcock.

J. B. Bayerque, of the firm of Pioche & Bayerque, of San Francisco, died of consumption, recently, at Mazatlan. The body was brought to this city for interment.

James Morrow, a Canadian, aged about twenty-one years, was found dead in his bed at the What Cheer House, Thursday, having apparently died from a congestive chill. He was a stranger here, recently from Victoria.

L. L. Robinson, of Sacramento, and Levi Parsons, of San Francisco, have recently purchased the Market-street Railroad in this city. Horse cars will be used. Mr. Frank McCoppin, the efficient Superintendent, retains his old position.

John Heron, a pioneer citizen, an attaché of the Alta, died on Friday last: he was buried in the lot of the Eureka Typographical Union, Sunday. The Pioneer Association has appointed a committee (consisting of Messrs. Livingston, Hittell and Reed) to draft resolutions of regret and condolence.

The Scandinavian Society of this city celebrated its sixth anniversary, Tuesday evening; it numbers 240 members, natives of Denmark, Sweden and Norway. Songs, speeches, social converse and a fine collation made the occasion one which will dwell pleasantly in the memory of the members and their guests.

The members of Pennsylvania Engine Company, No. 12, have presented to Capt. Lewis T. Grant, formerly a fellow-fireman, a beautiful regulation sword. Atkins Massey made the presentation speech, complimenting the Captain, (who has met with extraordinary success in recruiting for the C. V.,) in terms of well-deserved praise. The speech was received with great enthusiasm.

A German named Barengas was stabbed in the head and neck, last evening, on Turk street, near Filmore, by William M. Darling. The knife inflicted an ugly wound, cutting into the head behind and close to the left ear, extending obliquely downward to the throat, and narrowly missing the jugular vein. Darling was arrested. The difficulty occurred in consequence of a misunderstanding about property.

The "California Law Institute" has recently found a name and existence in this city; it begins with thirty-eight members, who have formed a class for the purpose of qualifying themselves for admission to the bar. It is proposed to obtain a charter from the next Legislature. The present officers are: J. Dischecker, President; A. S. Whitney, Chancellor; C. Van Pelt, Treasurer.

Our citizens will be afforded an opportunity to contribute to the relief of one of the "California Hundred," John A. Hill, who has ample evidence of faithful service under the flag of the Republic, and of honorable discharge in consequence of ill-health. His physician advises him, his lungs being weak, to try the effect of mountain air, and the friends who have hitherto aided him very properly appeal to the general public to give the further assistance which is needed and due.

The Angel Island passenger schooner Shooting Star is becoming an "object of interest." She came in collision with another schooner on Thursday, while rounding the island, receiving considerable damage. On the day following, she was carried away from her moorings, by the tide, while two men on board were asleep, and drifted as far as the Heads before the sailors were rocked into a state of wakefulness. The steamer Senator, as she entered the Gate, was made acquainted with the facts, and reported to the Shubrick, which went to the relief of the truant vessel. Owing to adverse winds, the Shooting Star was driven several miles to sea before the Shubrick reached her. She was brought back to port safely, her crew none the worse for their involuntary voyage.

USEFUL INFORMATION.

DISTANCES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

To various points:

To Fort Point, 4 miles, by omnibuses, four trips a day.
 Lone Mountain, 3, street railway.
 Seal Rock, 6, cars and omnibuses, two trips a day.
 Mission Dolores, street railways; Ocean House, 8.
 San Mateo, 20, railroad.
 Crystal Springs, 23, railroad and stage.
 Half-Moon Bay, 29, do. do.
 Redwood city, 30, do.
 Mountain View, 38, do.
 Santa Clara, 47, do.
 San Jose, 50, do., or steamer and stage, 54.
 Alviso, 46, steamer, daily.
 Almaden mines, 67, steamer and stage; or by railroad and stage, 61.
 Santa Cruz, 78, railroad and stage.
 Oakland, 8, steamer and railroad, six trips a day.
 Alameda, 11, steamer, three trips a day.
 San Leandro, 15, steamer and railroad.
 Mission San Jose, 34, steamer, railroad and stage.
 Warm Springs, 37, do. do.
 Benicia, 30, steamer leaves at 4 P. M. daily.
 Sacramento, 117, do. do.
 Stockton, 117, do. do.
 Martinez, 33, do.
 Pacheco, 38, steamer and stage.
 Diablo Coal Mines, 44, steamer and stage.
 Suisun, 50, steamer, or 54 by steamer and stage.
 Vallejo, 28; Mare Island, 37; Napa city, 50.
 White Sulphur Springs, 67, stage from Napa.
 Geyser Springs, 118, do. do.
 Sonoma, 52, steamer, tri-weekly.
 Petaluma, 48, steamer, daily.
 Healdsburg, 80, stage daily from Petaluma.
 San Quentin, 12, steamer; Farallone Islands, 21.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Letters to any part of the United States, 3 cents for each $\frac{1}{2}$ ounce or part thereof.
 Drop Letters, 2 cents.
 Advertised letters, 1 cent in addition to the regular rates.

Valuable letters may be registered on application at the office of mailing, and the payment of 20 cents registration fee.
 Transient newspapers, periodicals, blanks, proof-sheets, book manuscripts, pamphlets, and all mailable printed matter, except circulars and books, 2 cents for each and every 4 ounces. Double these rates are charged for books.

Unsent circulars, to one address, not exceeding three in number, 2 cents, and in the same proportion for a greater number.

Seeds, cuttings, roots, etc., 2 cents for each 4 ounces or less quantity.

All packages of mail matter not charged with letter postage must be so arranged that the same can be conveniently examined by Postmasters; if not, letter postage will be charged.

No package will be forwarded by mail which weighs over 4 pounds.

All postage matter, for delivery within the United States, must be prepaid by stamps (except duly certified letters of soldiers and sailors; otherwise, double the above rates will be charged on delivery).

Weekly newspapers (one copy only) sent to actual subscribers within the county where printed and published, free.

Letters to Canada and other British North American Provinces, when not over 3,000 miles, 10 cents for each $\frac{1}{2}$ ounce. When over 3,000 miles, 15 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to Great Britain or Ireland, 24 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to France, 15 cents for each $\frac{1}{2}$ ounce. Prepayment optional.

Letters to other foreign countries vary in rate according to the route by which they are sent.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
 Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
 645 Washington st., San Francisco.

BOOK-KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete BUSINESS EDUCATION, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4-3m

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvins' Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.
 BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
 'y30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charriere of Paris, Surgical Machiist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,

ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,

No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKY.

Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge.
 fe4-3m I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES, adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of SUPERIOR CARRIAGES, ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,
 ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

ATKINS MASSEY,

UNDERTAKER,

(At the Old Stand.)

No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,
 First house below Kearny street.

Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases. Office of the City and County Coroner.

NATHANIEL GRAY,

UNDERTAKER,

CITY AND COUNTY SEXTON,

641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,

Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC BURIAL CASES and CASKETS.

de17-3m

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:
 Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.
* 9:40	10:20	11:00
FROM THE CITY
10:00	10:40	11:20

And so on till 6 o'clock.
 Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.
 my25 F. MCCOPPIN, Superintendent.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, AND JOHN COLLNER

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"

Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,
 SAN FRANCISCO.

VANDALL, CARR & CO.,

BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,

NO. 410 CLAY STREET,

(North side, between Sansome and Battery.)

Particular attention paid to the printing of Briefs and Records. fe11-1f

PRINTING! PRINTING!!

DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Montgomery, - - San Francisco

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city.
 fe4-1f

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING

HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
 NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
 387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
 de31-3m

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

ja25-1f 401 Battery, cor. Clay, San Francisco.

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other malpractices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

ja25-1f 401 Battery, corner Clay, San Francisco.

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGUARY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents for the Pacific Coast,
 401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,
 San Francisco.

Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-1f

ODD NAMES.

GREAT care should be exercised by parents in selecting names for their children, especially if the surname should happen to be an odd-sounding one. By neglecting this precaution many ridiculous results have followed.

Many of my readers doubtless have heard how a Mr. Ashe had a son of his christened Caleb, and how the school-boys perverted the youngsters name into "Calabash," by which cognomen he was known even after he had grown to manhood.

Also, a Mr. Rose, romantically inclined, who called his daughter Wild. When she became a young woman her name was admired by all the young folks. But alas! she married a gentleman by the name of Bull, and was changed from a "Wild Rose" into a "Wild Bull."

Again, A Mr. Frogge desiring two given names for his son and heir, decided on calling him after an old friend of his. The result was that before the ridiculous blunder was discovered the boy was christened James Bull Frogge, which the companions of the boy finally curtailed into Bullfrog.

Having given the reader a few instances of odd names so as to prepare him or her for what they may expect, I shall now lay before them such cases of a similar kind as have come under my notice:

I have an intimate acquaintance who rejoices—no, he suffers—under the singular name of Abraham Street Sleeper. Dropping the first name and using the initial only, he becomes A. Street Sleeper. Should he get disgusted with either of his names and resort altogether to initials, he would write himself an A. S. S. He had once thought of having his name entirely changed, but finally resolved to retain it, at all hazards.

The oddity of his name created in him a desire to ascertain how many more such could be found in the city, and to make the search thorough he had recourse to a directory, which, with strolling around town—he being a man of leisure—gave him great facilities for gratifying his suddenly acquired taste. He was as fond of a joke as any man living, and never missed an opportunity whenever or wherever it presented itself. This new field—namely, odd names, of men and women—was calculated to be varied and highly amusing.

Passing along the street one day Abe saw a tailor's sign, which read thus: John Fell, tailor—the word "tailor" being beneath and quite pale. Going in, he saw a woman alone, attending the shop; he asked: "Did John hurt himself?"

The woman became excited. Her husband, who bore the odd name, had gone to a fire an hour ago, and she, of course, thought by Abe's question that he (John) had met with some mishap. She asked our joker where her husband was, and how he had come to hurt himself.

"Madam," said Sleeper, solemnly, "I know nothing of your husband; never saw him to my knowledge. I noticed on a sign at the door that John Fell, so I humanely called on you to ascertain the extent of his injuries."

Of course when Abe pointed to the sign and explained, Mrs. Fell saw the joke. They parted with great indignation on her part, and a deal of merriment on his.

Seeing one day on a door-plate the name "I. C. Jones," he could scarcely resist the desire to ring the bell and inform the inmates of the dwelling that he also saw Jones.

The next name that attracted him was that of a dancing-master called Malon Colley. "If I were in his place," thought our hero, "I would change either my name or my profession. He ought to be an undertaker or a sexton, but a dancing-master can scarcely be inclined to melancholy."

Abe knew a very large, fat man, who rejoiced in the title of Isaac Matthew Livingood. But the gentleman usually wrote it "I. M. Livingood." He handed a card to our joker, one day, with the above name on it. Abe read it, and then remarked: "One would think that you were living good, judging by your appearance."

A sign reading "Adam Good, shoemaker," came under his observation soon after. By erasing the first letter in "Adam" and marking a large A immediately above it, on the sign, he caused it to read "A dam Good Shoemaker."

Next morning he called on the man, and ordered him to measure him for a pair of shoes, remarking at the time: "If you really are all that your sign says, I think I could scarcely find a more suitable man for my purpose. But I'd advise you to be less profane, for you might lose many good chances from pious folks, who would object to patronizing you on that account."

Abraham pointed to the sign, and roared as he saw the consternation of Mr. Good, who suspected the joker to be the culprit. The last words that saluted the joker's ears, as he left the shop, were, "A dam good licking!"

Another time he read a sign, having on it "B. Ware." Rushing into the store, he anxiously asked the proprietor: "Beware of what?"

"Of a chastisement!" exclaimed Mr. Ware, seizing a yard stick, and making toward our hero, who made a hasty exit. The man had had that joke played on him before.

He saw a sign once, which read "M. T. Head, attorney at law," and observed to a friend who was with him, that, "the gentleman was not the only lawyer in the city who could boast of an empty head!"

Abraham's uncle was named Horne. He had a son born, and gave our hero the privilege of naming him. Now Abe knew that this same uncle had chosen the abominable name of Abraham Street for him, so he vowed to pay him off, by selecting a ridiculous name for his infant son. The child was accordingly christened Abraham Green Horne, which was eventually abbreviated into "A. Greenhorne."

"I rather think," remarked our hero afterward, "that A. Street Sleeper sounds as nice as A. Green Horne."

A family named Goodman christened a son after the surname of a wealthy bachelor uncle, who was called Solomon Avery, in hopes of having him become the legatee of that relative.

Mr. Avery heard of it, and wrote the following letter to the father:

"You have called a son of yours after my surname, which gives him a right to style himself Avery Goodman. But fearing he might grow up a bad man, despite his name, I decline, most respectfully, to make him my heir.

SOLOMON AVERY."

When our joker heard of this he remarked: "I called that man a very Solomon to make so wise a decision."

Once seeing pasted on a wall the name of "B. A. Goodfellow, for Alderman," he remarked: "That's just the fellow we all ought to vote for; there are so very few good ones in office."

Entering a cigar store once, Abe remarked to the tobacco-const that he ought to be a minister.

"Why so?"

"Because you are good enough," was the reply. The man's sign read: "U. R. Goodenough."

For this pun our hero was presented by the proprietor with half-a-dozen of the best cigars the house afforded, and Abe went on his way rejoicing.

However, his jokes did not always terminate so happily. He stepped into the store of a Mr. Dampman, and asked one of the clerks to weigh him a pound of tea.

"We don't sell groceries," was the remark.

"What, then?" asked Abe, with a simple stare.

"Dry goods," was the curt reply.

"What!" exclaimed Abe, affecting astonishment, "a Dampman professing to sell dry goods!"

"Young man," said the proprietor, seizing him by the arm and pushing him toward the door, "you had best leave, right off, or I may turn you into a piece of damp goods by tossing you into the gutter!"

Abe needed no second bidding, but speedily lengthened the distance between the irate Dampman and himself.

Not long after that he called upon an old cobbler, and informed that person that he was wanted at a certain broker's office. The old fellow hastened to the place named, but no one there seemed to be aware that he was needed. Abraham, who was outside, now came forward and addressed the broker and his attendants thus: "Gentlemen, I saw you very busy in packing up gold, silver and pennies, and it occurred to me that you might require aid; so I made bold to send this man to you as a most suitable person, for he is a Penny-packer!"

Before the laugh had subsided, Abe was around the corner. He had grown cautious since the threat of Dampman, the dry goods man.

He once remarked to a friend that their mutual acquaintance, Mrs. Havisham, never wore a real diamond ring, although her husband was a millionaire.

"Why not?" asked the other.

"Because she is bound to Havisham"—(have a sham!)

He entered a pawnbroker's shop one evening, and offered a ten-dollar watch in pawn, and asked twelve on it. The broker examined it, and offered two and a half.

"Your sign made me drop in," remarked Abe, "and I expected to make a fine thing out of you because you are E. Z. Jacobs. But I find you are a confounded hard Jacobs—nothing easy about you!"

As our joker stepped out, he heard the man muttering a word that would rhyme with "lamb;" the broker, being evidently angry, had grown profane.

Abe had a lady friend who married a man named Nathan Ellwood Husband. He once remarked to her: "I should judge, Mrs. Husband, that you were not very hard to please in selecting a partner for life."

"What makes you think so?" asked she, half angry.

"Because you were satisfied with N. E. Husband," replied Abe. But the lady required a full explanation before she would be pacified.

He once incurred the displeasure of a friend of his by remarking: "Mr. Ball, I am surprised to learn that, in spite of your well-known know-nothing proclivities, you have married an 'Emma Grant.'"

Mr. Abraham S. Sleeper came near being knocked down one day, by a man on whom he called, saying: "I've heard that a celebrated oculist just arrived in town, and I'd advise you to call on him; he may possibly render you essential service, if not effectually cure you of your unpleasant infirmity."

"There is nothing the matter with my eyes," said the man, in astonishment.

"Then take down your sign," said Abe, "for, I am sure, by it you acknowledge being cross-eyed." The sign read, "I S. Quint." By a timely duck of the head our hero escaped being knocked into the gutter.

Only a week ago he advised a lady friend not to walk along the streets during the day if she would avoid being annoyed.

"Why, what have I to fear?" asked she.

"Because," replied Abe, with a grin, "you know the city authorities have of late shamefully neglected their duties, which has resulted in the accumulation of piles of ashes in the streets. And should the folks see you promenading along, they would beset you with all manner of vessels filled with ashes, expecting you to take them away."

"What on earth do you mean?" asked the lady, in supreme astonishment.

"Because you are Ann Ashmann," was the reply.

At another time he electrified a tailor, named Owen, by remarking: "Why are you never out of debt?"

"Mr. Sleeper," replied the tailor, "what do you mean? I do not owe a penny."

"Yet you are 'Owen the tailor,'" remarked Abe, with a laugh.

Again, he said to a person he presumed he would never reach a ripe old age; on being asked why he thought so, he replied: "Because you will always be a Greenman."

A man was once committed to prison for shamefully beating another. Abe remarked that this was the first instance he ever knew of a person being imprisoned for beating A. Drumm.

The last joke he uttered was a pun on his own name. He was on his death-bed, when he called to a friend and said:

"I am not an Irishman, but promise me to observe the custom of that country after I am no more; have a jolly wake over my body."

"Why do you make such a strange request?" asked all who heard him.

"Because it is the most natural thing in this world to wake A. Sleeper," was his reply.—Pacific Monthly.

CHEMISTRY SIMPLIFIED FOR YOUNG BEGINNERS.—How to make a Light in a Dark Room.—First darken the room. Then take of spirits of wine, two ounces; deal shavings, as much as you can carry; gunpowder, about a wine-glass full. Mix well together, and place them on the floor in the centre of the room. Procure a red-hot poker; apply it to the mass. This will soon light the room up.

How to burn a Hole in a Piece of Velvet with Water.—Get your mother's best velvet mantle. Take about two drachms of nitric acid, put them into a test-tube. Say it's water; if they don't believe you, ask them to taste it. Pour it on the velvet. It will burn a hole right through it. This will gladden your mother's heart.

How to Make a Precipitate.—Take of detonating powder about two tablespoonful, sky-rockets one bushel, blank cartridges, twelve or more. Wrap them in a paper parcel. Make the company stand round with their backs to the fire. Give the parcel to any nervous old gentleman and tell him to put it in the fire. It will go off; so will the company, and precipitate themselves out of the room. Don't try this experiment more than twice a day.

DISSENTING MAHOMMEDANS.—A sect of dissenters has sprung up in the Mahomedan church, numbering already over forty thousand adherents, and including some of high rank. They may be considered liberal Mahomedans. Their peculiarities are, that they disavow polygamy, drink wine, disregard the feast of Ramazan, acknowledge the sacredness of the Old and New Testament scriptures, demand that the Koran shall be printed in Turkish, without note or comment, which has never been done, and claim that no man ought to be considered an infidel and be persecuted for his religious faith, they also ask to be recognized as a sect within the Moslem faith, and to have privilege of a mosque for themselves, which the government refuse for the present.

I BELIEVE that the time will come when serious attention will be given to the education of woman. Her nature demands peculiar care. The best qualities she may possess are sometimes of great detriment to her—and then again, her very greatest faults may be of service to her; at times she can be everything—at others nothing. These discrepancies must be toned down. The theory will require careful consideration—the practice a wise and skilful hand.—Madame De Staël.

WHAT is "Humble Pie?" C. W. Smith's Clerical Elocution gives the following explanation on this subject: "Humble pie" is an incorrect spelling of "umble-pie," a pie made of "umbles," a plural noun, meaning a deer's entrails. To eat 'umble-pie' is to eat of the poorest dish.

On most occasions the importance of calmness is in exact proportion to its difficulty.

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Murn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit.

Stephen Oliverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of hailing winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; E. G. & Wickman, Ship Chaulders; J. B. Quilatin, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN,

No. 28 Third street, San Francisco, de17-3m
Who will give all information about them.

CALIFORNIA

Home Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Deering, A. B. McCreery, C. Dunsen, C. J. Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heynemann, R. G. Sneath, C. F. Macdonald, J. C. Wilmerding, Levi Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Thibault, S. Hemenway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.

B. F. LOWE, President.

JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5-3m

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs. Tiltall & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U.S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent. no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $750,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $600,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Douchoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS, MERCHANDISE, FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

ju25-tf R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
206 Front street, corner of California.

THE REASON WHY

EVERYBODY USES
THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED

ERASIVE SOFT SOAP, OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.

Second—It is more effectual.

Third—It saves labor.

Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally. Manufacturer, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco. ju7-3m

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;
JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;
STEAMBOAT GIN;
OLD TOM GIN;
IRISH WHISKY,
from Bond direct.
For sale by
ja28 tf 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden paus of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S

no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession.

Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platina, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anesthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. de10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. de3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. ju18

PHINEAS BANNING,

FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. sc24

GOODWIN & CO.,

HAVING RECEIVED AT THE

LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,

—THE—

First Premium,

—ON—

FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES,

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such

Consisting of

Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,
DINING ROOM AND
OFFICE FURNITURE.

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street

no12

RUPTURE.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street,
Between Montgomery and Kearny.
Manufactory, 232 Sutter street. de3

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFFERED by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,

CHRETIEN PFISTER,

oc15-tf No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,

Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office.)

SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz. William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz. Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballard's, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. ju8-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, Etc.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

WILSON & EVANS,
No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco,
And 122 J street, Sacramento. de3-3m

M. HARKINS,

MANUFACTURER OF

LADIES', MISSES', AND CHILDRENS'

Boots and Shoes.

Also, GENTLEMEN'S BOOTS, SHOES and SLIPPERS
MADE TO ORDER.

No. 151 FOURTH STREET,

Second door above Howard, east side,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Repairing of all kinds neatly and promptly done.

ALTA MILLS,

STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, - - - - - SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., - - - - - Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large, Hominy, Small, Oatmeal, Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order. de17-3m

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff:

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5-tf J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY,.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms. ju25

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every description, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear, or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here, while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; or others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

an6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff; vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 10th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Ind. Rev. Stamp, WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By G. C. LUTCHER, Deputy Clerk.
Ch cC, Delany, Pl: 11: 2110 de24-3m

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

MISS MATILDA HERON,

Supported by

THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

This Saturday Evening, March 4th, 1865.

In the Play of

CAMILLE.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, March 4th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

BY THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

The Drama of

THE WILLOW COPSE,

And a Musical Melange.

MONDAY EVENING,

GAME A.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

-OF-

WILD CHERRY,

A CURE FOR EVERY FORM OF

Pulmonary Complaint!

COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH, SPITTING OF BLOOD,
LIVER COMPLAINT, etc., etc.

Consumption,

Which carries off more victims than any other disease,
and which baffles the skill of the Physician to a greater extent than any other malady, often

YIELDS TO THIS REMEDY,

when all others prove ineffectual.

AS A MEDICINE,

Rapid in relief, soothing in effect, safe in its operation, it is

UNSURPASSED!

while as a preparation, free from noxious ingredients, poisons or minerals; uniting skill, science and medical knowledge, combining all that is valuable in the vegetable kingdom for this class of disease, it is

INCOMPARABLE!

and is entitled, merits and receives the enviable appella-
tion of the

INVALID'S FRIEND.

Sold by all druggists and by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,

mh4-tf

San Francisco.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE!

FORTY YEARS' EXPERIENCE

Has fully established the superiority of

Redding's Russia Salve

Over all other preparations

FOR THE CURE OF

Scalds,

Burns, Cuts,

Flesh Wounds, Boils,

Chilblains, Blisters, Bruises,

Felons, Piles, Erysipelas, Ulcers,

Salt Rheum, Injuries by Splinters, Warts,

Old Sores, Ring Worm, Frost-Bitten Parts,
AND ALL CUTANEOUS DISEASES AND ERUPTIONS
GENERALLY.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE

is prompt in action, removes pain at once, and reduces the most angry-looking swellings and inflammations, as if by magic—thus affording relief and a complete cure.

FOR SALE EVERYWHERE.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

416 and 418 Front street,

mh4-tf

SAN FRANCISCO.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Pine street, below Montgomery.

THOMAS MAGUIRE, - Proprietor.
GEORGE H. COES, - Stage Manager.
B. P. ISAACS, - Musical Director.

Owing to the probable detention of the steamer on the other side of the Isthmus,
BIRCH, BACKUS, and SHATTUCK, have postponed their departure until the 12th instaat.
They will appear nightly in conjunction with the following

GREAT

COMBINATION OF MUSICAL TALENT, BY THE STAR TROUPE OF
SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
P. B. Isaacs, George H. Coes,
A. J. Talbot, Mons. Charles,
C. F. Shattuck, P. Loomis,
Sig Pinto, S. Washburn,
J. H. O'Neill, J. B. Howo,
Frank Medina, H. Grob,

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL

Sacred Concert!

Every Sunday Evening, by the Troupe,
Messrs W J Hill, John Gregg, J. Schlotte, and

50 INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Dress Circle and Parquet, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 25
cents extra; Private Boxes, $5.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock,
precisely.

Saturday afternoon performances by the Minstrels, at
the Opera House.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COM-PANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month
of MARCH, 1865:

MARCH 31 - - - - - GOLDEN CITY.
MARCH 13th - - - - - GOLDEN AGE.
MARCH 23d, - - - - - CONSTITUTION.
From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall
by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspin-
wall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC
STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,

mh4 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern my25

HOMESTEAD FOR SALE!

ANY PERSON DESIROUS OF PURCHASing a valuable HOUSE AND LOT at a bargain, for CASH,
can hear of a chance, by applying immediately at the office of THE CALIFORNIAN. The property is within 10 minutes' walk of the corner of Clay and Montgomery streets, is in the southern part of the city, and in a neat private street and pleasant neighborhood. The House contains two Parlors (with sliding-doors, gas chandeliers and marble mantel), a dining-room and kitchen on the first floor, and four bed-rooms on the second. Planked yard, flowering vines, outhouses, etc. Water in three different places on the premises and gas fixtures all through the house. It is built in a thorough and substantial manner, and is now under a monthly rent of $50. Size of Lot, 24 feet, by 80 feet in depth. Title, PERFECT. Price, $3,500.

Satisfactory reasons for selling will be given to a purchaser by applying as above. fe18-tf

METALLURGIC INSTITUTE,

FIRST STREET,

McKibbin's Railing Works (up stairs.)

CONDUCTED BY

G. F. DEETKEN,

MINING ENGINEER.

The only Thorough Metallurgic and Engineering
School on the Coast.

THEORETIC-PRACTICAL INSTRUCTION in Metallurgic
Roasting Operations, Amalgamation, Chloration and Smelting of Gold and Silver Ores.

Also, on Mechanics, Mine Surveying, Topographic and Mechanical Drawing.
The attention of Superintendents of Mills and Mines is particularly directed to this excellent facility of acquiring a thorough knowledge of Metallurgic operations. fe25-tf

CATHOLIC GIFTS,

IN GREAT VARIETY!

Consisting of—
BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,
STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,
MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES!
And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.
For sale by
MICHAEL FLOOD,
Catholic Bookseller,
del17-tf No. 428 Kearny street, San Francisco.

P. J. WHITE & CO.,

SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN...

BUTTER, LARD, HAMS, BACON, PORK,

SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,

And a general assortment of

GROCERIES,

Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,

Between Saasome and Battery, San Francisco.
Your trade is respectfully solicited. de10-tf

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PIC-
TURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, Etc.

Especial attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDS

ENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

ja28-tf

THESE PLASTERS have the compact-
ness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove.
They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly lump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms.
For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases
they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.,

"Braadretb Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

San Francisco.

Sold by all Druggists.

de17-3m

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late international EXHIBITION at LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition
from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says:
"Messrs. Steinway & Sons' endorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can
be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my25

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

fy2

SAN FRANCISCO.

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.A. Roman & Co.,

TAKE PLEASURE in announcing the following
list of NEW BOOKS just received from the East:

Enoch Arden. 1 vol. small quarto, elegantly illustrated.
Blue and Gold edition.
Clever Stories of many Lands, by John G. Saxe. 1 vol.
4to, illustrated.

The Queens of Song. Being memoirs of the most celebrated female vocalists. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portraits. All lovers of the Opera will be delighted with this charming volume.

The Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, with a memoir.
2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, tinted paper.

Doran's Complete Works. 9 vols., cloth and half Turkey,
with the "Annals of the Stage."

Arctic Researches and Life Among the Esquimaux, by Charles F. Hall. 1 vol. 8vo, illustrated. Ranks next to that of Dr. Kane.

Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. 1 vol. 12mo.
The latest contribution to the great Theological Controversy in England.

John Goldrey's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor. 1 vol. 12mo.
An absorbing story of American life.

Golden Leaves from the American Poets. 1 vol. 16mo., vellum and morocco. A tasteful selection from our
most popular Poets.

The Gentle Life. 1 vol. 16mo. An elegant series of Essays on the Formation of Character.

Following the Flag, by "Carleton." A fascinating juvenile.

Eliana, by Charles Lamb. 1 vol. 12mo. Being the herotofore uncollected writings of "Elia."

Autumn Holidays in the Country, by the "Country Parson." 1 vol. 12mo.

The Queen of the Ounaty, by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids. 1 vol. 12mo.

A New Atmosphere, by Gail Hamilton. 1 vol. 12mo.

Looking Towards Sunset, by L. M. Child. 1 vol. 4to.

Love and Duty. 1 vol. 12mo.

Lost Love. 1 vol. 12mo.

Margaret Denzil's History. 1 vol. paper.

Bohemians of London. 1 vol. 12mo.

Autobiography of Gen. Scott. 2 vols. 12mo.

Woodchiff, by Harriot B. McKeever. 1 vol. 12mo.

Hymns of the Ages. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

Old Merchants of New York. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

In addition to the above we have a large list of other
NEW BOOKS, together with a complete stock in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

All are cordially invited to call and examine.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,
417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

ja28-1m

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of
GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

S. W. H. WARD & SON,
NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
387 Broadway. } San Francisco, Cal.
de31-3m

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro
Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers
ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort,
cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil
of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor
hopes to merit the public patronage.

Terms easy.

fe18-tf

FRANK JOHNSON.

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!

CANTY & WAGNER,

(SUCCESSORS TO J. REGAN.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS,
113 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Between Bush and Sutter, San Francisco.

N. B.—All CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.

Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to. de3-3m

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II., No. 15.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 11, 1865.

TERMS $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

Things—by "Inigo,"
Letter from "Podgers,"
An Australian Detective's Narrative
John Hampden and his Grave.
A Story of Sweden.
Inez de Castro.
Skimmings from an Old Receipt-Book.
A Column of Wit and Humor.

ONLY A CLOUD—Miss Braddon's New Novel, Chapter XVIII.

EDITORIALS:

The President's Inaugural.
Paragraphs on Minor Topics.

LOCAL AND INTERIOR ITEMS:

The News at Home and Abroad.

NEW BOOKS:

Notices of New Publications.

POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

Sonnet—By C. H. Webb.
Meridiem—By W. A. Kendall.
My Castle in Spain.
Harry and I.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS:

A Condensation of the Telegraphic War News of the Week.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP:

Special Correspondence of THE CALIFORNIAN.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

(For the Californian.)

SONNET.

LAST night, in blue my little love was drest;
And as she walked the room in maiden grace,
I looked into her fair and smiling face
And said that blue became my darling best.
But when, next morn, a snowy virgin vest
And robe of white did the blue one displace,
She seemed a pearl-tinged cloud—and I was Space:
She filled my soul as cloud-forms fill the west.
And so it is that, changing day by day—
Changing her robe but not her loveliness,
Whether the gown be blue or white or gray,
I deem that one the most becoming dress—
The truth is this: in any robe or way
I love her just the same, and cannot love her less.

C. H. WEBB.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 11th, 1865.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, March 11th, 1865.

IT has become pretty generally known that San Francisco attempted a celebration on Saturday last, though the oaths of several well-known citizens were necessary to establish the fact.

WHAT A DAY BROUGHT FOURTH.

Commendation of the success which crowned the attempt might go much further if one could stop with the first syllable of the affair aimed at, for one could then write that it was a capital cel—an excellent cel—leaving the balance of the word to be filled up on the coming Fourth of July.

My idea of a celebration in this town is that a few of the oldest and wealthiest citizens get drunk and little boys explode fire-crackers and torpedos in the most frequented streets annoying sober people and scaring horses almost as badly as the broken-down lawyers and dilapidated politicians do who always avail themselves of these occasions to make stump speeches.

The term stump speeches originated, I suppose, from the fact that when speaking these gentlemen take the stump of a cigar from their mouths, and put it on the platform, or beer barrel by their side, to be resumed when the audience has dispersed.

Why we couldn't get up a better Jubilee in this town I do not see, for the Lord knows there are enough Jews here.

I only regret I cannot add that Gentlemen are plenty in the same proportion.

MY RETURN FROM THE COUNTRY.

Last week I announced my intention of going out from town when the affair came off, and I am now very glad I carried that intention out, for that one virtuous action of my life spared me considerable mortification.

I returned yesterday morning, and my friends all asked where had been for a week back.

To which I of course replied that I hadn't got a weak back, and hadn't been anywhere for one.

It grieved me to find several fellows whom I left in excellent health confined to their rooms and suffering from the pangs produced by prolonged dissipation.

One of them in particular, who is an excellent and a worthy man, notwithstanding that he is a proficient in the seven deadly sins—which may all be lumped together as seven-up—I took by the hand and talked to in a sensible way.

HOW I TALK TO MY FRIENDS.

"John," said I, "cave adsum—which may be liberally translated, as beware of being caved in the head by the adze of the cooper who made the whisky-barrel around which you linger overmuchly latterly. It has surprised me several times of late to find one who was fond of that neat gentleman's game, Seven-up, down on All Fours. Illustrative of the little moral lecture I propose for your benefit, last night you were High—if you asked me what further you made, I could only reply that you made a fool of yourself. But this morning you are Low—natural enough, for your friends all remark that latterly you are running to the deuce. And unless you pay a little more attention to saving your tens—as well as your twenties—and beg oftener, some day you'll be swung for, Jack will be caught, and going it a Lone Mountain will be the only thing left for you; there they'll turn up a spade for you and there you'll have to remain till the last trump is played."

My friend, who understands 'Oyle thoroughly, and, aside from the bad lead he lately struck has been doing remarkably well, thanked me for my advice, pardoned me for boring him, and said he had a large petroleum interest at the East, in which he would give me an interest if it turned out well.

He has promised never again to drink enough to prevent him from spelling and pronouncing General Schemmelfinnig's name, and that is quite equivalent to signing the pledge. He may be set down as a sober man forever hereafter.

To return to the celebration: I fancy that one reason of its failure comes from the fact that, notwithstanding their boasted liberality, when it actually comes down to the point, and the plate is passed around, the people of this city of ours are lamentably mean and opposed to spending money for a celebration, or anything else, if the issue can be dodged.

OUR BOASTED LIBERALITY.

They give tolerably well to the Sanitary Commission, but they take remarkably good care that their names shall find their way into print and are eternally telling how much they have given—blowing more over their liberality than could a pair of Bellows.

After all, when the figures are examined carefully, it is discovered that California has not yet given her proportion to support the war, notwithstanding that she has purchased exemption from the drafts and from all the horrors that deluge the other states which have contributed more money as well as their best blood to the cause.

The money contributed here was the result of much eloquence, considerable coaxing, and no little flattery. The warm-hearted oratory of Thomas Starr King was the wand in the prophet's hand which struck the Horeb of our hearts and drew thence a living and gushing spring.

All this I tell to my fellow-citizens with no tender regard for their exalted opinion of the magnitude of that liberality which they have been persuaded into believing that they possess. It is but the other day that a woman died simply of starvation, not a stone's throw from the doors of one of the most wealthy churches in our city. People of wealth assisted to bury her when dead, I am told; but show me the one who gave her bread when living!

O people of this great, growing and populous city! where Yellow Jacket has lately risen to twenty-five hundred dollars a foot, Crown Point to fifteen hundred—and I haven't got an inch of either; sometimes I feel like telling you, openly and plainly, the substance of what I delicately insinuate when I say that, notwithstanding all your pride and pretension, when we come down to the bed rock you are in the majority of instances desperately mean.

To illustrate which proposition it is only necessary to state that the ingenious device of buttons for contribution boxes was discovered in this city, and that it was here, a few years since, that the preacher announced a collection in about the following words:

"My Christian friends, a collection will now be taken up for the benefit of the heathen in the Sandwich Islands. And here I wish to warn those of you who put in buttons against the too prevalent custom of flattening down the eyes, which, while it has no effect in deceiving the poor heathen into the use of these articles for coin, nevertheless renders them totally useless for buttons."

THE GREAT AND GLORIOUS EXCEPTIONS.

Of course there are great and glorious exceptions to all general rules; for aside from my own personal friends I have now in my mind's eye, a number of generous souls who subscribed most liberally to THE CALIFORNIAN. But a little eleven—that is the exact number of the persons to whom I allude—cannot leaven the whole lump. Why does not everybody subscribe without regard to age, size, sex or condition? Tell me that, and having told me that go on and tell me why this is thus!

HOW THE STRIKE STRIKES US.

Those who live, move and breathe at the hotels, tell me that they suffer much at the hands of the new waiters, and that they'd like to see the old ones back, even if the proprietors had to pay them lower wages.

I for my part have found the boys of the new regime active and willing, though even with my prepossession in their favor I cannot pronounce them experts.

Many of them are evidently accomplished gentlemen, accustomed to the higher walks of life. One, for instance, has previously been a hod-carrier, and must have been eminent as a lad on a ladder. Another was for several years a banker, whom the people of Mud Springs yet esteem and venerate. Then we have a green-grocer's clerk, a retired fish-merchant, a gigantic stevedore, a gentlemanly drayman from an interior town, a man who assisted materially in building the Market-street railroad, the returned Superintendent of a Mexican mine, one of the jurymen in the late libel case, a dragoon who was discharged from the foot service with a pension, and the inventor of a patent washing-machine.

It sometimes embarrasses me to ask these gentlemen to bring me things, and the other day I could not resist the temptation of inviting one of them to sit in a vacant chair by my side and have a glass of wine with me, in a social way.

Really, it touches my sensibilities to see talent so thrown away and exerted in spheres where it is not appreciated. Is there no other circle of usefulness where they can move, and which they are calculated to adorn?

A SCARLET PLUME FOR THE HERON.

Hester Prynne is now having a run on our theatrical boards. It is dramatized from one of Hawthorne's best novels, The Scarlet Letter—so named I suppose by the author because he wanted his work to be well red.

I have not time this week to write anything about the play, owing principally to the fact that this paper will be put to press a few hours before the play is brought out, but I intend to see it, and I also advise all my friends to avail themselves of an opportunity which may never occur to them again. As an afterpiece they might put on The Encyclical Letter, and perhaps Wheatleigh might be allowed to lend his Bull in a China Shop as an afterpiece to the latter.

OPEN FOR A BRIBE.

Having occasion to drive out this afternoon on the Bush street road, the idea occurs to me that were I a Supervisor, and did anyone offer me two hundred and fifty dollars in gold coin and a box for permission to repair the mud-hole on the corner of Mason street, making the road passable, I'd accept it even at the risk of getting into a bad box myself. For, in its present condition, that corner is one of the most villainous sink-holes and provocatives to profanity that the city affords.

INIGO.

MY CASTLE IN SPAIN.

"C'est agréable à faire des châteaux en Espagne."

THERE'S a castle in Spain, very charming to see,
Though built without money or toil;
Of this handsome estate I am owner in fee,
And paramount lord of the soil;
And oft as I may I'm accustomed to go
And live, like a king, in my Spanish Chateau!

There's a dame, most bewitchingly rounded and ripe,
Whose wishes are never absurd;
Who does n't object to my smoking a pipe,
Nor insist on the ultimate word;
In short, she's the pink of perfection, you know;
And she lives, like a queen, in my Spanish Chateau!

I've a family, too; the delightfulest girls,
And a bevy of beautiful boys;
All quite the reverse of those juvenile churls
Whose pleasure is mischief and noise:
No modern Cornelia might venture to show
Such jewels as those in my Spanish Chateau!

I have servants who seek their contentment in mine,
And always mind what they are at;
Who never embezzle the sugar and wine,
And slander the innocent eat;
Neither saucy, nor careless, nor stupidly slow
Are the servants who wait in my Spanish Chateau!

I have pleasant companions—most affable folk—
And each with the heart of a brother;
Keen wits who enjoy an antagonist's joke,
And beauties who're foud of each other;
Such people, as you never may know
Unless you should come to my Spanish Chateau!

I have friends whose commission for wearing the name
In kindness unflinching is shown;
Who pay to another the duty they claim,
And deem his successes their own;
Who joy in his gladness, and weep at his woe;
You'll find them (where else?) in my Spanish Chateau!

"O si sic semper!" I oftentimes say,
(Though 'tis idle, I know, to complain)
To think that again I must force me away
From my beautiful castle in Spain!
Ah!—would that my stars had determined it so
I might live the year round in my Spanish Chateau!

[J. G. Saxe.]

A STORY OF SWEDEN.

CHRISTINA of Sweden, only child and successor to Gustavus Adolphus, the Lion of the North, and right arm, as he was called, of the Protestant faith, ascended the throne of her ancestors at a very early age. She was a woman of considerable talents, but more remarkable for energy of character and an indomitable will; qualities which she inherited from her father, and which her position, as the uncontrolled head of an almost absolute monarchy, nursed into more than masculine strength. Her wilfulness always displayed itself in a rash, though sometimes in a generous way; and in one of her fits of the latter kind, ere she had advanced far in life, she formally resigned her crown, for the good, as she imagined, of her people. The sacrifice was soon repented of, but too late for retrieval, and she spent her latter days in retirement. It was this extraordinary woman's leading wish, when on the throne, to be compared to Elizabeth of England, and she imitated that princess even in her cold-hearted and unworthy coquetries. Hereby hangs the tale we have now to tell.

The young Queen of Sweden gave a magnificent fete or masquerade in her palace at Stockholm. This fete had a peculiar character, and one which doubled its splendor and attractions, while exhibiting, at the same time, the ruling foible of the heroine of the north. Christina wished, for one night, to have the pleasure of openly and expressly bearing the character of the English princess, and to resuscitate around her all that was brilliant and distinguished at the Court of her model. For this purpose she had given orders that her own courtiers should assume for the time the characters of the various men of note in Elizabeth's reign, and, in particular cases, she conferred on individuals the honor of assigning to them the parts they were to play. This was rather a delicate point, it must be remembered; for such parts as those of "Essex" and "Leicester" had a significance attached to them which could not escape remark. Any old statesman might play "Burleigh," as easily as is done in Mr. Puff's famous drama; but no common man durst assume the character of either of the two noblemen before mentioned. A modest aspirant for royal favor, however, might venture on the garb of a "Raleigh," and more than one young courtier did appear in the guise of Sir Walter, on this brilliant evening. The Swedish Queen was delighted with the result of her project. A strict etiquette had been established for the regulation of costume, and, in order to give a better rule of guidance in this particular, Christina had been at the pains to send for portraits of all the principal persons to be represented. Thus the verisimilitude of the scene was rendered perfect.

Among the individuals who attracted most interest on this occasion, by their appearance and manners, were a young cavalier and an elegant woman, who kept much beside one another during the evening. They were both distinguished for the high-bred ease and grace of their movements, and this circumstance alone, independently of the language in which they spoke to each other, might have served to mark them as foreigners. They were both, indeed, from France. They seemed to be on the most confidential terms; but there was one notable point of discrepancy apparent between them. The lady seemed willing and even desirous to show herself openly in the crowd, whereas her companion evidently sought to keep himself as much as possible out of the common eye, and, in particular, to avoid the notice of the Queen, as she moved from place to place in the splendid assembly. Ultimately, the young cavalier appeared to succeed in bending his companion to his wishes on this subject, and the pair retired to the recess of one of the lofty windows, where they commenced an animated conversation, though in low tones. Young and light-hearted, and possessing the spirited temperament of their common country, with a full share of its turn for raillery, they scanned, from their secluded nook, the whole of the vast assembly, and subjected every one who caught their eyes to a witty but good-humored review.

"Ah," said the lady, "look at that little Leicester; what think you of him?"

"Poor fellow! he does not see that the Queen wished to make a caricature of him, by putting him into such a garb!" said the gentleman in return.

"Lord Burleigh's representative," continued the lady, "has got the wig at least—but nothing more."

"And see," rejoined her companion, "how 'Sir Christopher Hatton' bears himself! The English cavalier, it is said, could dance well, but his personator is pleased to make himself a walking minuet."

In such a style did the cavalier and the lady chat for one another's amusement in the window recess. At last, the lady, with an appearance of nonchalance, but with a tone of voice that betrayed some deeper interest in the matter, said to her companion: "Apropos—the Queen herself—how do you like her?"

"The Queen!" replied the cavalier in a low voice, casting around him a troubled glance.

"Yes," continued the lady; "do you think she resembles Elizabeth of England?"

"Between us—just as much as Madame Laura resembles Maria Theresa of France!" was the youth's answer. As the last words left his lips, he grew deadly pale. His companion alone seemed to enjoy the remark. "Admirable!" cried she, and signalized her sense of the joke which was conveyed to her by the words, by a hearty laugh. But her mirth received a sudden check as her eye fell on the personage who now stood in front of her and her companion.

"Who is this Madame Laura?" said the Queen Christina: for it was she herself who now appeared before the cavalier and the lady, having overheard all that had passed.

At this question, the cavalier, previously much agitated, was compelled to lean on the window. But he recovered himself sufficiently to reply, though with an altered and faltering voice, to the Queen's interrogatory: "Madame Laura, please your Majesty, is a Parisian lady, who has the honor to resemble the Queen of France—both in dignity of manners and beauty."

Christina looked on the speaker with an air of doubt and indecision. "Count d'Harcourt," said she after a pause, biting her lips at the same time, "this is a trait of French gallantry for which the Queen of Sweden may thank you at some future period." Nodding slightly and haughtily to the Count's fair companion, Christina then turned away, and with majestic step moved to the spot where a band of courtiers were engaged at the card-table. Meanwhile the whisper passed from tongue to tongue: "The Queen has spoken particularly to the young Frenchman; his fortune is made." The object of their remarks, on the other hand, was at that moment uttering to himself, "I am ruined—lost!" And taking leave of his former companion, almost without a word on either side, the Count d'Harcourt left the assembly.

Christina, after speaking as has been related, went directly to the Ambassador of France, whom she drew aside from the crowd. "I have a favor to ask of your excellency," said she, "under the seal of secrecy."

"Your Majesty has but to speak," said the diplomatist gravely, "and I shall be proud to obey you to the utmost of my power."

"I assure you," returned the Queen, "your power will not be severely taxed at present. It is but a trifle—a bagatelle—that I am interested about just now; but I think you are the only person who can gratify my wish. I desire but to know who and what a certain Parisian lady is, who bears the name of Madame Laura?"

"Madame Laura—Madame Laura!" rejoined the ambassador, turning his eyes on the ground.

"Yes, Madame Laura," said the queen impatiently; "does your excellency know her?"

Upon the diplomatist avouching that he never in his life had heard of such a lady, Christina tapped the ground restlessly with her foot, and appeared annoyed. "Then your excellency," said she at length, with an imperious voice, "will have the goodness to favor me by finding out the lady. Let an express set out for Paris this night, and return without a moment's delay with full details respecting the position and character of this Madame Laura." The ambassador bowed respectfully, and retired to give immediate orders to a courier to proceed on this extraordinary mission.

It has been said that the Queen of Sweden imitated or at least resembled Elizabeth in her fashion of coquetting with some favored noble of her court. The personage on whom, at the date of our story, the favor of Christina seemed to have fallen, was that young Frenchman, who, exiled for political reasons from his own country, had come to Sweden in the hope of obtaining military service. The Queen received him with peculiar marks of distinction, gave him a commission in her life-guards, and conducted herself towards him, altogether, in such a manner as would have given even a very modest man reason to believe himself an object of marked regard. To a young man of twenty-five, bold and ambitious, such a conviction was likely to be flattering and seductive. We cannot say that it was not so in the case of Count d'Harcourt, but whatever might be his dreams of ambition, his affections had lighted on another object than the sovereign of Sweden. This was the Baroness Helena, of Steinberg, a young and beautiful countrywoman of his own, and the widow of a deceased Swedish noble. The baroness returned d'Harcourt's passion warmly, and the jealous eye of love soon advised her of the potent rival with whom she had to combat for his affection. On the occasion of the masked ball, Christina had herself designed to suggest the character of Essex to the young Count d'Harcourt. The baroness, when informed of the circumstance, saw its full significance, and was bold enough to venture on answering the hint of the Queen by a covert allusion of the same practical kind. Finding a portrait of Lady Sidney, widow of Sir Philip, whom Essex had privately made his countess, the baroness had assumed the character of that lady at the risk of giving offence. Hence the unwillingness of d'Harcourt to attract attention at the masquerade, the baroness being then his companion. Well would it have been for the young noble had he been equally cautious with regard to his speech! But in reality, the costume of Christina, which had called from him the mysterious remark about Madame Laura, was somewhat ridiculous. The numberless frills of Elizabeth's usual dress, with all its other stiff and stately points, were very much out of place on the restless, careless, and petulant Queen of Sweden. Perhaps she was partly suspicious of this on reflection, and the more galling was the idea of being an object of ridicule to the man she favored, and, above all, to her rival in his regard.

The impatient Queen received an answer from Paris in eight days, so actively did the courier fulfil the orders given. "Madame Laura," said the document which he brought, "is a Court lady, who has become mad. Her mania consists in a belief that she is Queen of France, and in her endeavor to rival the real sovereign, Maria Theresa, in all her dresses and decorations. The poor woman passes her life in this sole occupation. The Queen never assumes a habit which is not seen immediately afterwards on Madame Laura. As she is as inoffensive as ridiculous, nobody meddles with her, and she is everywhere known in Paris by the name of the 'Queen's caricature.' This dispatch had additional details of the same kind, and concluded by exhibiting a portraiture of poor Madame Laura, dressed as Maria Theresa, and looking inexpressibly ridiculous.

The rage of the Queen of Sweden knew no bounds. She had conceived that there was some little point about d'Harcourt's comparison somewhat unfavorable, but to find that she had been compared altogether to a vain and ridiculous madwoman—she, the heroine and pride of the north—she, who had almost allowed the author of this gross insult to know that she loved him—she, to be an object of contempt to this strange youth and his Lady Sidney, the woman for whom he seemed to reject herself—such a thought was torturing to the heart of the proud and wilful princess. "Wretches!" she exclaimed, "this is the comparison you would have had me to believe a compliment!" Filled with such emotions, the queen again chanced to look at the detailed account of Madame Laura. "Innocent as the madness of the lady really is," said one part of the paper, "she is an austere sovereign, and by no means inclined to admit clemency among the royal virtues. She speaks ever of executing justice." The passage tallied with the state of the queen's mind. "Yes," cried she, "if I am ridiculous, like her, I will be similar to her in all things." Then she set herself to discover a fit chastisement for d'Harcourt. None appeared to her sufficiently heavy, sharp, or sudden. In this temper passed the day on which she received this galling document from Paris.

Sleep, or the calm of night, brought a change over her feelings. She arose with an altered mind from her couch, and in place of an order for his confinement, in a dungeon, she sent to d'Harcourt, on that morning, the brevet of the additional rank of lieutenant-colonel.

The Count, who had been preparing himself for leaving Stockholm, was surprised and confounded on receiving this intelligence. He was the more so, as he had not the least doubt but that the Queen must have discovered the secret of his allusion to Madame Laura, from some of the Frenchmen about the court. The conduct of Christina thus appeared to him in a most magnanimous light, and a light very dangerous to his fidelity to the Baroness de Steinberg. Still more was this the case, when after the lapse of but a few months, he was raised to the rank of colonel, and, subsequently, on the occasion of his performance of a gallant action, was honored with the rank of general, and the key of chamberlain of the household. He was induced also to become a naturalized Swede, as a step to further greatness.

All eyes were now turned upon the rising young Frenchman, and it was thought that the premiership, if not a higher honor, was within his grasp. He was in a trying position. He was charmed with the Queen's generosity of heart, and believed that she must love him, though nothing but her kindly actions, and, it may be, her looks, had indicated it hitherto; and he had never dared to enter upon such a subject. Indeed, dazzled as he was by the prospect of personal favor from a young, powerful, and not unlovely princess, d'Harcourt still felt his heart to be with the Baroness de Steinberg. His fidelity to the latter, and his ambition, came at length to a direct trial—a struggle for superiority. The Baroness de Steinberg had seen, with mingled feelings of pain and pleasure, the elevation of her lover, but the sense of pain predominated. She saw that ambition was estranging him from her. One day, accordingly, she wrote to him, announcing her intention to leave Stockholm that evening, but plainly indicating that if he yet loved her enough to retain her, she would not go. At the same moment, almost, the Count received a letter from the Queen, desiring his immediate presence at a private consultation with her council. This was equivalent to an announcement of a new honor awaiting him. The Count was deeply agitated by this dilemma, but ambition, or what he would fain have called duty, gained the day. He neglected the invitation of the Baroness, and went to the palace, seals and portfolios dancing before his mind's eye by the way.

The Queen was seated in council when he was announced. All smiled upon the favorite; but Christina signified her wish for the whole to retire, and d'Harcourt was left alone with her. She was pale, and he also was agitated. It seemed to him as if the moment was come when a crown was to fall on his head. After a pause, the Queen lifted a portfolio, stamped with the royal arms, the symbol of supreme if not royal power, and holding it out, said: "Do you desire it?"

The smile of the Queen made the intoxicated young noble interpret this into, "Do you love me?" and he fell on his knees, exclaiming in answer, "Yes, I love you, as much as I reverence and admire you!" He continued in this strain for a short time, when the Queen interrupted him—and what an interruption!

"Enough!" cried she, in a tone that froze the blood in the Count's heart, a tone resembling that of a player who casts aside a mask he has worn for a time. The dismayed Count would have risen, but she imperiously signed to him to remain. "At length," continued she, in a tone of concentrated bitterness, "at length I see you there—and the hour of my revenge is come!" d'Harcourt fell back, with his head upon a fauteuil, dumb and motionless. "Yes!" resumed Christina, "I knew that you loved me, but I wished to hear you declare it, as I can now say, as a woman, what I might long since have said as a queen, that I—scorn and despise you!"

A groan was all the reply of the undeceived and unfortunate Count.

"Yes, I have raised you," continued the Queen, "only for the enjoyment of this hour. Elizabeth raised the Earl of Essex step by step to place and honor. So have I done by you. But there is a further step. If I cannot be Elizabeth, as Madame Laura, whom I resemble so much, and who is equally cruel as mad, I may fairly finish the similitude. You remember the end of Essex!"

"Death!" exclaimed the agitated Count, involuntarily.

"Yes! death on the scaffold," said the Queen. "I have taken care to naturalize you in Sweden, and you are at my discretion. But I will conclude this affair in a manner more worthy of Madame Laura, and consequently of me," added Christina bitterly. As she spoke, she summoned the councilors to re-enter.

"This man," said she to them, "is insane. Let him be conveyed to the madhouse!" Dumb with horror, the Count d'Harcourt was taken from the royal presence.

Insanity really attacked the unhappy man. But, from the tenderness of one woman, he found a partial remedy for the cruelty of another. On hearing of his doom, which was mitigated in time, the Baroness de Steinberg, forgetful of all her wrongs, flew back to Stockholm. Her future days were dedicated to the solacement of the broken-spirited Count d'Harcourt.—From the French.

INEZ DE CASTRO.

THE lengthened and varied annals of the Peninsula contain no episode more deeply interesting than that which the reader will find laid before him in the following brief and unvarnished narrative. The scene of the story was Portugal, and the time the middle of the fourteenth century, when Alfonso IV. sat upon the throne of that country. This prince had been distinguished in his youth for the display of almost every bad quality, having rebelled more than once against his father, and so embroiled the kingdom in repeated civil discords. When he ascended the throne, he exhibited that total disregard for his new duties which might have been expected from his previous conduct, until a solemn and bold warning from one of his chief nobles effected a compulsory reformation, rendered comparatively durable by fears for his personal safety. The caution referred to was thus given. The council of state had long waited for him one day, having affairs of consequence to transact. Alfonso had gone a-hunting, and when he appeared at length in council, it was only to entertain the grave statesmen and nobles there assembled, with an account of his day's sport. "Sire," said one of the councillors, "we did not come here to listen to things fitted for the ears of huntsmen. If your highness will attend to the necessities of your subjects, you will have humble and faithful vassals; if not"—"What then?" cried the angry king. The minister calmly proceeded—"If not, they will seek another king!" Alfonso broke forth into a torrent of invectives; but something in the manner of those around him compelled him ultimately to moderate his passion, and to promise that, from that time forward, they would find in him "not Alfonso the hunter, but Alfonso the king."

To this seasonable warning, history tells us, the Portuguese people owed many public benefits during the remainder of Alfonso's reign; but the reformation did not extend to the king's private conduct. His son and heir, Dom Pedro, was united in marriage to Constance, daughter of a powerful Castilian prince. The affections of the Infante, as the heir-apparent was called, were not consulted or engaged in this match. He was strongly attached, in fact, to another lady, named Inez de Castro, the daughter of a noble Castilian who had sought refuge in Portugal from perils incurred in his native province. This attachment was mutual, yet Pedro remained true to his vows to Constance, and lived in unbroken harmony with her. It is admitted by all annalists that the virtuous fidelity and self-command exhibited by the Portuguese prince were as commendable as they were rare, in stations like his, at that period of the world's history. However, King Alfonso was aware of his son's passion for Inez de Castro; and from the fear that circumstances might yet occur to bring about a match between them, which he regarded as one unworthy of the royal house of Portugal, the king caused Donna Inez to stand godmother to one of the Infante's children by Constance, thus creating a spiritual bar to the possibility of future wedlock between the two parties. The Church of Rome forbade the union of the sponsor of an infant with its real parent.

Nevertheless, when Constance died, as she did after being married but a few years, Dom Pedro's attachment set all such obstacles at defiance. He obtained a papal dispensation, and married Inez de Castro. At the same time, he concealed his marriage from his father and the public, the lady consenting rather to bear the imputation of an illegal connexion, than to subject the Infante to the risk of Alfonso's anger. For some years, Inez lived in great seclusion at Coimbra, where she bore four children to her husband, namely, Alfonso, John, Dennis, and Beatrice. Unacknowledged as this union was, the court, nevertheless, suspected something of the kind. In his private conduct, Pedro not only exhibited all the affection and constancy of a husband as regarded Inez, but peremptorily declined entering into any of the new matrimonial engagements which his father was perpetually proposing to him. Inez de Castro, therefore, could not but be an object of suspicion to Alfonso and his confidants, and she unfortunately incurred, through other circumstances, a degree of additional odium, which brought on the crisis of her fate. The despotism of the reigning sovereign of Castile caused many of her countrymen to fly to Portugal for protection; and by gaining for them the favor of her husband, the Infante, she was able to place them in a position that excited the envy of the native courtiers. A strong party was by degrees formed against Inez, and to these persons it became an object of importance to dispose of the unfortunate lady, ere the demise of Alfonso called his son to the throne, and consolidated her power beyond all possibility of overthrow.

This inimical party commenced operations by working on the fears of the old king, and persuading him that the life and rights of Ferdinand, his grandson by Constance, were endangered by the influence of Inez de Castro. They brought Alfonso to the belief that the death of that unfortunate lady was indispensable to the security of the royal line, and the general peace of the country; and at length the king consented to the execution of the cruel purpose to which his mind had thus been made familiar. Pedro was absent on a lengthened hunting excursion, and, during that absence, Alfonso betook himself to Coimbra, accompanied by Gonsalves,

Pacheco, and Coelho, those of his courtiers most hostile to Inez de Castro. He entered the dwelling where she had lived so many years in peace with her family. Alone, with her protector and husband far away, the unhappy woman beheld this intrusion with mortal alarm. She gathered her children about her, as if her feeble arms could save them from peril, and prostrated herself along with them at the feet of the old king. She implored him to have pity on his innocent grandchildren, and on herself, their mother. The king was not without natural feelings, and these were touched by the appeal made to him, and by the sight of his son's lovely offspring, and their still beautiful mother. He left her uninjured, and rejoined the three courtiers, who eagerly waited outside, expectant of a summons to complete the bloody act in contemplation. Their arguments speedily cured the king of his humane relents, and he gave them authority to return to the chamber of Inez, and dispatch her with their daggers. The three courtiers waited for no second orders, but in a few minutes had dyed their weapons in the blood of the defenceless wife of the Infante. They then hurried with the king from the scene of their barbarous crime.

Dom Pedro's rage and grief were violent in proportion to his affection for Inez, and to the happiness he had enjoyed during their wedded life. From the hour of her death, his very nature seemed to be changed, and one absorbing, overwhelming passion, the desire of revenge, took possession of his soul. In the first burst of his resentment he took arms against his father, and commenced a bloody civil war. The contest was terminated, however, by the interposition of the aged queen, who represented to her son the injustice of continuing to punish the whole country for the crime of one or a few. Pedro was alive to the justice of this appeal, and laid down his arms, to save the nation from further calamities. He submitted even to a reconciliation with his father, who thenceforth employed all possible means to appease his son, and divert his thoughts from the murdered Inez. However, Alfonso allowed the actual assassins to quit the country, and take refuge in Castile. Whether or not the old monarch succeeded in banishing the remembrance of Inez from the breast of the Infante, was made apparent soon afterwards, when the latter, by the demise of his father, was called to the throne.

The first act of the new king was to conclude a treaty with the reigning sovereign of Castile, by which all fugitives were to be given up on both sides. Pedro of Portugal showed a desire to effect this compact at any cost. He betrothed his three sons to the daughters of the Castilian sovereign, though these daughters were illegitimate, being the offspring of Maria de Padilla, a lady for whose sake the King of Castile had cruelly misused his wedded queen. By giving his assent to this arrangement, and any others stipulated for by the other contracting party, Pedro accomplished the grand object of his wishes—the gratification of what had become the ruling passion of his life. He got into his hands the murderers of Inez de Castro. From these men Pedro had certainly received a mortal injury, and one that deserved the punishment of death. They had cruelly and treacherously violated the privacy of his home, and forever ruined its happiness, by dipping their hands in the blood of an unoffending woman, the wife of his bosom, and the mother of his infants. But the death which Pedro inflicted on these men was one not to be excused even by the greatness of their crime. Gonsalves and Coelho (for Pacheco escaped seizure) perished by tortures too painful to describe. Naturally a man of no ungentle nature, and even admittedly possessed of many virtues, Pedro is said to have glutted his eyes with the sufferings of his victims, all other feelings being lost in the gratification of the one great passion of revenge.

Nor was the monarch satisfied with this offering to the manes of his wife. After the execution of her slayers, he assembled the cortes, and solemnly took oath that he had obtained a papal dispensation for his marriage with Inez de Castro, and that that marriage had taken place in presence of the Bishop Guarda and the equerry of his own household. These individuals confirmed by their oaths the statement of the king. This ceremony ended, a new scene took place, of a character almost unexampled in history; a scene so strange, so solemn, so fearfully impressive in its nature, that it is little marvel that the name and fate of Inez de Castro should have afforded a theme for the poet and the painter in all lands, and throughout all succeeding times. In presence of the whole assembled court, the body of Inez de Castro, raised from the quietude of the tomb after a sleep of several years, was placed on the throne beside her husband, and there, gorgeously attired as became the consort of a powerful monarch, was crowned with the queenly diadem of Portugal. The heir-apparent of the sceptre, Prince Ferdinand, son of Constance, knelt in homage before the corpse, and kissed her cold hand, as the first of her subjects. The whole Portuguese nobility, lords and ladies, followed the example of the prince; and, in short, every customary rite was performed which might have accompanied the coronation of the most powerful and popular of living princesses. Pedro, meanwhile, looked on in stern enjoyment of the honors paid to the remains of his beloved wife. The body of Inez was conveyed, immediately after this ceremony, to the royal burial-place at Alcobaca, and there magnificently re-interred. Pedro closed the scene by formally establishing the legitimacy of the children of Inez, and by profusely rewarding all who had ever served her, or had any claims upon her gratitude.

Thus closes the extraordinary history of Inez de Castro. It is but fair to the memory of Pedro to state, that when he had avenged the murder of his consort, and done all in his power to clear her memory from stain, he became to Portugal a just and even popular ruler. To the last, he administered the laws with severity, but at the same time with undeviating impartiality. These qualities perhaps rendered him a ruler more fit for such times than one of milder and more merciful sentiments. He showed, also, that a sovereign austere just could also be habitually generous, and even munificent. Up till the hour of his death, Pedro retained his affection for the memory of Inez de Castro unchanged and undiminished, and it was his frequent custom to retire to her tomb, and there indulge in meditation upon her virtues and her fate.

FROM PODGERS.

NEW YORK, February 21, 1865.

DEAR CALIFORNIAN.—I was unable to jot anything for your columns last steamer in consequence of a most delightful cold caught on board that elegant specimen of naval architecture the steamer North Star; and when I say "a cold," I mean one of the old-fashioned kind that enables one to speak French with that nasal accent so requisite, and makes one feel as if every bone in his body had been pounded for a month. The passengers that left San Francisco January 4th, landed in New York in a state of frigidity that made them look and feel like so many icicles.

AN UNCOMFORTABLE PASSAGE.

For three days before reaching this city we had severe cold weather. Every drop of water froze as soon as it touched the deck, and the bow of the steamer looked like an iceberg. There was no provision for warming the cabin, no stoves, and no bedding. The first cabin passengers had a narrow thin specimen of what was termed a blanket, about thirty inches wide, four being requisite to make a pair—for it was evident that a pair had been split lengthwise to make four—which was ingeniously economical but not comfortable. The second cabin passengers were not so well off, as they had none at all. The water in the staterooms froze solid, and women and children were huddled together for warmth, vainly endeavoring to keep warm by wrapping themselves in all the clothing they could get on. To say we were uncomfortable would fall far short of the facts—we suffered. I know I never was so cold, or suffered so much from cold since I was born. There was no place to go to; no shelter from the piercing wind except below, and there it was Babel broken loose; children crying, mothers scolding, dishes clattering, and waiters rushing to and fro—trying to keep up circulation, I suppose, for all their efforts failed to keep us but a slight degree removed from starvation. The ship was not provided with food for half the number of passengers, and the fare was bad and scarce.

We had heard so much of the "reforms" since the new Company had acquired the line that we did expect to find things a little improved, but we were woefully disappointed; it was, if anything, a little worse than ever. It is but just to say that the officers and waiters were civil and obliging, and did the best they could with the little they had to do it with.

WHAT COMPLAINT EFFECTED.

Having learned that the agents, or rather the Board of Directors of the Company, were desirous of doing the "fair thing," and that an effort had been made on their part to have things "all right," I considered it my duty to call and tell them that they had most signally failed to come up to their promises or the requirements of the public. I was received very courteously, and assured by Mr. C. K. Garrison that it was their intention and determination to furnish their ships with good provisions and plenty of them, and also plenty of clean bedding, blankets, etc., but that the North Star had by some error been allowed to go to sea improperly provided. Mr. Garrison said that hereafter there would be no cause of complaint, and I imagine when the ship left for her next trip she was in better shape. He also informed me that a celebrated caterer had been engaged to superintend the provisioning of the ships of the line, and that orders would be given to put everything on board necessary for the comfort of travellers. So the fuss kicked up by the North Star passengers will result in some good, probably, and hereafter, if the travelling public are not properly provided it is their own fault, for the Atlantic Mail Company seem desirous of doing the fair thing, and, if their attention is called to any "short-comings" will, they say, rectify all errors. There certainly is an ample field for their philanthropy, and I hope it will be exercised to the benefit of those who come and go hereafter.

WHO WANTS TO GO HOME?

If any man, woman or child in California indulges in the folly of wishing himself or herself in New York about these days, it would only be necessary to enjoy the delightful climate of this city about five minutes and they would be cured of their desire, for it is cold enough to freeze the whiskers off a brass cat. It is blowing, snowing, and the north wind goes right through a fellow. Every man you see has icicles hanging from his moustache and beard, and the ladies, despite furs and muffs, look anything but lovely with their red noses.

THE CURIOUS COSTUMES OF GOTHAM.

Speaking of the ladies obliges me to assert that arbitrary fashion has never come so near making them perfectly frightful as at the present time. They all look alike and dress alike, regardless of their different style of features, and the prettiest woman is so disfigured that it is difficult to conceive that she ever could have been good-looking. It is the style to dress the hair so as to make every head look like a last year's bird's nest. The moisture is all taken out in the process of "frizzing," and a handful of tow would answer all the requirements. Light hair is the fashion, and great ingenuity is shown in making it look as much like a flaxen wig as possible. Old and young wear their dresses tucked up, the rule being that the drapery come no lower than the top of the boot; and as the boots are considerably on the "top" order, it follows that the display of ankle is extremely liberal. One woman looks as much like another as two "peas," and all look equally ugly, so that a proper appreciation of them must necessarily be "an acquired taste," like that for oysters and tomatoes. If San Francisco is behind the age, may we remain forever in that state of ignorance, which, in this case, is bliss indeed!

The most comical-looking things are the opera bonnets. Quarter an orange, take the peel from one section, put it over the top of the head, draw the points down to the ears, and you have the pattern exactly; two frizzles in front and a cataract behind completes the picture, and a "rum one" it is to look upon. "Such is fashion."

White chokers, round-tailed dress coats and a reckless display of shirt-hosom is the opera costume for gentlemen. The Dundreary whiskers have had their day, and the moustache and imperial only, worn long, are the style.

CALIFORNIANS AT THE EAST.

Californians are abundant, and many faces, familiar in Montgomery street, are met in Broadway. They all look disconsolate, and wear an expression of "I-wish-I-were-back again"-itiveness. In Washington I met dozens of them, every one having an axe to grind, of course. The new Senators from Nevada had entered upon their duties, and were doing their country good service. Gov. Nye looked lovely, and Stewart has already earned the reputation of being "a good worker." The general impression is that Nevada is both ably and respectably represented. The Hon. Judge Field and lady, and Andrew McCreary and his bride, were at Willard's.

W. R. Garrison and Charley Smith, Esq., arrived in good order and condition, and both look lovely in their new clothes. Charles has gone to the moral town of Boston for a visit.

Mr. Hayward of San Mateo, who came East to get his son discharged from the army, has succeeded in his mission, and is expected here in a few days from Savannah with him.

HOW HORSES FARE WHERE GREENBACKS ARE CURRENT.

I dropped into Mr. Leonard Jerome's stable the other morning as I was going down town, and I could not but wish myself a horse to enjoy its luxuries. There are thousands of people in good circumstances in New York who don't live in half the style Mr. Jerome's horses do. The building is elegant, and attached is a private skating-pond, not for the horses but for children. Everybody skates; it is the fashion, and a lady who is not au fait in this accomplishment is nobody. They do not all skate well, however, as many a bump and ungraceful tumble testifies.

Frank Baker has advertised his stud of horses, his carriages, harness, etc., for sale, on account of his departure for Europe, where he goes in the Spring, and, although ordered to remain in doors in consequence of a cold and cough, I could not resist the temptation of a visit to his stables, which are scarcely inferior to Mr. Jerome's.

I saw the team that trotted in 2.23½ and was reminded of the old captain's remark about his ship, which he said was "a rum 'un to look at, but a good 'un to go." So with Baker's horses; his fast nags are all under size, and this appears to be generally the case here. Small, light horses are universal, and everything must be long-tailed. Short-tailed nags are entirely out of date; it is a mystery what has become of them all, for none are seen in the streets, and it is almost impossible to find a purchaser for a pair of "bobs," no matter how stylish or how fast. Carriages and wagons are very "loud" in the way of paint, and the style would shock San Francisco. I remember being severely criticised for coming out in a "yaller-striped" buggy once upon a time, but that was tame in comparison with the present rainbow hues of a carriage or wagon; and their use is by no means confined to "shoddy," although there is a certain attempt at plainness by the would-be aristocracy; they affect a plainness in dress bordering on slovenliness, and a shabbiness in the way of a "turn-out" that makes the real affectation very apparent. Taking it all in all, Gotham is a pretty fast village, and it takes a cord of greenbacks to live even plainly.

GENERAL "PODGERINGS."

Washington bids fair to be very gay this season, and is crowded to its fullest capacity. I counted five Major-Generals and fifteen Brigadiers in one group; they had come from the front to get warm, although, as a general thing, they have found it pretty warm work on Grant's line.

I heard a good thing as coming from Sherman. When told that the attack on Fort Fisher had failed, he smiled and remarked: "If my boys had been before it, and had been told that there were two dozen chickens inside, they would have had it sure!" The rebels would have called it fowl play of course.

The oil fever continues to run high, and fortunes are made by speculation in oil grounds and claims. If I am not much mistaken the community will have a little chance to discover that they need not go to California to be swindled. They will find the elephant nearer home, and have a chance to ascertain that all the sharp ones have not emigrated, a few more of the same sort being left behind for seed.

California must look to her laurels. Quartz has been discovered in Vermont that pays by actual working $300 to the ton. A company, embracing several old Californians, has been formed to work it.

The most uncertain and precarious of all speculations hereabouts is in gold. The fluctuations in twenty-four hours make and break hundreds. It goes up on the rumor of a success and goes down on its confirmation, the fluctuations being as much as ten per cent. a day without any good reasons for either its rise or its fall. Money is abundant, and a man requires a bushel of it to live decently.

People who contemplate coming on here to sell California mines might as well stay at home and save their money, for "ile" has run quartz leads out of sight, and now we never mention them. They say California is a humbug, and too slow in comparison to Pennsylvania.

Have you an opera yet? There's plenty of it here, which I will tell you about when I hear it. For the benefit of several gentlemen in San Francisco, who were troubled with Richings on the brain or heart, I will mention that Miss R. is playing and singing, and of course charming the good people of her native city, Philadelphia, where she draws large houses—long may she wave! More anon, which means when I feel more like it than I do at these presents.

PODGERS.

SKIMMINGS FROM AN OLD RECEIPT-BOOK.

THROUGH the kindness of a friend, we have obtained a sight of a manuscript receipt-book, written early in the last century, and which latterly seems to have belonged to the Honorable Margaret Murray, a sister of the first Earl of Mansfield. Such books were to be found in every house of any consequence, before printed manuals of cookery had become common. They were generally compiled from one another, with such additions as each lady housekeeper could give from her own skill and experience, or as could be obtained from the skill and experience of her nearest friends and neighbors. Accordingly, many of the receipts were of indefinite antiquity, while others might be considered as nearly contemporary with the date of the particular manuscript in which they appeared. The book before us contains many curious matters, illustrative of the habits of thought and the habits of common life which prevailed rather more than a hundred years ago.

The receipts in this book are not, it must be observed, cookery receipts. They refer to the more refined parts of house-keeping, as the preserving of fruits, the compounding of sweet cakes, and the making of cordials and medicinal preparations. Common cookery would, we presume, be left to servants, who would conduct it according to traditionary rules which no one ever thought of improving; while the ladies themselves would deem it a fair part of duty, to study the mysteries of pastry, preserving, and the concoction of specifics. Not even the highest rank seems to have been exempted from such labors, for, amongst these nostrums, is one entitled "The Countess of Rutland's Receipt for making the rare Bambrury Cakes which was so much praised at her daughter's wedding." If we might judge from the volume in our possession, we would say that much more attention must have been bestowed by the ladies of those days upon confectionery than upon learning, for the spelling is generally of a very original kind, and the handwriting in many parts by no means distinguished for elegance.

It does not seem necessary to bestow any particular notice on the great mass of the receipts in our volume, these referring only to ordinary objects, as "To make marinolate of oranges," "To make a goosberry Fnnl," "To make Cherrie Water," "To make Gilly Flowrwater," "To make Steill Carvie," "To clarify Sween's Saine," "To make goosberry Wine," "To make Curran Wine," etc. Here the titles, we presume, are enough. Our attention, however, is irresistibly arrested when we come to such a characteristic and peculiar receipt as "To make Oyll of Swallows," which proceeds thus: "Take swallows as many as you can get, ten or twelve at the least, and put them quick into a mortar; and put to them lavender cotton, speke, cammouyle, knot grass, ribwort, balm, valerian, rosemary tops, woodbine tops, strings of vines, French mal-lows, the sops of ale hoof [and other ten or twelve like things.] of each of these are handfull; beat all these together, and put thereto a quart of neat's feet oyl, or May butter; stamp them all together, and beat them with one or two ounces of cloves, and put them all together into an earthen pot; stop it verie clos with a piece dough round about, so clos that no air can come out; set them nine days in a cellar, and then take them out and boyle them six or eight hours on the fire, or else in a pan of water; but first open your pat and put in half a pound of wax whit or yellow, and a pint of sellat oyle, and strain them through a canvass cloth." For what purpose on earth could our ladies have designed this unhallowed mixture!

"King Edward's Perfume" is highly characteristic of the age when floors were strewn with rushes, and only cleaned once in a few weeks. "Take twelve spoonfulls of right red rose water, the weight of sixpence in fine powder of sugar, and boyll it on hot embers softly, and the house will smell as though it were full of roses; but you must burn the sweet cypress wood befor, to take away the gross air." "A Cordiall Water of Sir Walter Rouligh's" is also worth giving. "Take a galloun of strawberries, and put them into a pint of aquavita: let them stand four or five days. Strain them gently out, and sweeten the water as you pleas, with fine sugar or with perfume."

Here, however, is a much greater marvel than any of the above, namely, "A Sovereign Water of Doctor Stephen's, which he a long time used; wherewith he did many cures; he kept it secrett till a little befor his death, and then gave it to the bishope of Canterbury in a writing, which is: Take a gallone of good Gascon wine, and take vinegar, gallingall, cinnamun, nutmegs, cloves, grains, anniseeds, fennell seeds, of every of them a dram; then take carroway seeds of red, mintes, rose, tyme, pelletory of the wall, rosemary and wild tyme, camomyle, the leaves if you cannot get the flowrs of small lavender, of each a handfull; then bray the spiret small, and bray the herbs, and put all into the wine, and let it stand twelve hours, stirring it divers times, then still it in a lembik, and kep the first water, for it is best; then put the second water by itself, for it is good, but not of such virtues." Hear, reader, the virtues of this water: "It comforts the vital spir-its, and helps all inward diseases, that come of cold. It is good against the shaking of the palse. It cures the contrac-tion of the sinews. It kills the worms in the belly and stom-ach; it cures the dropsie; whosover useth this water morning and evening and not too often, it preserveth him in good lik-ing, and will make him seem young verie long, and comforteth nature marvellously. With this water did Master Stephen preserve his life till extream age wold not let him goe nor stand, and he continued fyve years when all the physicians judged he [wold] not live a year longer, nor did he use any other medicine but this!"

It will be observed that Dr. Stephen's sovereign water includes an ingredient which has generally been allowed to have a direct effect in "comforting the vital spirits." The same principle is found in all the other cordials described in our receipt-book. We have "The Lord Spencer's Cherrie Water," the basis of which is "ane pottle of new sack," and which is "good for faintings and soundings," likewise "The Lady Spotswood's Stomach Water," the basis of which is "white wine ane pottle;" and "Doctor Butler's Cordial Water against melancholy, most approved," which seems at first to be a mere decoction of a great list of gay spring flowers, until, on looking a little closer, we discern that it, too, has a substantial foundation, in "a quart of Canary wine," so that even we modcrus may well believe the concluding passage—"take of this water at one tyme three spoonfulls thrice a weick, or when you are ill; it cureth all melancholy fumes." So also "A Cordial Water called Sanatifera" rests upon "a Chopine of Brandie," which is only, as it were, by the by, ordered to be poured upon "the ingredients;" not to speak of the concluding direction to "take a spoonful or two amongst a litle warme ale."

There is "A Receipt of Water much magnified by the Hylanders and Italeans, for thikening the hair wher it is, and making it grow where it is not;" but the ingredients are not to be enumerated before polite society. At the bottom of "a Receipt against Melancholy and Madness," we are informed that "the eating of a roasted magpie is very good against Madnness, tho occasioned by witchcraft;" but if it makes the patient worse, vomiting well will make it good." As further illustrations of the habits of ladies of high rank in those days, we have "To make chees, Lady William Hay's way," "How to make Cherrie Brandie, the Countess of Linlithgow's way," a "Receipt to make Gillie of Hartshorn, my Lady Hyndford's way," a "Receipt for Goosberry Vene-gar, my Lady Ormiston's way," and a rival receipt to the last by "Colonel Keith's lady." Lady Balcanquhal, Lady Wood-hall, and Mrs. Isobel Stirling, also appear as authorities on these grave matters. Nor was the sterner sex above lending their aid. The Lord Spencer's Cherrie Water has already been alluded to. We have also "The Lord Barron Halmon's True Receipt of the Queen of Hungarie's water," and "Lord Neill Campbell's Receipt for a Squinancy, which he bought for 3 guinies from a mason who lived by it when he could not work." This Lord Neill was a younger son of the famous Marquis of Argyll, beheaded at the Restoration. That men of such rank should have put faith in obscure nostrums practised by the humblest and most ignorant of the commu-nity, shows in a striking light the imperfect wisdom of those times.

(For the Californian.)

M E R I D I E M .

FILL once again with wine, the best and last,
The hour has come the dregs are to be cast—
The regal opulence of Youth is past.

Here let dear memories mingle, as is fit—

The glow of embers ne'er to be re-lit.

The tunes of Song, the genius-gleams of Wit;

Fill, fill! fill high! Fill to the crystal brim!

And while the sparkling hubble-jewels swim,

Drain to the echo of a dying hymn.

Drain to the murky bottom of the glass—

Drain while the Noon of Life is at high mass—

The shiver of the cups shall cry, "Alas!"

Join in with reckless tongues of hopeless men,
The closing cadence of the grand HAS BEEN—
Ring out this requiem of a Soul's amen!

Oh, for the supple bow for aye unbent!

Oh, for the jocund sense of young content!

Oh, for the star-designs the storms have rent!

Oh, for the passion-second's crimson flight!

Oh, for the moments of supreme delight!

Oh, for the full moon and the honey night!

Oh, for the red, red draught of drunken blisses!

Oh, for the aromatic rapture kisses!

Oh, for the love-hooms and the dream abysses!

Oh, a million times! and all in vain—

The Spring will ne'er return to me again,

With dappled skies and balmy drops of rain.

The lustrous fires that flushed me full of zest,

The amplitude of warmth that overleest,

Have flamed!—and sank to everlasting rest.

In Indian summer retrospect I view

The gorgeous hours my wanton luxury slew,

The while their velvet lips were wet with dew—

Dash down the glasses! Let the fragments lay—

Come, penance of exhaustion and decay,

This, this is Pleasure's terrible death-day!

O vanished fragrance of the morning air!

O torrid splendors lost beyond repair!

The icy night-winds cut me to despair!

And why do I despair? 'Tis that I think

I never more will hear god-glasses clink,

And nevermore of Nature's blood-wine drink.

But say you, when I'm gone, "His heart was bold,"

And say you, too, "He was no slave to gold,

And laid no joys away to rust and mould."

Now with the glistening fragments at my back,

I face the Sun upon his palling track,

Declining swiftly into darkness black.

Come others to the revel's vacant seat,

With glasses brimmed and lips of virgin sweet—

After the carnival we'll fitly greet.

O Spring! O Summer! O unsunned decline!

Sad season of dead thirsts, I now am thine—

At last the Flagon-World is drained of wine!

W. A. KENDALL.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 11th, 1865.

OUR PETROLEUM ON ITS TRAVELS.—Big stories seem to grow bigger by travelling. No great excitement was produced here by Professor Silliman's remarkable discoveries in the Lower Country, but New York saw them in a different light. And the following item we clip from the Irish Times, a Dublin news-paper:

PETROLEUM IN CALIFORNIA A New York paper states that Professor Sullivan examined part of Southern California in the summer and found oil equal in quality to the best in Pennsylvania struggling to the surface and running to waste down the river for miles. It has been regarded as a nuisance, rendering barren tracks of land of perhaps a mile square in the midst of a fine agricultural district.

It will be noticed that the name Silliman has been Hiber-nicised into Sullivan. The name which the Professor received at the baptismal font, however, read in the light of his reports and predictions about mines which in no instance proved cor-rect, seems his most appropriate one. It is gratifying to know that measures have been taken to prevent the oil from run-ning to waste in rivers after its struggles to reach the surface, and to make the wilderness which it has created "blossom like the rose"—like rows of barrels in fact.

PATENT CARPET CLEANING.—The old system of beating dust in the carpets, as well as out of them, has been super-ceeded in all the cities of the East, by the "patent steam-power beating machine," which thoroughly cleanses the car-pets without the least injury or strain. J. Spaulding & Co., announces elsewhere in our columns, the depot where all or-ders may be left.

LOCAL MATTERS.

Inauguration Day (Saturday last) was honored with a will, but—owing to defective arrangements, in part, liberally sec-onded by weather of a character calculated to dampen the ardor of the most patriotic—the will took the place of the deed. As the celebration contemplated not only a testimo-nial of satisfaction at the re-election of "Honest Abe," but a rejoicing for the important victories lately won by our armies, all loyal men had sufficient incentive to assist in making the demonstration worthy the city and one befitting, at least, one or the other of the events referred to. How-ever, it is better in reviewing this first grand celebration-failure in San Francisco, to draw consolation from the fact that if the Committee had invited the military, who "stood ready to accept," and had made such other preparations as were naturally expected, the unfriendly agent of the consoli-dated celestial water-company would have spoiled the fun, at last, for the greater portion of the day. Had city-editors taken this view of the matter, and omitted sundry suggestive paragraphs, doubtless the Committee of Arrangements would have been better pleased, while many people would have still regarded the three speakers' stands in Montgomery street as a fine display of architectural skill, and the tar barrels which illuminated the intersecting thoroughfares as gorgeous crea-tions of pyrotechnic ability. Some people seem to think if they demonstrate to their fellows that they are miserable, and ought fully to appreciate the fact, something has been achieved for which mankind should be grateful; but we can't help regarding their theory as slightly erroneous.

During the night of March 7th two slight earthquakes shocked our citizens; on the following morning a heavier discharge from the subterranean battery knocked some of them out of their beds. (We say "some," for a lad of our acquaintance assures us that he was ousted from his comfort-able pulu in that manner, and we would not risk incurring the displeasure of the invisible artillerist by supposing that the effect stopped with one small boy.) If any one likes this sort of amusement, all right; but to our notion, the pains-taking artillery practice of Samuel Brannan is preferable.

The semi-annual election of officers by the San Francisco Olympic Club took place on Monday, resulting as follows: R. H. Lloyd, President; G. W. Ramage, Vice President; D. Wilder, Secretary; W. H. Eldridge, Treasurer; Arthur Nahl, Leader; S. W. Holladay, John H. Coleman, Ellis M. Furbush, G. S. Haskell, Directors. Messrs. Eldridge, Nahl and Haskell were on the Independent ticket; 230 votes were polled. The increasing interest taken by our citizens in sys-tematic development of the physical man, is full of promise that the time will come when Americans will not be prover-bial for their neglect of those manly accomplishments which are not only a source of health and strength to the body but of vigor and effectiveness to the mental faculties. Success to "Olympic" clubs everywhere.

The following are among the casualties of the week: A man named Farr was severely injured while working at a hay house on Market street, opposite Steuart, by a falling scantling, which struck him on the head. . . John Murray, Jr., aged about five years, was drowned in the Bay, near the Ma-rine Hospital; he had been playing on the wharf with several of his little friends, and fell into the water while trying to re-cover his hat, which had blown off. . . Skinner's patent roofing manufactory, at the Mission, narrowly escaped destruction by fire, the asphaltum on the furnace having ignited; that any-thing was saved may be attributed to the proximity of En-gine Company No. 13, the members being on hand with their usual promptness. . . Patrick King, teamster, while driving a stone-laden truck on Turk street, to Lone Mountain, slipped and fell between the wheels. The body of the truck passed over his prostrate form; his injuries are severe. King was taken to St. Mary's Hospital. . . A runaway horse, with a buggy accompaniment, dashed along Sansome street, and at the in-tersection of Market knocked down and ran over a lady; her head was badly cut, and other less serious wounds were in-flicted. . . Antoine Pascal was driving a spirited horse on Du-pont street, when the firing of a salute by the California Guard frightened the horse. Result—fracture of Pascal's right thigh bone and dislocation of his shoulder. . . Jessup & Co.'s match factory, corner of Fourteenth and Folsom streets, was destroyed by fire. It will take several weeks to rebuild the establishment and replace the materials.

The Mechanics' Institute held its annual election of offi-cers, Monday. Eighty names had been recently added to the roll of membership; 478 votes were cast—about 330 more than at the last election. The following gentlemen were elected: Chas. M. Plum, President; Josiah Moulton, Vice President; P. B. Dexter, Recording Secretary; C. S. Higgins, Corresponding Secretary; Edward Nunan, Treas-urer; A. A. Snyder, H. K. Cummings, W. W. Hanscom, James R. Deane, David Dwyer, D. A. McDonald, J. W. Reay, Directors.

R. B. Woodward opened his garden and art-gallery to the public, at fifty cents admission-fee, Tuesday afternoon, for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission.

MISS. M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XVIII.

POOR FRANCIS

FROM the second day of the new year things went pleasantly enough in the Twickenham household. How could Maude do otherwise than rejoice in the salvation of her father's honor—to say nothing of his commercial prosperity—even though that salvation had been obtained by a great humiliation upon her own part? She would have borne that humiliation very willingly, and would have freely acknowledged her obligation to Francis Tredethlyn, could she have seen Julia Desmond reconciled to her lover. But the separation between these two, which had arisen out of the scene on New Year's night, was a perpetual reproach to Maude Hillary.

She was not able to be quite happy, therefore, even though such a terrible burden had been lifted from her—even though she saw the dark cloud swept away from her father's face. Her girlish frivolity had departed from her forever on that terrible night in her father's study at Brighton; and there was a womanly softness, a pensive tenderness in her manner now, that made her even more bewitching than of old. Her affection for her father—always the ruling passion of her simple mind—had been intensified by that fiery ordeal through which she had so lately passed; and there was something very beautiful in the union which now existed between the father and daughter. Mr. Hillary had been surprised into confidences that made a new tie between himself and his child. He could never again entirely withhold his secrets from that tender friend and consoler. He could never again think of her as a beautiful, frivolous creature, only intended to wear expensive dresses and float about in graceful attitudes amongst the costly bric-à-brac of a fashionable drawing-room. He had learned to trust his child, and poor Maude applied herself diligently to the study of the customs and dealings common in that mysterious region known to her as the City. She tried to understand her father's position—for she was tormented by a feverish anxiety as to the repayment of Francis Tredethlyn's twenty thousand pounds; but the complications of an Australian merchant's trade, as affected by wars and rumors of wars, by alterations in the rate of discount and the price of Consols, were a little beyond Miss Hillary's comprehension, and she was fain to give up the attempt in despair, and to accept any statement which her father cared to make to her respecting the altered aspect of his affairs.

There was less company at the Cedars than usual during the bleak early months of the year. Mr. Hillary worked very sedulously in the City during this time, and did not care to fill his house with frivolous young idlers or penderous City-bred matrons and their fashionably-educated daughters. The recklessness engendered by the contemplation of inevitable ruin had given place to the careful dealing of a man who has a difficult but not impossible task allotted to him. You can scarcely expect the daughters of King Danaus to labor very ardently in the filling of those buckets which they know will not hold water; but if the buckets are only thin at the bottom, and may possibly carry their contents safely to the well, it is worth while to work conscientiously.

Francis Tredethlyn's twenty thousand pounds had done wonders for Lionel Hillary; but the dry-rot had been for a long time at work in that stately ship of which the merchant was captain, and the successful navigation of the vessel, amidst all the rocks and shoals and tempests of the commercial ocean, was by no means an easy duty.

But Mr. Hillary was sanguine, and his daughter saw the new hopefulness and brightness of his face, and was very nearly happy. She was not quite happy, for Harcourt Lowther's letters grew more despondent and complaining by every mail. He reproached Maude Hillary for her prosperity and her indifference; she must be indifferent, he argued, or she would have succeeded ere this in obtaining her father's consent to her marriage with the penniless officer. "There are girls who will go through fire and water for the man they love," he wrote, in an epistle that was half filled with fierce reproaches. "I have seen the power of a woman's devotion; but then that woman was only a poor simple creature, and not the daughter of a millionaire. I cannot believe that you could fail to influence your father, if you really cared to do so. If you loved me, Maude, this business would have been settled long ago."

Did she love him? That was a question which she had never set herself to answer. Had they not engaged themselves to each other in the prettiest and most sentimental fashion, like a modern Master of Ravenswood and Lucy Ashton? Maude took the fact of her love for granted. All the sweetest and tenderest dreams of her life were mingled with the memory of Harcourt Lowther. He was so superior to all the other men who had paid her their homage; and it may be that his contemptuous bearing towards those other men had been a part of the fascination of his manner. He had affected that modern Edgar Ravenswood tone—that elegant Timon of Athens-ism—which is so intensely charming in the eyes of a very young woman, however spurious it may be. And with all this, he had been so devoted, so delightfully exacting, so deliciously jealous! Maude looked back to the one sentimental period of her life, and saw Harcourt Lowther's image radiant in all the light of her own youthful fancies. So the worshipper in a village chapel sees some poor painted wooden figure of a saint, glorified by the glitter of tapers, the brightness of flowers and draperies and decorations. How was she to separate the lamps and the flowers about the shrine from the image which they adorned? How was she to discover the paltry nature of that clay out of which the graceful figure was fashioned? Harcourt Lowther represented to her all that was brightest and best in her early girlhood; and sitting alone, through long and thoughtful hours, in the empty rooms at the Cedars, Maude Hillary brooded very sadly upon the only love story of her life.

She had ventured to speak of Harcourt to her father once since the beginning of the year; but her timid pleading had been met by a cruel repulse.

"Understand me at once and forever, Maude," Lionel Hillary said, sternly; "such a marriage as that can never be. If you were the great heiress people think you, I might gratify this whim, as I have gratified other fancies, foolish and extravagant in their way. But the road I am now treading is by no means too secure under my feet, and I cannot afford to see my only child the wife of a penniless adventurer. I want to see you happy, Maude, but not after a sentimental girl's notion of happiness. I know what all those pretty theories about a suburban cottage and poverty come to when they are put into practice. I have seen the slipshod maid of all work, and the miserable dinners, and the Kidderminster carpets, and stale bread and rank butter, that belong to love in a cottage. And more than this, Maude, I know that Harcourt Lowther is the very last man to ally himself to a dowdier wife."

"Ah, how little you know him!" Maude murmured, softly. She thought she knew her lover so well herself, and fancied him the most generous and devoted of men because he had given her a few half-guinea bouquets, purchased on credit from a confiding florist. "Ah, dear papa, how little you know him! He is always reproaching me for my fortune, and lamenting the gulf it has made between us. Let me tell him of your difficulties, let me tell him that I am no longer a millionaire's daughter, that am free to marry the man I love. Ah, let me tell him—"

"Not a word, Maude," answered Lionel Hillary—"not a word to that man, if you have any love for your father. Remember that I have trusted you with secrets that a man seldom confides to his daughter."

"And your confidence shall be sacred papa," Miss Hillary replied, submissively. And thus ended her intercession in favor of Harcourt Lowther.

She was fain to be contented, however, remembering the great trouble which had been so near her, and which a merciful hand had lifted away; she was fain to remember, shudderingly, the feverish horror of that night at Brighton, and to think gratefully of Francis Tredethlyn, to whom she owed her father's rescue; she was grateful to him, but she could not put entirely away from her the sense of shame left by that scene in the study, and Julia Desmond's passionate reproaches; she could not forget that it was for her sake that Francis Tredethlyn had helped her father, and that the burden of a great obligation must rest upon her shoulders until that loan of twenty thousand pounds was repaid. Poor Maude's unbusiness-like mind entirely ignored any such thing as interest for Mr. Tredethlyn's money. She only thought of the loan itself, and the question of its repayment was perpetually in her mind. Had she not been the suppliant, at whose suit the money had been lent? and was she not in a manner the actual debtor?

Things were much better in the City; but upon two or three occasions when she had ventured to hint her anxiety respecting the early payment of Francis Tredethlyn's money, the merchant's answers had filled her mind with vague disquietude. There was an indifference in Mr. Hillary's manner that alarmed Maude's keen sense of right and honor.

"Tredethlyn is too well off to want his money in any desperate hurry, my dear," he said; "he is not likely to become a very pressing creditor."

The hedgerows about Isleworth and Twickenham were green with their earliest buds before Francis Tredethlyn came again to the Cedars. Mr. Hillary had called upon the young man at his hotel several times before he succeeded in seeing him, and had only with great difficulty wrung from him an admission of the fact that he was the anonymous lender of the twenty thousand pounds that had saved the merchant from ruin and disgrace.

"My dear Tredethlyn, why should you insist upon any disguise?" Mr. Hillary said; with a pleasant ease that not every man could have maintained in such a position as that in which the merchant found himself with regard to this simple-minded, country-bred Cressus. "Is it not enough to have been the most generous of men, without trying to carry generosity to the verge of Quixotism? How can I doubt the identity of my preserver? I know that Maude betrayed my necessities to you, under the excitement of those unfortunate theatricals, and I know that loans of twenty thousand pounds do not drop from the skies. My dear fellow, I am most heartily thankful to you for what you have done. It was a very noble thing to do, an action that any man might be proud of doing. If I had ever doubted your having good blood in your veins, your conduct in this one matter would have settled my doubts. But I never did doubt it, my dear Tredethlyn. I have recognized you from the first as a gentleman; not by the right of an accidental thirty thousand a year, scraped out of all manner of commercial gutters by a miserly uncle; but by virtue of the best blood in the West of England."

And then Mr. Hillary stretched out both his hands, and shook those of Francis Tredethlyn in his vigorous grasp; and altogether the interview could scarcely have been more entirely satisfactory had the merchant written a cheque for the twenty thousand on the spot. Indeed, to Francis, any immediate repayment of that money would have been a grievous mortification. Was it not delightful to him to remember that he had been of service to her father? Was not the money advanced to the merchant a kind of link between Maude and the man who loved her so dearly and so hopelessly—only a very sordid, earthly link; but better than none?

"I offended her very much that night," Francis thought, "but perhaps she will forgive me, and remember me kindly, when she thinks that I have been useful to her father." But when Mr. Hillary begged Francis to renew his visits to Twickenham, the young man resisted those friendly invitations as obstinately as if the Cedars had been the most obnoxious place upon earth. He could not muster up courage to encounter Maude Hillary after that scene in the little study. What if he had offended too deeply for forgiveness? What if she slew him with a frozen glance from her lovely eyes? Again and again in his lonely rides, emboldened by the dusky twilight of the early spring evenings, he had ventured to haunt the neighborhood of the old brick-built mansion by the river; but he could not bring himself to go any nearer to the shrine of his divinity, and he made all manner of lame excuses in answer to Mr. Hillary's cordial invitations.

He was only a clod; only an uneducated rustic, newly cast upon a strange world, open to all the pleasant snares which are laid for the simple-minded possessor of thirty thousand a year. Heaven only knows the perils and temptations into which some young men would have fallen under similar circumstances. It is something in Francis Tredethlyn's favor that his worst mistake was to fall desperately in love with Maude Hillary, and wear his horse's shoes out in disconsolate rides in the twilight lanes and roads in the neighborhood of her dwelling-place.

And in the meantime Messrs. Kursdale & Scardon were supposed to be busily employed in their search for the missing girl, who might or might not have any right to another name than that of Susan Tredethlyn. Very little came of the lawyers' endeavors; several advertisements had been inserted in the Times; but it is to be feared that the lost and missing advertised for in those columns are too often wanderers in a weary region, far removed from that comfortable sphere of life in which the morning papers are punctually delivered to enliven the breakfast-table. No reply came to any of those mysteriously-worded appeals to Francis Tredethlyn's cousin which were concocted by the young man and his legal advisers; and the image of the friendless girl grew paler and fainter day by day in the mind of Maude Hillary's adorer.

At last Fortune—who will generally do anything in the world for us, if we have patience enough to await her own time for doing it—brought about the result which Francis Tredethlyn had so obstinately avoided, yet so fondly desired. Lounging against the rails one brilliant April day at the corner opposite Apsley House, Francis saw Maude Hillary's carriage drive into the Park.

Yes, there she was, her sunny hair framed in spring blossoms and white aeroplane. The young man seemed to behold the vision of an angel in a Parisian bonnet, and half-wondered if the folds of her white burnous were not a pair of downy pinions floating away from her divine shoulders. He grew very red and uncomfortable, and in another moment would have yielded to the impulse that prompted him to seek refuge in flight; but before he could do so the carriage was close to the rails, Maude Hillary had recognized him, and had told the coachman to stop.

She was not offended with him then; she forgave him, and thought of him kindly. His heart swelled with a rapture that was almost overpowering. Ah! this was love. How different from that placid sense of affection with which he had regarded his cousin! how much more delicious! how infinitely more painful!

"I have wanted so much to see you, Mr. Tredethlyn,"

Maude said, after shaking hands with her bewildered adorer; "why have you never been to Twickenham?"

"I—I—don't like—I thought you were angry with me," stammered Francis, very awkwardly. Ah, how sad it is that the presence of those we love best, and in whose eyes we would most desire to appear at an advantage, should entail upon us the annihilation of anything like ease or grace of manner! Mr. Tredethlyn felt himself becoming purple and apoplectic under the influence of that seraphic creature, whose image had filled his mind unceasingly for the last six months.

"Angry with you!" exclaimed Maude; "how should I be otherwise than grateful to you, when I remember how good you have been to papa? Believe me, Mr. Tredethlyn, I am not too proud to own the extent of our obligation. I thank you most sincerely. You can never know how grateful I am for the service you have rendered my dear father."

She bent her head, and the spring flowers in her bonnet were very near him as she said this in a low, earnest voice. But in the next moment the memory of that uncomfortable scene in the study flashed back upon her, and she felt that she must always be more or less in a false position with regard to Francis Tredethlyn; she made a little effort to set herself right before she parted from him.

"You have seen Julia; you and she are reconciled, I hope?"

"No; indeed, I have never heard from her since—since I left the Cedars. Your papa told me that she—oh, Miss Hillary, I think it was better that we should part. I don't think that we had either of us ever really cared for each other. It was better that it should end as it did."

"But I would give so much to find Julia, to hear where she is."

Francis shook his head hopelessly. He had a vague idea that he had not done his very uttermost in his search for his cousin, and he recoiled with terror from the idea of having to engage in a hunt for Miss Desmond.

"Good-by, Mr. Tredethlyn, I hope that all will come right after all; and I hope that you will believe I am grateful for your goodness to my father."

She held out her hand, and the Cornishman took it in his own with almost as reverential a touch as if it had been some relic handed to him from an altar. The carriage drove off immediately after this, and Francis saw that seraphic bonnet with the spring blossoms melt away and lose itself among mundane bonnets. He lingered at the rails till the carriage came back again, and still lingered after that, thinking that Miss Hillary's equipage would again return to Hyde Park Corner; but after out-watching all the loungers by the rails, and seeing the last of the carriages leaving the Ladies' Mile, he was fain to go home, resigned to the obvious fact that Maude Hillary had left the park by the Kensington gates on her homeward route.

He went home, but not disconsolate. Had he not seen and spoken with that divinity before whom he was the simplest worshipper who ever bowed before an earthly shrine? Was he not assured of her forgiveness?—nay, even of her gratitude? Her gratitude—Maude Hillary's gratitude, in exchange for that vile dress which he had ever held so lightly. Money was indeed good for something, if it could buy the rapture of that little interview across the park rail, in which Francis had played so very poor a part. He went home, and carried Maude Hillary's image with him, and walked up and down his big sitting-room in the Covent Garden Hotel, smoking a cigar and thinking of the woman he loved; he thought of her quite as hopelessly as ever "Claude McNotte" could have thought of "Pauline" before "Beauseant's" diabolical suggestions had prompted him to his treacherous wooing. He thought of her as innocently as a schoolboy thinks of the stage fairy queen in a Christmas pantomime, and no ambitious or selfish dream had any abode in his mind; only when a brief note reached him from Lionel Hillary, renewing the old unceremonious invitation to the Cedars, poor Francis could no longer resist the voice of the charmer, but was fain to pack his portmanteau and drive down to the merchant's office, whence Mr. Hillary was to convey him in the mail phaeton to Twickenham. She was not angry with him, and he might bask in the sunshine of her presence! For a little while he might enjoy the dangerous delight, and then the officer to whom she was betrothed would come back to claim her, and there would be a wedding at the old church by the Thames; and he, Francis, would see his divinity radiant in bridal robes and crowned with orange flowers before he departed forever into the outer darkness where she was not.

(To be continued.)

THERE is no such thing as forgetting possible to the mind a thousand accidents may and will interpose between our present consciousness and the sweet inscriptions on the mind; accidents of the same sort may also rend away this veil; but alike, whether veiled or unveiled, the inscription remains forever, just as the stars seem to withdraw before the common light of day, whereas in fact, we all know that it is the light which is drawn over them as a veil, and that they are waiting to be revealed when the obscuring daylight shall have withdrawn.—De Quincy.

HARRY AND I.

WE stood where the snake-like ivy
Climbed over the meadow bars,
And watched as the young night sprinkled
The sky with her cream-white stars.
The clover was red beneath us—
The air had the smell of June—
The cricket chirped in the grasses,
And the soft rays of the moon

Drew our shadows on the meadow,
Distorted and lank and tall;
His shadow was kissing my shadow—
That was the best of all.
My heart leaped up as he whispered
"I love you, Margery Lee,"
For then one arm of his shadow
Went round the shadow of me.

"I love you Margery, darling,
Because you are young and fair;
For your eyes' bewildering blueness,
And the gold of your curling hair.
No queen has hands that are whiter,
No lark has a voice so sweet,
And your ripe young lips are redder
Than the clover at your feet.

"My heart will break with its fulness,
Like a cloud overcharged with rain;
O tell me, Margery, darling,
How long we must love in vain?"
With blushes and smiles I answered—
(I will not tell what)—just then
I saw that his saucy shadow
Was kissing my own again.

He promised to love me only—
I promised to love but him—
Till the moon fell out of the heavens
And the stars with age grew dim.
O the strength of man's devotion!
O the vows a woman speaks!
'Tis years since that blush of rapture
Broke redly over my cheeks.

He found a gold that was brighter
Than that of my floating curls,
And married a cross-eyed widow
With a dozen grown up girls.
And I—did I pine and languish?
Did I weep my blue eyes sore?
Or break my heart, do you fancy,
For love that was mine no more?

I stand to-night in the meadows
Where Harry and I stood then,
And the moon has drawn two shadows
Out over the grass again;
And a low voice keeps repeating—
So close to my startled ear
That the shadows melt together—
"I love you, Margery dear."

"'Tis not for your cheeks' rich crimson,
And not for your eyes' soft blue,
But because your heart is tender.
And noble and pure and true."
The voice is dearer than Harry's,
And so I am glad you see,
He married the cross-eyed widow
Instead of Margery Lee.

EFFECT OF MUSIC ON A MANIAC.—An intimate acquaintance waited on Madame Camporese one evening, to make a request. In the hospital for the insane, a man was confined, literally music mad; he had lost his senses on the failure of an opera, in which the labor of the composer was greater than the excellence of his music. This unfortunate had heard of Camporese, whose fame filled the city of Milan, and conceived a strong desire to hear her. For a while his representations passed unheeded; he grew ungovernable, and had to be fastened to his bed. In this state Camporese's friend had beheld him. She was dressed for an evening party when this representation was made to her. She paused a moment on hearing it; then throwing a cloak over her shoulders, said, "Come, then." "Whither?" "To the Ospedale." "But why?" "There is no occasion to go now; to-morrow, or the next day." "To-morrow!—no, indeed; if I can do this poor man good, let me go instantly." They went. Being shown into a room separated from that of the maniac only by a thin wall, Camporese began to sing one of Haydn's melodies. The attendants in the next room observed their patient suddenly become less violent, then composed, and at last he burst into tears. The singer now entered; she sat down, and sang again. When she had concluded, the poor composer took from under his bed a torn sheet of paper, scored with an air of his own composition, and he handed it to her. There were no words, and nothing in the music; but Camporese, running it over, sang it to some words of Metastasio, with such sweetness that the music seemed excellent. "Sing it to me once more," said the maniac. She did so, and departed, accompanied by his prayers and the tears of the spectators.

WIT AND HUMOR.

A LADY was followed by a beggar, who very importunately asked her for alms. She refused him, when he quitted her, saying with a profound sigh: "Yet the alms I asked you for would have prevented me executing my present resolution!" The lady was alarmed lest he should commit some rash attempt on his own life. She called him back, and gave him a shilling, and asked him the meaning of what he had just said. "Madam," said the fellow, laying hold of the money, "I have been begging all day in vain, and but for this shilling I should have been obliged to work!"

"I WOULD," says Fox, "a tax devise
That shall not fall on me."
"Then tax receipts," Lord North replies,
"For those you never see."

A GENTLEMAN at a musical party asked a friend, in a whisper, "How shall I stir the fire without interrupting the music?" "Between the bars," replied the friend.

AN English journal lately contained the following announcement: "To be sold—130 lawsuits, the property of an attorney retiring from business. N. B.—The clients are rich and obstinate."

SIR DAVID BAIRD, with great gallantry and humanity, had a queer temper. When news came to England that he was one of those poor prisoners in India who were tied back to back to fetter them, his mother exclaimed: "Heaven pity the man that's tied to my Davy!"

"THE very first manuscript (says George Coleman) which was proposed to me as a Director of a theatre, for representation, on my undertaking theatrical management, was from a nautical gentleman, on a nautical subject; the piece was of a tragic description, and in five acts, during the principal scenes of which the hero of the drama declaimed from the main-mast of a man-of-war, without once descending from his position!" A tragedy was offered to Mr. Macready, in thirty acts. The subject was the history of Poland, and the author proposed to have five acts played a night, so that the whole could be gone through in a week.

A TAILOR sent his bill to a lawyer for money; the lawyer directed the boy to tell his master that he was not running away, but very busy at that time. The boy comes again, and tells him he must have the money. "Did you tell your master," said the lawyer, "that I was not running away?" "Yes, sir," answered the boy; "but he bade me tell you that he was."

QUIN was at a small dinner-party. There was a delicious pudding, which the master of the house begged him to take. A gentleman had just before helped himself to an immense piece of it. "Pray," said Quin, looking first at the gentleman's plate and then at the dish, "which is the pudding?"

AN Irishman once ordered a painter to draw his picture, and to represent him standing behind a tree.

LAMB said to a brother whist-player, who was more clever than clean: "M., if dirt were trumps, what hands you would hold?"

AFTER O'Connell had obtained the acquittal of a horse-stealer, the thief in the ecstasy of his gratitude, cried out, "Och, counsellor, I've no way here to thank your honor; but I wish't I saw you knocked down in me own parish—wouldn't I bring a faction to the rescue?"

A LADY, complaining how rapidly time stole away, said: "Alas! I am near thirty." A doctor, who was present, and knew her age, said: "Do not fret at it, madam; for you will get further from that frightful epoch every day."

A SCOTCH woman having invited a gentleman to dinner on a particular day, he had accepted, with the reservation, "If I am spared." "Weel, weel," said Mrs. Robinson, "if ye're dead, I'll not expect ye."

A SCOTCH lady who was discomposed by the introduction of gas, asked with much earnestness, "What's to become of the puir whales?" deeming their interests affected by this superseding of their oil.

THE Bishop preached: "My friends," said he,
"How sweet a thing is charity,
The choicest gem in virtue's casket!"
"It is, indeed," sighed miser B.,
"And instantly I'll go and—ask it!"

"I SWEAR," said a gentleman to his mistress, "you are very handsome." "Pooh!" said the lady, "so you would say if you did not think so." "And so you would think," answered he, "though I should not say so."

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* * Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

All kinds of JOB PRINTING done with neatness and despatch, at reasonable rates.

DR. ALFRED WEILLER is an authorized Travelling Agent for THE CALIFORNIAN.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1865.

THE PRESIDENT'S INAUGURAL.

MUCH as we like and admire the long-headed and long-bodied gentleman whom the country has a second time returned as the head of its councils and the representative of its policy, we must candidly confess that we do not like the address which he put forth on the occasion of his last inauguration. The merit of brevity has been attributed to it, but the circumstances scarcely warrant that commendation, for its last half actually contains nothing at all, and might have been omitted to the benefit of the document.

It is strange that President Lincoln had not distinguished in his own mind between the substance and style that might befit a sermon and those which should enter into the composition of a state paper. Mr. Lincoln's piety in the present instance reads like affectation; as a chapter from the exhortation of an elder, or a leaf from one of the excellent tracts which so many worthy people are actively engaged in circulating, it would have been admirably in place, but in the paper before us it savors of plagiarism and suggests the idea of an attempt at parade.

Devoutness and gratefulness to the Supreme Being should be elements in all messages, but there is a common sense and practical tone that should pervade their expression in a State paper, between which and the stilted style which is only effective in exhortation the line of demarcation is broad and distinctly drawn. Coming from the pen of one who is certainly more noted for puns than for piety, it suggests the idea of burlesque, reminding one of a little story that was told early in the war. It was said that a lady attributed the success of Stonewall Jackson in his early raids to his prayer and fasting, to which the answer was made that our President prayed, too, and ordered fasts, "Oh, yes," was the reply, "but then the Lord thinks he is joking." This last paper of Mr. Lincoln's is not at all an improvement on his former ones, but it leaves room for a deal of improvement upon it, as regards future ones, and we trust that our President will avail himself of the opportunity.

NEW BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S.

FAMILY SECRETS, a companion to Family Pride and Pique, is published by the Peterson Brothers. A critic, in speaking of the authoress, declares that she "at one brave bound achieved immortality." This is a base plagiarism from a very famous criticism by the accomplished William Stewart of New York, long editorially connected with the New York daily press, and latterly manager of the Winter Garden theatre, who wrote of Matilda Heron that "she clutched the dramatic diadem at a single bound." Of the novel itself, it is cleverly written, professing to be the autobiography of a young English girl born out of wedlock, whose mother died in giving her birth, and whose father, a high-toned officer in the East India Company service, never saw her until she was fifteen years old—then to spurn her from him. The main object of the book seems to be a careful consideration of true and false Christianity, the development of the plot showing that a young girl, poor, unfortunate and under a social ban, is sure to find a deal more of the latter in the world than of the former—this result holding good as regards all religious creeds and professions, without exception, including in its broad sweep High Church, Low Church, Dissenters, Ranters, Catholics etc., all of whom, according to the author, row in pretty much the same boat, being alike devoid of gentle charity, mercy and good will to men, and all similarly unsound on the main eternal issue. It is a readable and interesting book, notwithstanding the elaborate religious reflections that so frequently occur in its pages. Moreover, the conclusion is a happy one, as the girl, after swimming through a chopping sea of doctrine for several years, at last fetches up safely on the shores beyond, marrying the man of her choice and being happily and proudly acknowledged by the salacious colonel, her father, who in the meantime had turned clergyman.

As is very well known, William Banting was a fat man of London, who was much troubled by his obesity—which he terms his parasite—and determined to get rid of it. In furtherance of this wish he tried several plans, all of which proved futile, until he at last hit upon a system of diet which reduced his weight rapidly, and enabled him once more to obtain a glimpse of his knees. Out of sheer benevolence, he published a pamphlet detailing his experiences for the benefit of fat people, and so interested were both fat and lean in its pages that it speedily ran through several editions, attracting more attention and creating more excitement even than did Bishop Colenso's famous work on the Pentateuch. Moved by a kindly consideration for the sufferings of the obese of this coast, Roman has republished the pamphlet from the third London edition, combining with it a review of the work from Blackwood's Magazine, and an article on corpulency and leanness from Harpers' Weekly. Six months hence we despair of seeing either extremes of bodily condition in San Francisco, as the Greatorex will get rid of their superfluous lard, while the Laukys will rush to Banting instead of to a lawyer to decide about their lien.

Mattie: A Stray, printed by the Harpers, is one of the series of select family novels which they regularly reprint from the other side of the water. The authoress is known as a good moral essayist and a graceful writer, the chief drawback to her style being the disposition she at all times shows to make a great deal out of nothing, and to clothe a rather threadbare plot with any amount of verbiage. "Mattie" is a girl who gets lost early in life, and subsequently "comes up," so to speak, by herself, preserving ever and always her honesty and purity of purpose. In the course of time she recovers her father, and together they go into the stationery business. A young man figures as one of the central characters of the novel; he is in love, and in fact, engaged to a pretty girl, who goes back on him to a great extent by fancying she is in love with some one else. By and by he is stricken with blindness, and Mattie becomes his right bower and confidant. He offers his hand to her and proposes to go into the stationery business with her and her father, but she defers an answer to his suit until such time as she has given the matter full consideration, though very much stuck after him. In the meanwhile the young man who had come between our hero and his first love repents and brings a physician from France who cures our hero's blindness, and then the former wicked and "hated rival" goes to work to repair the other injury he had done. Eventually it is all made up between the two lovers, though the young man would have married Mattie had she not, seeing how matters stood, refused him. Her refuge then was Africa, whither she accompanied her father who went as missionary, and where it is to be hoped she found a solace for the pangs of disappointed and disinterested affection. If desired to explain the moral of the book we should say to all young ladies: Nip a man while you have him, because in all such cases delays are dangerous and there is no telling what may turn up if you let the golden moment of acceptance slide. For Mattie could have married her young man before his eyesight was restored; and think what a blessing to a woman it must be to have a blind husband!

The Three Scouts, by J. T. Trowbridge, author of Cudjo's Cave, is printed by J. E. Tilton & Co. It is a story of the present war, the heroes being three scouts, who undergo a variety of adventures. Life within the rebel lines is described and the unpleasant situation of a Union family residing there is portrayed. The book is intended for boys.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL MENTION.

SATURDAY evening last Miss Heron appeared at the Opera House in her great character of "Camille." Gamea was given on Monday and Tuesday evenings. Wednesday Matilda was revived, with the afterpiece of The Honeymoon, Miss Heron appearing as "Juliana." Thursday evening, the occasion being Mrs. Stewart's benefit, Medea was put upon the stage, followed by the serio-comic burletta of Oliver Twist, the beneficiary appearing as "Nancy Sikes." Mrs. Perry was the Oliver of the evening, and furnished in that character a Roland to the other boy parts in which she excels. Mrs. Saunders as "Mrs. Corney" and Mr. Anderson as "Bumble," exerted themselves to amuse. Mr. Mayo's "Bill Sikes" was that gentleman's usual rendering of his somewhat exaggerated idea of the personnel of a desperado. Mr. Aldrich, who seems to be the recognized "old man" of the company, will play such parts as "Mr. Brownlow" better when he acquires a little more repose of manner and less hasty articulation. Barry's "Fagin" was quite creditable. Mr. Percy made his first appearance here as the "Artful Dodger;" he seems to possess fair average ability. Miss Land as "Mrs. Bedwin," of course borrowed an additional feather for her cap from the pillow of that character, and Miss Clarkson, the last débütante, looked as pretty as possible. This young lady only lacks self-possession on the stage—but she will soon acquire that and conquer all natural diffidence. Of the whole play we must say that it dragged and moved tediously. One great cause of this was a disposition on all sides to make too much out of minor parts. Mrs. Stewart played "Nancy" with that excellence which always distinguished her and made her the general favorite she is. It was pleasant to attend the benefit of this long-time supporter of the legitimate drama, but the pleasure was marred by the thought that it distinguishes the occasion of her departure.

Hester Prynne, dramatized for Miss Heron from Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter, was announced for production at the Opera House last evening. From our knowledge of the character of Hester, as developed in the novel, we should imagine that it must prove one of Miss Heron's best and most impassioned personations. The reader will doubtlessly remember—for who has not read Hawthorne—that the plot of the story is laid in New England in the old Puritan days, and that Hester, who sinned, leads a life wherein repentance and remorse are strangely mingled—carrying her punishment by her side in the elfish child that was born to her. There is no need that we explain the signification of the scarlet letter "A." Years have passed since we read the book, and we do not remember it sufficiently to now attempt to give the plot in detail, but the impression of weird and exciting interest it excited in our mind cannot be effaced. The scene where the eloquent, earnest clergymen whose robes have never been sullied by suspicion, takes his stand by Hester in the place of punishment, and avows himself the partner of her guilt, or rather the author of her shame, is one of the most effective ever portrayed by the pen of novelist. The old Physician, the quarrelling religionists—all come up at this moment vaguely yet distinctly as the memory of a dream which carried with it the semblance of reality. The announcement of the production of a dramatization has made it impossible to procure a copy of the work at any book-store or library in town, all being "gobbled up" by the eager public, and this must form an excuse for our imperfect mention of the story. But we advise all our readers to go and see the play, for in Miss Heron's hands it cannot prove otherwise than eminently effective.

The first of the series of subscription concerts of the San Francisco Philharmonic Society was given on Thursday evening at the Academy of Music, a large and critical audience assembling for the occasion. The programme was made up of selections from Beethoven, Mozart, Meyerbeer and Von Weber, with a mixture of minor composers. The vocal part was entrusted to Mlle. Tourny, who sang a romanza from Robert le Diable and an English ballad. The orchestra was good, rendering the music of the great masters both brilliantly and effectively. The "Symphony in C," from Mozart's Jupiter, was the gem of the evening, the four divisions from the Allegro to the finale, being full of sparkling and delicious harmonies. The overture to part second—Dichter und Bauer, or "The Poet and Peasant,"—bearing the name of "F. Suppé" as its composer, was one of the most brilliant things we have heard for many a day—a solo passage on the violoncello, by Mr. Hildebrandt, being especially charming. Charley Schultz, who played a concerted piece on the piano with an orchestral accompaniment, was called before the footlights to receive the plaudits of his friends. It is amusing to notice the awkward modesty of this talented young musician. There is a peculiar, swinging mannerism about him that he never cares to divest himself of. Whether he play a solo on the violin or pianoforte, lead an orchestra or run at the head of his Hook and Ladder Company wielding a speaking-trumpet, he is still the same careless-looking, uncertain "Charley." Yet very few professionals in the State excel him as a musician. If his idiosyncracies were not well known in San Francisco, where he has become a sort of local institution, having been with us both as boy and man for years, we should say that his appearance before the audience on Thursday evening to perform a difficult composition without any notes before him, was either downright egotism or unjustifiable affectation. There were around him some twenty musicians, all answering to the leader's baton with nervous precision, while he sat before the piano, occasionally running a symphony, rubbing his nose, playing with his fingers, or shuffling himself about on his chair—apparently a very awkward and uncomfortable chair, indeed—but always performing the score with precision and excellence. There was a lack of vocal talent at this first performance, Mlle. Tourny, though a sweet singer, not being equal to the general execution of the instrumental parts. Taken altogether, however, we unhesitatingly say that the concert was a success, and if the society continue to cater to the musical tastes of San Francisco, as well in the future as they did in their initial effort, they will, we have not a doubt, be sustained.

The minstrel troupe have returned to the Eureka Theatre, and their nightly performances meet with the usual unvarying success. Birch and Backus are announced as positively to sail on the next steamer—no postponement on account of the weather. Several new novelties peculiarly adapted to the talent of the new members of the troupe, are in preparation. Our old time lively entertainments, the Sacred Concerts, have been abandoned to the melodeon people. This afternoon the minstrels appear at the Opera House, where Oliver Twist will also be given. All ladies and children are invited to attend.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CALIFORNIAN.]

NEW YORK, January 18th, 1865.

LITERATURE in the middle walks goes limping along, and we want an asylum for indigent writers, badly. In Mexico they are giving out offices to newspaper censors, playwrights, and pen flourishers of all sorts, and we think of sending a ship's load of neglected geniuses out to Maximilian. The angel that stirred the pool every seven years might be able to stir up the daily papers here, but nothing short of his interposition can keep the barnacles from growing even then. Now and then in the dust and splutter of quill-driving we get a glimpse of green fields, as in my first illustration:

MAJOR JACK DOWNING.

You remember, of course, Major Jack Downing, one of the many humorists who lived and laughed his prime, and was extensively praised and quoted. Well, Seba Smith—for so he was called in private life—has bought a little farm about fifty miles out Long Island, where with his wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith, the poetess, he is spending the close of his days in a delightful and pastoral manner. He works only in his garden, where the hoe supersedes the pen, and Mrs. Smith is said to be the best housewife between New York and Mount Point. She wrote, as you know, the Newsboy, and many other local fictions, and has produced some plays as well. Her eldest son, at the beginning of the war, was thought to be somehow connected with the rebellion, and found his way in and out of Fort Warren. He has now a plantation or ranch in South America, and is doing well. Edward, another son, is a dramatic editor and writer, and translated the play of Narcisse, which Bandmann, the German, afterward produced. Mrs. Oakes Smith, although past fifty, is still a beautiful lady, and has not quite given up literary composition.

A HOWARD, A HAWK AND AN "EAGLE."

Joseph Howard, who forged the President's Proclamation for a draft, or rather anticipated it, has commenced the publication of a small paper in Brooklyn, known as the Critic. Howard also writes, if I am well informed, the Brooklyn "Wide Awake" letter in the Weekly Review. He is a handsome fellow, aged about thirty, with dark olive complexion and luxuriant beard. As a writer he is of little consequence, but for local reporting is possessed of great shrewdness and energy, with enough freedom from bashfulness to avail himself of an extensive personal acquaintance. Any man but Howard, with his Fort Lafayette experience, would have made a sketchy and splendid book, describing the episodes of the prison-house. He is pretty generally tabooed in the dailies. Mattison, who assisted him with the proclamation, is at work on the Brooklyn Eagle, owned by Mr. Van Arden. It is the only suburban paper that pays "salt." Van Arden is worth two hundred thousand dollars. The architect of his fortune was an Irishman named Henry McCloskey, who took charge of the Eagle about ten years ago, and, by vigor and independence, pushed it into influence and credit. When the Administration, three years ago, stopped the Eagle for its radical Democratic tone, the condition upon which it was allowed to resume publication was McCloskey's discharge. His Democracy was of a howling and unbearable tone, but his discharge proved his fortune. The Brooklyn City Council, out of sympathy, made him clerk, at a salary of three thousand dollars a year, and he was admitted to the bar at the same time. His income is about six thousand per annum, whereas he used to make twenty dollars a week and get no sleep. This is what it is to graduate out of journalism.

BROOKLYN AND ITS NOTABLES.

Brooklyn, I may say, incidentally, is a lodging-house to New York, nothing more. Its religious and gossipy character is world-famed. Mrs. Grundy, settled there many years ago, and all the walls have ears. There are seven thousand-odd boarding-houses in the place. Henry Ward Beecher is its Prophet; his salary for the year ensuing is something more than seventeen thousand dollars. His pew rents have advanced fifty per cent., and the first choice thereof brought five hundred dollars more than the fixed price. This "premium" smacks of Wall street somewhat. Mrs. H. B. Stowe (Beecher's sister) lives in the Uncle-Tom house at Amherst, paid for and furnished out of the proceeds of her first novel. She has never since produced a telling one; her style is too diffuse, and her subsequent characterizations have been ideal beyond all recognition, so that lacking the "touch of nature which makes the world kin," the public has failed to appreciate them. When Mrs. Stowe took the MS. of Dred to the Jewetts, they refused to pay her more than ten per cent. on the sales, the customary reward of authors. She demanded more, saying: "Nothing that I write, sir, can sell less than a hundred thousand copies." "Madam," answered the publisher, "you will write a book before long that will not sell five thousand copies." And the result has verified the prediction.

Rev. Calvin Stowe, husband to the novelist, is an awkward, homely man. Neither of them will be ever hung for beauty. His great trouble is said to be his beard, which grows fast and jagged, so that he is greatly in need of time to shave. Once Billings, the designer, was called to Amherst to get the "points" for some illustrations to Mrs. Stowe's advertised book of Foreign Travel. While the good lady, in her demure way, was laying down the law to Billings, Calvin, with a razor in his hand, rushed through the room, and stumbled over a stool.

"Mr. Billings," he said, "if I were not a licensed preacher of the gospel, I would be tempted, by this beard, to—to—in in short, to swear!"

TWO ARTISTS.

Billings, by the way, is preferred by Jarves in his Art Idea to Darley, as an artist. He certainly has more versatility. Darley, with all his excellence of composition, harmony of outline and correctness of anatomy, repeats himself constantly. His pictures are unmistakable, whereas Billings, less of a genius, perhaps, has more variability and is less recognizable. Billings' sepia designs bring as high as five hundred dollars apiece; but he is a careless business man, and has fallen into some reproach by his loose management. He is an architect as well, and designed Ralph Waldo Emerson's villa at Concord. Emerson once told him that he had never found patience enough to read any of Hawthorne's novels, considering them terribly unnatural. The two authors lived, as you are aware, in the same town.

EMERSON AND WALT. WHITMAN.

Emerson's mode of preparing his lectures and magazine articles is original. He strolls around his grounds, thinking up good, epigrammatic things, and putting them down at random in a note-book; when he has enough of them he looks up a title, and his article is complete. This gives all his effusions that rambling, disconnected shape, like a poetical dictionary.

Emerson was rash enough, some years ago, to praise Walt Whitman's strange volume called Leaves of Grass. When he came to New York, he asked Walt to dine with him at the Astor House. At the appointed time the poet—whose book commences thus:

"I am Walt Whitman, one of the roughs,"— made his appearance in a red fireman's shirt, collarless, and insisted upon going, so dressed, to the public table. Emerson bore the infliction, but afterward remarked to a friend: "Why can't we have the god, without the growl?"

MISS HOSMER'S ZENOBIA.

Hattie Hosmer sailed hence for Europe some two weeks ago. The undue praise which her "Zenobia" and "Beatrice" received in England was not resounded to here as she wished, and the article in January's Atlantic, over her signature, was in truth only a personal defence of herself, she being accused of plagiarizing the designs of both figures from an Italian whom she employs. You recollect that she sued the London Athenaeum for libel on the same charge. She was tolerantly treated in New York, but her anglicized manners made her the butt of a good many coarse jokes, one of which, particularly, I do not care to repeat.

WEEKLIES AND MONTHLIES.

The Weekly Review, to which I have alluded in a previous letter, has taken to itself the Bohemians in a lump. Its first number was crude, its second quite creditable, its third excellent. The best articles in it have been analytic of Broadway architecture; it has much of the spirit of the Round Table, and if the musical column be reduced, will become, I should say, a popular weekly. Between the Leader and Review the rivalry is brisk and interesting. Clapp, who seceded from the former, is a native of Nantucket, and is called here the Bohemian King. His literary works have been various. He translated Fonrier into English, and as a dramatic feuilletonist has always ranked high. I know too little of him to express an opinion as to his manner and habit; he has a weakness for coterie's, and is always at the head of one. My opinion of literature has ever been that it should have no personal subdivisions beyond those of geography. I do not agree with one Mr. Gardette, who gravely proposes to start a magazine with a certain crowd, and have nothing to do with outside contributors. The circulation of such a publication would soon be limited to its proprietors. True philosophy suggests that the doors be thrown wide open, that by the attrition of many intellects, all the sparks may be garnered up. One-ideaism is a haggard and pestilential thing. It has been gnawing at the vitals of the Atlantic; it has killed the Cophtinental. The latter concern was owned by Robert J. Walker, and edited by his wife. It was dry and indigestible, and must have died easy, as it exhibited no signs of vitality for a long time previous to its interment. I have my own theory of a monthly publication, which I do not mean to disclose till I realize it. Very possibly the secret will expire with me, as most great secrets do—except in plays. The Pacific Monthly, recently issued here, is well meaning enough, but I am at a loss to know with what classes it is intended to circulate. Its name was a half plagiarism, and its typography seems to be its chief genius. Unfortunately, in this life, the men who know the least about literature wield most of the capital for it.

Among the new enterprises in the East is one in Boston called the Leader, an imitation of the paper of the same name here. It is distinguished mainly for failing to pay its bills to writers. Verdant Green owns it.

The Home Journal is getting along smoothly, though Willis's articles have no longer their wonted fire. Phillips, the new partner, seems to be a man of taste. The paper serves no interest of literary men, as it is chiefly kept up by novices; the youth who writes its dramatic criticisms is a clerk in Stewart's drygoods house, where I hope he is more efficient than in journalism. He lately informed us that Hamlet was an over-rated play, and Matilda Heron has been waiting to box his ears for a long time.

A POET AND A CRITIC.

Gardette, of whom I have spoken above, is a young poet of unequal ability, who has recently had quite a botte with "Doctor" R. Shelton Mackenzie, the literary editor of a provincial daily. Mackenzie was betrayed into giving credence to a poem by Gardette as emanating from Edgar A. Poe, and, finding that he had been swindled, made a savage assault on Gardette, calling him a "respectable dentist's son." The latter published a pamphlet, too silly for the great opportunity he had. A better man would have manipulated Mackenzie, with such a chance, till he roared on his marrow-bones.

Mackenzie is one of a type of our illustrious literary foreigners; his stalwart age has impaired all but his irascibility. He was a subordinate editor of Frazer's Magazine, and held a Government position. He left with his money savings, and went upon the New York Times. About the time that he had made enemies of all the New York literati, J. W. Forney gave him a place on the Philadelphia Press, which he holds at present as a pension rather than a position. He is about seventy-four years of age, married a second time, and became a father in his seventy-first year. I should call him a seventy-four man-of-war, but he don't show fight except under protection. He has been twice married: once on the other side of the Atlantic. I do not spare him in this paragraph, as I have never yet seen anybody whom Mackenzie spared. The opinion that I set down is the representative one of journalists.

ABOUT ACTORS AND THEATRES.

A few nights ago I went to see Booth's "Hamlet" for the —th time. It is a pity that so much expense for furniture and scenery apropos should not be sustained by fair actors in the inferior parts. The worst Horatio, Ghost and Laertes I ever saw are upon the same boards with one of the best Hamlets. I am one of the few daring enough to confess that the rough, original, and powerful Hamlet of Forrest pleases me better than the handsome Hamlet of Booth. I like to carry something home from the theatre besides my play-bill.

Booth and Clarke have leased the site of the old Walnut street Theatre, Philadelphia, and are about building a new and spacious "Temple of the Drama," as the posters say.

Hackett is giving pleasant egotisms here; Lester Wallack is doing well with his father's old property; John Owens has dropped "Solon Shingle" after five months' playing; Mortimer, our best light comedian, is playing the trashiest piece at the Olympic; and Barney Williams, the worst Irish comedian I ever saw, is making money by the barrel-full at Niblo's. Such are the anomalies of life, which make the last paragraph of my letter melancholy. Better cheer next time.

DESULTORY.

CURE FOR CORNS.—The Alta having discovered a new use for petroleum, is responsible for the following corn cure:

"Cut the corn down as thin as possible with a knife, saturate a bit of cotton with coal oil, and bind it upon the corn on retiring for the night. Two or three applications will effectually relieve the pain of the worst old acher in the world."

To make the cure thoroughly effectual, our cotemporary should have gone further with the letter of its instructions, and represented to sufferers the necessity of getting up early next morning and removing with a sharp knife the cotton, coal oil, and toe, planting the whole in an obscure corner of the backyard, and so securing a cure in toto. Under such circumstances the planted corn was never known to grow.

CONSPIRACY TO ASSASSINATE PRESIDENT LINCOLN.—The Philadelphia Bulletin's special Washington despatch of March 7th states that a man named Clemens had been turned over to the civil authorities by the military, against whom evidence was positive that he had all his plans arranged for the assassination of President Lincoln on Inauguration day.

To the rumor that a distinguished San Franciscan of former days, Ned. McGowan, is Chief of Ordnance of a rebel brigade in Louisiana, the Stockton Record replies that it is informed the rumor is incorrect, a gentleman lately from New York having assured the editor that the ubiquitous Edward is publishing a flash paper of the black mail stamp in that city. Mr. McGowan's journal is called The Town. The editor was thought to be on the town while yet a resident of this city.

The Howard Benevolent Society of Sacramento issued during the month of February 225 dispensations.

JOHN HAMPDEN AND HIS GRAVE.

JOHN HAMPDEN, one of the most venerated of English patriots, was the descendant and heir of a family of Saxon origin, long settled in Buckinghamshire, and possessed of extensive property both in that and adjoining counties. He was born in the year 1594, his mother being Elizabeth, second daughter of Sir Henry Cromwell, and aunt to Oliver, afterwards Protector of England. In 1609, John Hampden entered Magdalen College, Oxford, and there distinguished himself highly in his studies. Ten years afterwards, he was married to Elizabeth Simson, heiress of Pyrtou in Oxfordshire, and spent some time afterwards in the placid enjoyment of a country life, and of the society of a wife whom he dearly loved. His rank and importance, however, rendered it incumbent upon him to enter Parliament in the beginning of 1621. In this new situation, he immediately attached himself to the anti-royalist or popular party; and though he never attained to the very highest eminence as a speaker, his strong good sense, cultivated mind, and resolute spirit, together with the natural influence attaching to him as one of the wealthiest commoners of the country, gave him a degree of prominence in the public eye alike honorable and perilous. In the second Parliament of Charles I., when the King resorted to a new mode of raising supplies, Hampden suffered a temporary imprisonment, along with others, for refusing his share of the subsidy. Getting more and more deeply embroiled, as time ran on, with his parliaments and people, the King at length attempted to revive an obsolete tax known by the name of ship-money. "On this occasion, John Hampden (says Hume) acquired by his spirit and courage universal popularity throughout the nation, and has merited great renown with posterity, for the bold stand which he made in defence of the laws and liberties of his country." He resisted, in his own case, the payment of the tax. It was not the extent of the imposition, for the sum amounted to no more than a few shillings, which made this resistance memorable, but the principle which dictated it, and the fact that the nation at large viewed Hampden as a champion who had put himself forward to defend their rights. The King nominally gained the victory in the legal struggle which followed; but the conviction of his arbitrary purposes was strengthened in the minds of the people to his ultimate ruin.

Hampden's first wife died, leaving nine children, and he married a second time. But he tasted few of the comforts of home and domestic society in his latter days, being constantly engaged in the still darkening affairs of the state. Finally, the King and his Parliament came to an open rupture, and mutually took up arms. Hampden, of course, continued to side with the popular party, and in the outset of the civil war, displayed as much courage in the field as he had shown in the Senate. But he did not live to see much of this great contest. On the 18th of June, 1643, a battle took place between the royalists under Prince Rupert, and the army of the Parliament under Essex, at Chalgrave Field, and John Hampden there received a mortal wound. The circumstances attending the receipt of this injury have long been a source of doubt and dispute, and have given origin to an inquiry of a strange and peculiar kind, even in our own day.

Lord Clarendon and the majority of historians relate that the patriot was "shot into the shoulder with a brace of bullets, which broke the bone," and caused his death, "three weeks" afterwards. Hume, following Sir Philip Warwick, narrates that a prisoner taken by the royalists in the action at Chalgrave, "said that he was confident Mr. Hampden was hurt, for he saw him, contrary to his usual custom, ride off the field before the action was finished; his head hanging down, and his hands leaning on his horse's neck. Hume also states that he died "some days" after the event. But another account of the fatal injury differs materially from these. It is presented in the following terms in the Earl of Oxford's papers:

"Two of the Harleys, and one of the Foleys, being at supper with Sir Robert Pye, at Faringdon House, Berks, in their way to Herefordshire, Sir Robert Pye related the account of Hampden's death as follows: 'That, at the action of Chalgrave Field, his pistol burst, and shattered his hand in a terrible manner. He, however, rode off, and got to his quarters; but finding the wound mortal, he sent for Sir Robert Pye, then a colonel in the parliament army, and who had married his eldest daughter, and told him that he looked on him in some degree accessory to his death, as the pistols were a present from him. Sir Robert assured him that he bought them in Paris of an eminent maker, and had proved them himself. It appeared, on examining the other pistol, that it was loaded to the muzzle with several supernumerary charges, owing to the carelessness of a servant who was ordered to see that the pistols were loaded every morning, which he did without drawing the former charge.'

In the year 1828, Lord Nugent, being then engaged in writing a memoir of Hampden, and therefore desirous of ascertaining the real cause of the patriot's death, bethought himself of having his grave opened, in the hope that his remains might yet be in a condition to throw some light upon the question. He therefore made application to the Earl of Buckinghamshire (to whom the family estates had descended) for permission to make search for the grave in Hampden church, and to open the coffin and examine the body. Leave to this purpose having been granted by his lordship, and confirmed by the rector, the search took place on the 21st of July, in the presence of Lord Nugent, Counsellor (now Lord Denman), the Rev. Mr. Brookes, and nearly twenty others, onlookers and assistants. The circumstances have been thus detailed by an eye-witness: "It is remarkable that so distinguished and wealthy a family as that of Hampden should never have possessed a private vault for the interment of the respective branches of the family; such, however, is the case; they have, from a very early period, been buried in the chancel of the church, about four feet deep. On the morning of the 21st of July, we all assembled in the church, and commenced the operation of opening the ground. After examining the initials and dates on several leaden coffins, we came to the one in question, the plate of which was so corroded, that it crumbled and broke into small pieces on touching it. It was therefore impossible to ascertain the name of the individual it contained. The coffin had originally been inclosed in wood, covered with velvet, a small portion only of which was apparent near the bottom at the left side, which was not the case with those of a later date, where the initials were very distinct, and the lead more perfect and fresher in appearance. The register stated that Hampden was interred on the 25th of June, 1643; an old document, still in existence, gives a curious and full account of the grand procession on the occasion; we were, therefore, pretty certain that this must be the one in question, having carefully examined all others in succession. It was lying under the western window, near the tablet erected by him, when living, to the memory of his beloved wife, whose virtues he extols in the most affectionate language. Without positive proof, it was reasonable to suppose that he would be interred near his adored partner; and this being found at her feet, it was unanimously agreed that the lid should be cut open to ascertain the fact, which proved afterwards that we were not mistaken. The parish plumber descended, and commenced cutting across the coffin, then longitudinally, until the whole was sufficiently loosened to roll back, in order to lift off the wooden lid beneath, which was found in such good preservation, that it came off nearly entire. Beneath this was another lid of the same material, which was raised without materially giving away. The coffin had originally been filled up with sawdust, which was found undisturbed, except in the centre, where the abdomen had fallen in. The sawdust was then removed, and the process of examination commenced. Silence reigned. Not a whisper or breath was heard. Each stood on the tiptoe of expectation, awaiting the result as to what appearance the face would present when divested of its covering. Lord Nugent descended into the grave, and first removed the outer cloth, which was firmly wrapped round the body—then a second, and a third—such care having been taken to preserve the body from the worm of corruption. Here a very singular scene presented itself. No regular features were apparent, although the face retained a death-like whiteness, and showed the various windings of the blood-vessels beneath the skin. The upper row of teeth was perfect, and those that remained in the under jaw, on being taken out and examined, were quite sound. A little beard remained on the lower part of the chin, and the whiskers were strong, and somewhat lighter than his hair, which was a full auburn brown. The upper part of the bridge of the nose was still elevated; the remainder had given way to the pressure of the cloths, which had been firmly bound round the head. The eyes were but slightly sunk in, and were covered with the same white film which characterized the general appearance of the face. Finding that a difference of opinion existed as to the indentation in the left shoulder, where it was supposed he had been wounded, it was unanimously agreed to raise up the coffin altogether, and place it in the centre of the church, where a more accurate examination might take place. The coffin was extremely heavy, but by elevating one end with a crowbar, two strong ropes were adjusted under each end, and it was thus drawn up by twelve men in the most careful manner possible. Being placed on a trestle, the first operation was to examine the arms, which nearly retained their original size. On lifting up the right arm, we found it was dispossessed of its hand. We might, therefore, naturally conjecture that it had been amputated, as the bone presented a perfectly flat appearance, as if sawn off by some sharp instrument. On searching under the cloths, to our no small astonishment, we found the hand, or rather a number of small bones, enclosed in a separate cloth. For about six inches up the arm the flesh had wasted away, being evidently smaller than the lower part of the left arm, to which the hand was firmly united, and which presented no symptoms of decay, farther than the two bones of the forefinger loose. Even the nails remained entire, of which we saw no appearance in the cloth containing the bones of the right hand. At this process of the investigation, we were perfectly satisfied that, independent of the result of any farther examinations, such a striking coincidence as the loss of the right hand would justify our belief in Sir R. Pye's statement to the Harleys, that his presentation pistol was the innocent cause of a wound which afterwards proved mortal. It was, however, possible that at the same moment, in the heat of the action of Chalgrave, when Colonel Hampden discharged his pistol at his adversary, that his adversary's ball might wound him in the shoulder; for he was soon after observed, as stated by Sir Philip Warwick, 'with his head hanging down, and his hands leaning upon his horse's neck.'

In order to corroborate or disprove the different statements relative to his having been wounded in the shoulder, a close examination of the parts took place. The clavicle of the right shoulder was firmly united to the scapula, nor did there appear any contusion or indentation that evinced symptoms of any wound ever having been inflicted. The left shoulder, on the contrary, was smaller and sunken in, as if the clavicle had been displaced. To remove all doubts, it was adjudged necessary to remove the arms, which were amputated with a penknife. The socket of the right arm was perfectly white and healthy, and the clavicle firmly united to the scapula, nor was there the least appearance of contusion or wound. The socket on the left shoulder, on the contrary, was of a brownish coat, and the clavicle being found quite loose and disunited from the scapula, proved that dislocation had taken place. The bones, however, were quite perfect. Such dislocation, then, must have arisen either from the force of a ball, or from Colonel Hampden having fallen from his horse when he lost the power of holding the reins, by reason of his hand having been so dreadfully shattered. The latter, in all probability, was the case, as it would be barely possible for a ball to pass through the shoulder without some fracture either of the clavicle or scapula. In order to examine the head and hair, the body was raised up and supported with a shovel; on removing the cloths, which adhered firmly to the back of the head, we found the hair in a complete state of preservation. It was of a dark auburn color, and, according to the custom of the times, was very long, from five to six inches. It was drawn up and tied at the top of the head with black thread or silk. The ends had the appearance of being cut off. * * * He was five feet nine inches in height, apparently of great muscular strength, of a vigorous and robust frame; forehead broad and high, and the skull altogether well-formed—such a one as the imagination would conceive capable of great exploits.

Here I close the narrative—one of singular interest to those who were eye-witnesses of the examination, which presented a scene so novel, so ghastly, but at the same time so full of moment, that it will ever prove a memorable event in the short era of our lives. We recalled to mind the virtuous actions of the deceased, his manly defence against the tyranny of the Star-Chamber, his abandonment of every social and domestic tie for the glorious cause of freedom; and whilst we gazed on his remains, remembered that that voice which was once raised on behalf of his country, had contributed in no small measure to prepare the way for the blessings of liberty, which, but for his warning, might to this day have been withheld from an enlightened people."

IMPORTANCE OF TRIFLES.—Why was the refusal of a "private gentleman to pay twenty or thirty shillings to the king's service argued," says Clarendon, "before all the judges of England?" Because, in those twenty shillings one party saw the germ of a tyranny, and the other of a rebellion. Why will a lawyer warn you against permitting a neighbor to claim the gathering of even a leaf upon your estate, without contesting his right? Because the gathering of the leaf may invalidate your title to the whole estate. Why will a wise politician contest so earnestly for the form of a word, or the wearing of a hat, or the title of a writ? Because each of these will become a precedent; and in precedent is involved principle. Why will an engineer be alarmed at the first drop of water oozing through a dam? Because the rest, he knows, will follow it. Why is the discovery of one little bone in a stratum of a rock enough to overturn a whole theory of geology? Because the little bone, like a pack-thread, will draw after it the whole skeleton, like a coil of rope, and the skeleton will imply the power which brought it to its site; and that power will be vast and pregnant with other influences: and thus the whole system of the science will be dragged into peril, as many other systems have been perilled, and have been upset by the merest trifle, by one little fact. Why will a spot of blood betray murder? Why will the print of a nail discover a thief? Why will a whole neighborhood take flight at the sight of a little boy, with only a little spark of fire, going into a magazine of powder? or a crowd disperse upon the ice at the sound of the slightest crack? Because nature, as well as theology, has her Athanasian creed, and her damatory clauses for those who neglect iotas; because nature, as well as theology, does not know what a trifle is.—Sewell's Christian Morals.

SOME men keep savage dogs around their houses, so that the hungry poor who stop to "get a bite" may get it outside the door.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already healed by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere

ja25-tf

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATEDSalt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers, Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, — FIFTY CENTS.
Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by
MRS. A. GRIDLEY,
Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,
AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.
TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,
Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,
SAN FRANCISCO

ja25-tf

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!DE GRATH'S GENUINE
ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES.

Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

ja25

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roscate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
San Francisco.

ja25-tf

ALLEN'SLUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
San Francisco.

au27

DR. STEPHENS'CELEBRATED
Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

au27

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND DRESSING
THE Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicate dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Fridridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
Agents, San Francisco.

ja25-tf

BREWSTER & CO'SCarriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA, will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE, and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALTY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES, and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to
BREWSTER & CO.,
Of Broome street,
The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,
Of No. 372, Broome street,

de17-5m

NEW YORK.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATINGAmalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,
Southeast corner of Montgomery and California street,
San Francisco.

cl7-5m

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

CREATE A HEALTHY APPETITE!

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Cure Dyspepsia, Diarrhoea and Constipation.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Invigorate the System and enliven the mind.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Overcome the effects of Drunkenness and Late Hours.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Cure all Diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS
Are Palatable to the Taste.

They are the

BEST BITTERS IN THE MARKET,

And when once used will always be called for again.

They are made in the most careful manner
From Pure Old Wheat Whisky, Medicated from
Roots and Herbs
Especially adapted for the cure of all Stomachic Diseases
and Liver Complaints.

Try Them and You will be Satisfied.

For sale everywhere by Druggists and Liquor Dealers
or by

N. B. JACOBS & CO.,
423 Front street,
San Francisco.

fe11-6m

OPPOSITION STEAMER-DAY,

MARCH 13th!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK!

VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE!!!

THROUGH IN 21 DAYS!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

AMERICA,

W. L. MERRY - - - - - COMMANDER

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON MONDAY, - - - - - MARCH 13TH

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely,
Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,
3,500 Tons, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit of the Isthmus is a pleasant trip. Meals furnished free by the Company while crossing. A haggamaster will be sent through by each steamer. Insurance on Treasure at the lowest rates.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,
Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,
Up stairs, San Francisco.

fe25

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
Fine Clothing
—AND—
GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS.
TRUNKS, VALISES, CLOTH BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 17

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2 & 4, San Francisco

y2

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

WITH the exception of the still onward movement of Sherman, and a succession of rumors of another victory for Sheridan over Gen. Early in the Shenandoah Valley, we have nothing of moment to lay before our readers. Yet the "record" is full of incident; every indication points unerringly to the final consummation which every true patriot so devoutly wishes. That there is to be no "dissolution of this Union," that we are eventually to triumph over our enemies, domestic and foreign, not the most weak-kneed sceptic has room to doubt. Republican liberty out of this great baptism of blood will arise regenerated, disenthralled—acknowledged by all mankind to be the truest and most humanizing of all the governmental systems of the earth.

March 1.—Some 200 rebel deserters who came into the armies of the Potomac and James report that the Petersburg theatre, filled with rebel stores, had been burned.

Deserters and refugees who came into our lines at Wilmington on the 1st, report that Gen. Sherman, by a flank movement, compelled the rebels to evacuate Florence, and was moving in the direction of Fayetteville, which is on the direct route to either Goldsboro or Raleigh.

Joe Johnston assumed command of the forces in front of Sherman, which were lately commanded by Beauregard.

The city of Columbia, S. C., was burned on the 18th of February. It is stated that it was destroyed by order of Sherman as a punishment for the citizens firing on our troops after the city fell into our hands.

The alarm created last week at Louisville, Ky., arose from a guerrilla raid under Magruder and Davison, who were attacked by Maj. Hamilton's command at Painsville, and completely routed. Magruder is reported wounded and Davison captured.

Deserters from Kirby Smith's army are constantly coming into the Union lines at Little Rock.

The draft is resumed in New Orleans after four days suspension. The people there are not pleased with the state of things.

Mobile was reported as on the eve of being evacuated. The latest news contradicts this statement, and further informs us that the garrison was being materially strengthened, and reinforcements were arriving in the city daily from every available place. Gens. Beauregard, Dick Taylor, Chalmers, Frank Gardner, Mowry and others were there on the 14th. The city, it is said, is not at all invested by the Federal troops.

Generals Crook and Kelly, who were captured by rebel raiders last week, are confined in the Libby prison, Richmond.

The following despatch was transmitted to the War Department by Gen. Gillmore:

Headquarters, South Carolina, Charleston, February 22. The inspection of the rebel defenses of Charleston show that we have taken over 450 pieces of ordnance, being more than double what I first reported. The lot includes 8 and 10-inch Columbiads, a great many 32 and 42-pounders, some 7-inch Brooks' rifled, and many pieces of a foreign make. We also captured eight locomotives and a great number of passenger and platform cars, all in good condition. Deserters report the last of Hardee's army was to have crossed the Santee river yesterday, bound for Charlotte, N. C., and it was found that Sherman had already intercepted their march. It is reported on similar authority that the last of Hood's army, 12,000 strong, passed through Augusta last Sunday, the 19th, on their way to Beauregard. Georgetown has been evacuated and is in our possession. Deserters are coming in constantly. We have 400 already. GILLMORE.

March 2.—News had been received at Charleston that Sherman had marched on Augusta, and that the enemy at once evacuated the city.

The U. S. steamer Mahaska captured the blockade runner Delia under English colors. She had a cargo of pig lead and some sabres.

Acting Admiral Strybing destroyed the salt works on Western Bay.

A despatch to the Columbia, S. C., Enquirer, dated Marianna, Fla., February 26th, says:

Dickenson captured 85 prisoners, including 1 colonel, 3 captains and 10 wagons, 60 horses, 1 ambulance, arms, etc. The enemy lost 5 killed, including an adjutant, and 4 wounded, including their colonel. Not one of Dickenson's company was lost.

A correspondent of the Montgomery Appeal, at Grenada, Miss., says:

"Affairs on the border are in an intolerable condition. The country is filled with bands of jayhawkers and robbers, principally deserters, whose deeds rival the famous days of Dick Turpin. Such a reign of terror has been inaugurated that travel is almost completely broken up in some portion of the country. Coupled with these, are large numbers of soldiers returning to their homes on furlough, who are vowing vengeance on the northern counties, who have refused to take Confederate money for corn and other necessities of life, from their families. Unless something is speedily done by those in authority we may look for a desperate state of affairs here during the present month."

The rebel Gen. Forrest publishes an address to his troops, recounting the results of his operations during the past year. He says they have fought 50 battles, killed and captured 16,000 of the enemy, captured 2,000 horses and mules, 67 pieces of artillery, 4 gunboats, 4 transports, 20 barges, 300 wagons, 50 ambulances, 5,000 stand of arms; and have destroyed 40 block-houses, 38 railroad bridges and 200 miles of railroad, 6 locomotives, 100 ears, and $15,000,000 worth of property. In accomplishing this he admits they were occasionally sustained by other troops, but says their regular number never exceeded 5,000, 2,000 of whom have been killed and wounded, and 2,000 taken prisoners.

Lee has ordered Goldsboro and Kingston to be fortified. He says Goldsboro must be held at all hazard.

The New York Commercial Advertiser estimates the number of guns captured from the enemy since the first of the year at 1301.

The rebel pirate Chickamauga was destroyed on Saturday in the Cape Fear river, to prevent her falling into our hands.

March 5.—Various despatches in relation to the reported defeat and capture of Gen. Early by Sheridan, and the capture of Charlottesville, have been received by the War Department. The following, from Gen. Grant, are significant:

CITY POINT, March 4th.—Refugees confirm the statement of deserters of the capture of Early and nearly his entire force. They say it took place on Thursday, between Staunton and Charlottesville, and that his defeat was total.

March 5th, 2 A. M.—Deserters from every point of the enemy's lines confirm the capture of Charlottesville by Sheridan, and say he captured General Early and nearly all his entire force, consisting of eighteen hundred men. Four brigades were reported sent to Lynchburg to get there before Sheridan if possible.

As late as the 6th there is nothing definite. The concurrent testimony of all deserters and refugees from Ord's right is, however, that Sheridan surprised and encountered the rebels under Early at Waynesboro, midway between Staunton and Charlottesville, utterly routing and capturing his entire force, securing among the prisoners, Daughley, the general commanding. It is reported from Hancock's headquarters at Winchester that Sheridan defeated Early, but that Early himself was not captured.

The Herald's Washington special says: "Authentic information from Richmond has been received that Sherman's advance had reached Fayetteville, N. C." The despatch also says that Porter's gunboats had reached that point. It is stated that Gen. Grant credits the report that Sherman and Schofield have united their forces at Fayetteville.

March 6.—A portion of the New York cavalry and one company of the 1st North Carolina, mounted lately, surprised and captured a company of rebel soldiers, near Greenville, N. C.; they then dashed into the town, destroyed the commissary stores and captured other prisoners. The Admiral has issued orders for the maintenance of the authority of the United States. The first says that, conformably to the laws of the United States, slavery no longer exists within the limits of the Union, and persons residing there who thus become freemen, will in future enjoy the fruits of their own labor.

Eight hundred Union prisoners arrived at Wilmington for exchange; they were sick, starved, emaciated and naked.

Admiral Dahlgren captured Georgetown, S. C., on the 23d of February. Fort White, a splendid work just below the city, mounting 17 guns, was also taken. The sailors and marines landed and took possession of the city. Rebel cavalry charged on them in the streets, but were repulsed, with a loss of several killed, wounded and prisoners.

March 7.—A large number of negroes are reported to have been at work throwing up fortifications along the Roanoke river. It is surmised that if Lee is compelled to fall back from his present position he will form a new defensive line along the banks of that stream.

March 9.—A correspondent of the N. Y. World, writing from Washington N. C. the 28th of February, says our advance under Terry, was twelve miles from there at that date, on the Northwest branch of the Cape Fear river, with Hoke's troops confronting it on the other side.

The Richmond papers express their belief that Grant will attack Lee's lines around the rebel capital so soon as the ground will permit. A meeting to obtain subscriptions for provisions for Lee's army, was held recently in Danville, Va. The Richmond Whig, in noticing it, says "Lee's army must be fed, or we lose all."

The Shasta Courier says: "For long years, Grave-Yard Hill, in the vicinity of Horsetown, has been a point upon which prospectors have cast longing eyes, and therein has been sunk many a prospect hole. Tunnels, too, have been run for limited distances, only to realize the color in a sort of pipe-clay. Recently a couple of enterprising miners concluded to go deeper and see the result. Four inches farther down in an abandoned tunnel a pan of dirt was obtained and washed out with an agreeable result of a little over ten dollars. A few hours afterward that hill was staked off and claimed. This discovery of an under-strata of pay dirt, if it continues to be developed, will bring Horsetown back to its palmy days."

The Sisters of Charity have purchased the Beatty House in San Leandro.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

A steam fire engine purchased in Philadelphia for Confidence Engine Company of Sacramento arrived by the Golden Age, March 9th.

The Virginia Union says that the water in the Ophir shaft is still one hundred feet deep, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding.

A friend (says the Pajaro Times) who has been prospecting for oil near Arthur's Ranch, says the excitement in that section is intense, everybody owning oil springs. It is in contemplation to build and run an oil canal between that point and San Jose.

J. H. Murry, deputy Surveyor-General, has been appointed (says the Mendocino Democrat) to run the line defining the boundaries of Mendocino and Humboldt counties. Mart. Baechtel accompanies him as commissioner for Mendocino county.

At the recent annual election of officers of the Sacramento Valley Railroad Company, the following-named gentlemen were elected Directors for the ensuing year: Geo. F. Bragg, R. S. Fretz, James Freeborn, L. L. Robison, F. L. A. Pioche, Levi Parsons and Jonathan Hunt.

The store of E. Richards in Sonora (says the Democrat) was entered, a few nights since—the robbers effecting an entrance by cutting through the solid stone wall of the building, which must have occupied hours—and robbed of $40, all there was in the drawer. There was an attempt made to rob the house of Mr. Lucas, at Shaw's Flat, lately.

A life-like representation of President Lincoln on a white horse was carried in the torchlight procession at Marysville, on the evening of March 4th, says the Appeal. As far, at least, as the "pale horse" is concerned, we should call it a death-like representation. If Uncle Abe had seen it, ten to one he would have had his "little joke" over the "emblematic spectacle."

Thomas R. Graham was taken from the State Prison to Sacramento, recently, on a writ of habeas corpus, and upon examination of the facts connected with his commitment the Supreme Court gave him the freedom of the State. Graham was convicted three years ago, in Sonoma county, of receiving stolen goods, and sentenced to five years imprisonment.

Jesse Clark, an old resident and merchant of Alder Creek, near Folsom, was found dead in a shaft eighteen or twenty feet deep, March 4th. He had been suffering from delirium tremens, and had been warned by "spirits," as he believed, that the hour of his death was appointed. One of his friends employed strategy against spirit-power, by "tampering" with the clock. Clark was greatly disappointed at the apparent failure to dispose of him as arranged and agreed upon. A few hours afterward his body was found in the shaft, his head downward; it is presumed that he fell in accidentally.

Thieves in Folsom have no respect for persons or places. A few weeks since they called at the Episcopal church during the "small hours" and took away various articles of service, if not value; more recently the same edifice was again entered and robbed, the rector's surplice and gown and a silver cup valued at $75 being among the articles selected. The Catholic church was also entered and a clock stolen; the clock has been recovered—in what manner is not stated, but perhaps the rascals thought it better to relinquish their hold on time than all their hopes of eternity.

The Commencement Exercises of the Toland Medical Institute took place March 6th, and were well attended. Owing to the inability of Mr. Felton to be present, the oration was omitted. The occasion, nevertheless, was a very interesting one, and being the close of the initial term in the Institute's history, bore an importance as presenting the auguries for its future. There were eight young men in the graduating class, Messrs. Davie, DaMour, Welch, Stivers, Pond, Debois, Handy and Weeks. Besides these, diplomas were granted to three practicing physicians, graduates of other colleges. Dr. Wm. O. Ayers, Dean of the Faculty, presented the diplomas, and Dr. Toland followed in a valedictory address to the graduates, in which he laid down, as on a chart, their future course in the honorable pursuit of their profession. Allusion was made to the auspicious infancy of of the institution, the building they were assembled in having been erected without any collateral assistance, and being entirely free from debt. The speaker himself having erected the college edifice and furnished the laboratory at his individual expense, now indulges in the warranted hope that an appreciative community, who are to be benefitted by the project of which he has assumed to become the founder, will second his efforts and manifest their appreciation in such a manner that the Institute may not long remain deficient in the necessary adjunct of a library. The Doctor took an affectionate leave of the young men of the graduating class, and asked of them, for the future, in the days of their success, a grateful recollection of this their alma mater.—Morning Call.

USEFUL INFORMATION.

DISTANCES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

To various points:

To Fort Point, 4 miles, by omnibus, four trips a day.
 Lone Mountain, 3, street railway.
 Seal Rock, 6, cars and omnibus, two trips a day.
 Mission Dolores, street railways; Ocean House, 8.
 San Mateo, 20, railroad.
 Crystal Springs, 23, railroad and stage.
 Half Moon Bay, 29, do. do.
 Redwood city, 30, do. do.
 Mountain View, 38, do. do.
 Santa Clara, 47, do. do.
 San Jose, 50, do. do.
 Alviso, 46, steamer, daily.
 Almaden mines, 67, steamer and stage; or by railroad and stage, 64.
 Santa Cruz, 78, railroad and stage.
 Oakland, 8, steamer and railroad, six trips a day.
 Alameda, 11, steamer, three trips a day.
 San Leandro, 15, steamer and railroad.
 Mission San Jose, 34, steamer, railroad and stage.
 Wurin Springs, 37, do. do.
 Benicia, 30, steamer leaves at 4 P. M. daily.
 Sacramento, 117, do. do.
 Stockton, 117, do. do.
 Martinez, 33, do. do.
 Pacheco, 38, steamer and stage.
 Diablo Coal Mines, 44, steamer and stage.
 Suisun, 50, steamer, or 54 by steamer and stage.
 Vallejo, 28; Mare Island, 37; Napa city, 50.
 White Sulphur Springs, 67, stage from Napa.
 Geysers Springs, 118, do. do.
 Sonoma, 52, steamer, tri-weekly.
 Petaluma, 48, steamer, daily.
 Healdsburg, 80, stage daily from Petaluma.
 San Quentin, 12, steamer; Farallone Islands, 21.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Letters to any part of the United States, 3 cents for each 1 ounce or part thereof.
 Drop Letters, 2 cents.

Advertised letters, 1 cent in addition to the regular rates.

Valuable letters may be registered on application at the office of mailing, and the payment of 20 cents registration fee.

Transient newspapers, periodicals, blanks, proof-sheets, book manuscripts, pamphlets, and all mailable printed matter, except circulars and books, 2 cents for each and every 4 ounces. Double these rates are charged for books.

Unsealed circulars, to one address, not exceeding three in number, 2 cents, and in the same proportion for a greater number.

Seeds, cuttings, roots, etc., 2 cents for each 4 ounces or less quantity.

All packages of mail matter not charged with letter postage must be so arranged that the same can be conveniently examined by Postmasters; if not, letter postage will be charged.

No package will be forwarded by mail which weighs over 4 pounds.

All postage matter, for delivery within the United States, must be prepaid by stamps (except duly certified letters of soldiers and sailors); otherwise, double the above rates will be charged on delivery.

Weekly newspapers (one copy only) sent to actual subscribers within the county where printed and published, free.

Letters to Canada and other British North American Provinces, when not over 3,000 miles, 10 cents for each 1 ounce. When over 3,000 miles, 15 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to Great Britain or Ireland, 24 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to other foreign countries vary in rate according to the route by which they are sent.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
 Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
 645 Washington st., San Francisco.

BOOK-KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete Business Education, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4-3m

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHERS HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
 'y30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charrrier of Paris, Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,

ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,

No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKY.

Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge. fe4-3m

I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES, adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of SUPERIOR CARRIAGES, ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

ATKINS MASSEY,

UNDERTAKER,

(At the Old Stand.)

No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,
 First house below Kearny street.

Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases. Office of the City de3-tf and County Coroner.

NATHANIEL GRAY,

UNDERTAKER,

CITY AND COUNTY SEXTON,

641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,

Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC BURIAL CASES and CASKETS.

de17-3m

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40 10:20 11:00 11:40

FROM THE CITY

10:00 10:40 11:20 12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my25 F. MCCOPPIN, Superintendent.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, AND JOHN COLLIER

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"

Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,
 SAN FRANCISCO.

VANDALL, CARR & CO.,
 BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,
 NO. 410 CLAY STREET,

(North side, between Sansome and Battery.

Particular attention paid to the printing of Briefs and Records. fe11-tf

PRINTING! PRINTING!!

DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Montgomery, - - San Francisco

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city. fe4-tf

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as SNOW, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
 NEW YORK, } 323 Montgomery street,
 387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
 de31-3m

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

401 Battery, cor. Clay,
 San Francisco. ja25-tf

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other mal-practices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

ja25-tf 401 Battery, corner Clay,
 San Francisco.

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGUARY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents for the Pacific Coast,
 401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,
 San Francisco.

Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-tf

NARRATIVE OF AN AUSTRALIAN DETECTIVE.

I AM a detective in the Victoria police, and have been one for some years; and I was formerly one in Paris, and I was employed as such in the Hyde Park Exhibition of 1851. Since then I have been in various parts of the world; in fact, there are very few of the force that haven't knocked about the world a good deal. However, at last I've settled in Australia, and hope my roving is ended. I have never had but one crack case intrusted to my care; I have sometimes tracked thieves from the diggings into the interior, and found them boundary riders or stations, or clerks that did not keep their accounts straight, and found them bullock-driving up-country, but these were small affairs; a pair of bracelets soon settled such. But once I had a hard matter to find out on the very slightest information received, which required all my skill and all the resources of my long experience.

Some four years ago there lived about a mile down the Glenelg River, beyond the bridge, an oldish man, who was reported to have made somewhere a good "pile." He was a thorough hermit; seldom stirred out, except to go to the store and buy a few necessaries, for which he always paid, and never was known to beat down or haggle about the prices of anything. This naturally led to the surmise that he had plenty of money. Near him lived another single man in a slab and bark hut; he was a shoemaker by trade, but in a small township like this his customers were but few and his livelihood precarious. He was known to be as poor as his neighbor was supposed to be rich, and was as much dependent on the forbearance of his creditors as the other was on his ready money. Between these two solitary men, living on the river side, there sprang up a strangely intimate friendship; always after breakfast, often through the day, and regularly at night, they had their pipe together, sometimes with a pannikin of tea only, at others with a glass of grog. There was a dim mystery hanging over the supposed rich man's history; where he had come from, or how he had made his money no one knew, and his churlish ways forbade any one to ask him; he and the shoemaker were all the world to each other, and beyond that neither seemed to care anything. In this uniform but curious mode of life weeks and months passed away; the only difference observable being that, although Stevens the shoemaker had no more customers than formerly, he now seemed to have money always at command, and not only paid off his old scores but had ready money for all he needed.

One morning, however—it was in the winter season, and the Glenelg was rolling its turbulent waters, muddy and swift, down to the sea—the old man's hut was not opened; wood splitters passing by observed that the old hermit was not sunning himself and smoking his "cutty" as usual, and that night Stevens came running into the township, greatly excited, and calling on Mr. T—— at the inn, told him that not having seen old Jeffrey all day he had forced an entrance into the hut, but that the old man was not there, and what had become of him he did not know. A policeman, for H—— is a police station, was immediately sent to take charge of the hut until the magistrates should make inquiry. Some days after the inquiry was made, but nothing came of it, further than the suspicion that Jeffrey had met with foul play. Still nothing was proved, nor could be proved until the body could be found; for, eccentric as the old man was, who could say he had not got up in the night, and as suddenly started from H—— as he had once made his appearance there?

As soon as intelligence of this affair reached headquarters at Melbourne the matter was placed in my hands, with instructions to exercise my own discretion in my proceedings, absolving me from all disgrace if I failed, and promising me one hundred pounds if I succeeded. My plan was adopted after much consideration, and I have no reason to regret the steps I took, as will be seen in the sequel. I took the little steamer Western, Captain Lucas, to Portland, 260 miles, and after stopping a few days at Mac's celebrated hotel, I started by mail for the far interior. After three days' journey I arrived at H—— as a "traveller" looking for a job of work; I had a tolerably heavy swag, and this with my pannikeu and billy gave me all the appearance of a bona fide one. I went straight up to the bar, had my nobbler, lighted my pipe, and then sat down outside to consider my next movement. It was necessary I should have some one in my confidence, but I resolved not to trust the local police, as in these remote stations their life of idleness often makes them loafers and gossips. I resolved to call Mr. T——, the hotel keeper and postmaster, aside—he had been an officer in the army many years—and tell him my errand. I did so—never was secret better kept—and returned as if nothing had occurred. Toward evening the bar was pretty full, and I took the opportunity of saying publicly to Mr. T—— that I was out of work, that I was a groom, that I did not want to go on a station, and should be glad of a chance job. He at once told me to go to his stables and tell his foreman to take me on as an extra stable hand. I gave Mr. T—— my swag to take care of; it contained my uniform, and my authority from headquarters to act as a detective. He understood all, and that was sufficient.

As groom I remained here seven months; able for a while to do nothing; but feeling more and more confident that the general suspicion of Stevens was well founded. Of course I became intimate with him, but only in the evenings when my work was done; in all respects I acted as an ordinary, receiving my weekly wages, and carefully avoiding everything that might lead any one to suppose I was anything but a groom. Often have I laughed within myself as a mounted trooper has ridden up, and called me to take his horse, and give him feed; however, I kept my own counsel, and little by little light dawned upon my track. Over the never failing pipe I had frequent conversations with Stevens about this old man; on such occasions he would generally fix his eyes upon the ground, which gave me the opportunity to watch him more narrowly. I could then see the nervous twitchings of his face, the biting of his lip, and the sudden passing of his handkerchief across his brow, which convinced me that he knew more of this affair than I did. Frequently at the close of our conversation, in which Stevens was making these unconscious self-revelations, would he say, "I hate talking of this dismal subject, let's have another glass." On such occasions he always said: "I'll shout; you are only a groom, I can afford it better than you." Gradually he took to regular drinking; morning, noon, and night he was to be found at the bar. When joked about his finances he had his answer ready: he had sold his horse, or an old mate had called and given him some cash. So long, however, as he "shouted" freely few cared where the money came from. My eyes, however, were steadily fixed on his drinking habits as the clue to my researches. Summer was now coming on; though it was a late summer it was a regular hot Australian one; and in the course of a few weeks the Glenelg began to dry up, and its long chain of water-holes to appear. Now was the time for ascertaining whether the remains of the old man were to be found in any of the water-holes in the neighborhood of H——, and one evening as I was talking to Stevens about this I said, "You or I may as well try and find the remains of Jeffrey, and so lay claim to the Government reward." I noticed this gave him quite a turn; and although he tried to conceal it I saw that he trembled all over, and though generally very mild spoken, he got quite angry with me, and told me I might do what I liked, but he wasn't so fond of looking after dead men, especially if they were murdered. I replied: "No one said that Jeffrey was murdered; you have always said he made away with himself."

"I thought so once, but now, the more I think over the matter, the more convinced I am that he was murdered."

"That has to be proved," said I, and to prove it we must first find the remains, and as the river dries up I have no doubt we shall find them in one of the water-holes near his hut."

This was not exactly a guess, but was a conclusion arrived at thus: First, Stevens was a slight-built man, and supposing him to have been the murderer, could not have carried Jeffrey far; and secondly, every one knows that murderers seldom have nerve or forethought to carry their victims far from the scene of the murder. As soon as I had said this he became very pale, and quickly said, "Well, let's have a nobbler; I can't stand this everlasting talk about a murdered man."

We had our glass and parted for the night; but my mind was already made up. Stevens, beyond doubt, was the murderer, and I must obtain the proof. I am not going to defend our code of morals. I admit that we often do evil that good may come; but society should not employ us to find out dark crimes if they mean to condemn us for our questionable methods of procedure. It was now late in January, and the weather was intensely hot. It was surprising to see how rapidly the Glenelg ceased to be a river, and how each day the water-holes became shallower and shallower. Prompted by me Mr. T—— obtained, from a neighboring magistrate, orders for the police to examine every water-hole within a mile on either side of Jeffrey's hut. As soon as this was known Stevens was down at the bar trying, I suppose, to smother his memory in deep potations of whisky. Directly the police commenced searching the river, I discharged myself, and having obtained my check, proceeded, or pretended, to spend it after the usual up-country fashion, which, as everybody knows, means staying in the bar and shouting right off the reel. This I did not exactly do; I kept myself sober as a judge; behind the scenes I prompted everything; through Mr. T—— I suggested every step that had hitherto been taken, and now I had only to wait the result of the searching and dragging these water-holes. Those who know the country know that it is no easy matter, and that it occupies considerable time. Sometimes only two or three could be searched in a day, on others more. While this was going on Stevens became almost a resident in the bar, seldom leaving it, but betraying the most intense and childish curiosity as to the result of the search.

"Have they found anything?" or, "Haven't they found anything yet?" or, "Well I should have thought they would have found something by this time," were expressions that frequently fell from his lips. It was, I think, the fourth day of search, and Stevens had been drinking hard all the time; on the afternoon of that day a sack was found with human remains in it at the bottom of a hole; and on the evening of that same day drink and excitement had rendered Stevens incapable of taking care of himself, and, at my suggestion, he was conveyed to the lock-up as drunk and disorderly. I too, though perfectly sober, affected to have been out on the spree, and was also locked up in the same place with Stevens, and my name also entered on the night-charge-list as drunk and disorderly. I never saw such a change in a man as came over Stevens when he found I was locked up with him. The effects of the drink were passing away owing to the strong mental excitement produced by the discovery of these remains; and no sooner was the lock turned on me than he clasped me by the hand as the "Groom that had always been so friendly," and began to cry, piteously like a child. His thoughts were running on the murder, and I resolved to use the opportunity. To make this right I began: "I say, Stevens, do you know they have found the old man's body? It was in a sack, and the sack was weighted with stones; and one of the stones, they say, was your lapstone. The skull is broken in two places, so that it is plain he must have been murdered. What made you talk about him in your sleep just now?"

"Did I? what did I say?"

"You said if they would let you off you would show them where his money was." (This he had said in his sleep.) Upon this he gave a convulsive shriek, fell back upon the straw and exclaimed:

"Yes, I killed old Jeffrey—but don't peach on me; they can only bring me up for being drunk and disorderly, and I'll give you half the money. I say, groom, you won't peach, will you? I will leave these parts. I have had too much whisky. Let me sleep; I'll tell you everything to-morrow; but don't peach and I will make a clean breast of it."

Before the morning broke he had confessed everything to me. I had always been a good fellow, and he didn't mind telling Mr. T——'s groom everything. He had entered the old man's hut at midnight, beat in his skull, put the body in a sack, and, fool that he was, put in his own lapstone along with the other stones to make it sink, and had hid his money beneath the mud floor of his cottage. The next morning we were both brought before the magistrate of the district charged as aforesaid. On being asked what I had to say I handed the magistrate my authority to act as detective, and requested to be placed in the witness-box, as I had a charge of murder to bring against Stevens, who was there on the minor charge. In less time than it takes to tell this I had left the room, and greatly to the bewilderment of every one, especially of the local police, the well-known groom at H—— was in his uniform, bringing his charge against Stevens, founded on his own confession, of murdering the old hermit Jeffrey.

The sequel is soon told; my evidence hung Stevens, who again and again, previous to his execution, confessed not only this murder, but the murder of a mate in the bush some years back, with whom he was working on a station making a stake and rail fence.

TWO BAD HABITS.—There are two weaknesses in our habits which are very common, and which have a very prejudicial influence on our welfare. The first is giving way to the ease or indulgence of the moment, instead of doing at once what ought to be done. This practice almost diminishes the beneficial effects of our actions, and often leads us to abstain from action altogether; as, for instance, if at this season of the year there is a gleam of sunshine, of which we feel we ought to take advantage, but we have not the resolution to leave at the moment a comfortable seat or an attractive occupation, we miss the most favorable opportunity, and, perhaps, at last, justify ourselves in remaining indoors on the ground that the time for exercise is past. One evil attendant upon the habit of procrastination is, that it produces a certain dissatisfaction of the mind which impedes and deranges the animal functions, and tends to prevent the attainment of a high state of health. A perception of what is right, followed by a promptness of execution, would render the way of life perfectly amiable. Children should be told to do nothing but what is reasonable, but they should be taught to do what they are told at once. The habit will stand them instead all their lives. The second weakness is, when we have made a good resolution, and have partially failed in executing it, we are very apt to abandon it altogether. For instance, if a person who has been accustomed to rise at ten resolves to rise at six, and after a few successful attempts happens to sleep till seven, there is great danger that he will relapse into his former habit, or probably even go beyond it, and lie till noon. It is the same with resolutions as to economy or temperance, or anything else; if we cannot do all we intended, or make one slip, we are apt to give up entirely. Now, what we should aim at is, always to do the best we can under existing circumstances; and then our progress, with the exception of slight interruptions, would be continual.

GOODWIN & CO.,

HAVING RECEIVED AT THE
LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,

—THE—
First Premium,
—ON—
FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES,

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such

Consisting of

Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,
DINING ROOM AND
OFFICE FURNITURE,

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,
No. 528 Washington street

RUPTURE.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.
Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.
A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street,
Between Montgomery and Kearny,
Manufactory, 232 Sutter street. dc3

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFfered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutory and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRETIEN PFISTER,
oc15-1f No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,
SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,
Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,
(Near Post-office),
SAN FRANCISCO.
GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,
AND
Importers of all Classes
OF
SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz. William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz. Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballard's, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.
We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.
Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading
Rifle. ja8-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, Etc.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipment. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.
Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns,
London. A certificate given with each Gun.
A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's Wes-son's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.
New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.
WILSON & EVANS,
No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco,
And 122 J street, Sacramento.
dc3-3m

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S
PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas.
Minturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit.
Stephen Cuiverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of hailing winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shifts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN,

No. 23 Third street, San Francisco,
Who will give all information about them. dc17-3m

CALIFORNIAHome Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insures against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H.
Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Deering, A. B. McCreery, C. Duisenberg, C. J.
Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heyemann,
R. G. Sueath, C. F. MacDermot, J. C. Wilmerding, Levi
Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B.
F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Thibault, S.
Hemenway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.
B. F. LOWE, President,
JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5-3m

REMOVAL.INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.*THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law,
$75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallent & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.
no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $750,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $600,000
Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
ju25-1f 206 Front street, corner of California.

THE REASON WHY

EVERYBODY USES
THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED
ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,
OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.

Second—It is more effectual.

Third—It saves labor.

Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white
and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally.
Manufactory, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco. ja7-3m

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;
JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;
STEAMBOAT GIN;
OLD TOM GIN;
IRISH WHISKY,
from Bond direct.
For sale by V. SQRZA,
ja28-1f 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.
In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PUR-GATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY
MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fever and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals
among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enclosed in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it
"B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,
Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S
no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will enable him to compete with any in the profession.
Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platina, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anæsthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. dc10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611
CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.
The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. dc3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPHIN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection.
All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.
Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

PHINEAS BANNING,

FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

M. HARKINS,

MANUFACTURER OF

LADIES', MISSES', AND CHILDRENS

Boots and Shoes.

Also, GENTLEMEN'S BOOTS, SHOES and SLIPPERS
MADE TO ORDER.

No. 151 FOURTH STREET,
Second door above Howard, east side,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Repairing of all kinds neatly and promptly done.

ALTA MILLS,
STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, - - - - - SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., - - - - - Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour,
Hominy, Large, Hominy, Small; Oatmeal,
Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 &
3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.
All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order.
dc17-3m

NOTICE TO SHIPPERSRed Bluff.

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER
5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,
EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5-1f J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY,.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation,
the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.
ju25

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,
No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every description, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine
Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear, or for Dealers' Supplies, from a sailing to a steam engine
—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.
Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles), can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address: CARRINGTON & CO.,
au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIF-TEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,

and for the City and County of San Francisco, HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff; vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant:—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons
—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOWEY, Clerk.
By G. C. LERCHER, Deputy Clerk.
Ch - - - - - cC. Delany, Pl. 21. 2110 dc24-3m

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

MISS MATILDA HERON,

Supported by

THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

This Saturday Evening, March 11th, 1865.

Will be presented the Dramatic version of Hester Prynne!

OR THE SCARLET LETTER.

*The Public are informed that the First Engagement with MISS MATILDA HERON will positively close at the expiration of the coming week.

*In Active Preparation—Dion Boucicault's Play entitled EVADNE, OR, THE BRIDAL.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, March 11th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

BY THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

The Drama of

OLIVER TWIST.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

A CURE FOR EVERY FORM OF

Pulmonary Complaint!

COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CROUP,
WHOOING COUGH, SPITTING OF BLOOD,
LIVER COMPLAINT, etc., etc.

Consumption,

Which carries off more victims than any other disease,
and which baffles the skill of the Physician to a greater extent than any other malady, often

YIELDS TO THIS REMEDY,

when all others prove ineffectual.

AS A MEDICINE,

Rapid in relief, soothing in effect, safe in its operation, it is

UNSURPASSED!

while as a preparation, free from noxious ingredients, poisons or minerals; uniting skill, science and medical knowledge, combining all that is valuable in the vegetable kingdom for this class of disease, it is

INCOMPARABLE!

and is entitled, merits and receives the enviable appella-
tion of the

INVALID'S FRIEND.

Sold by all druggists and by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,

mh4-1f

San Francisco.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE!

FORTY YEARS' EXPERIENCE

Has fully established the superiority of

Redding's Russia Salve

Over all other preparations

FOR THE CURE OF

Scalds,
Burns, Cuts,
Flesh Wounds, Boils,
Chilblains, Blisters, Bruises,
Felon, Piles, Erysipelas, Ulcers,
Salt Rheum, Injuries by Splinters, Warts,
Old Sores, Ring Worm, Frost-Bitten Parts,

AND ALL CUTANEOUS DISEASES AND ERUPTIONS
GENERALLY.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE

It is prompt in action, removes pain at once, and reduces the most angry-looking swellings and inflammations, as if by magic—thus affording relief and a complete cure.

FOR SALE EVERYWHERE.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

416 and 418 Front street,

mh4-1f

SAN FRANCISCO;

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL.

Montgomery street between Pine and California.

THOMAS MAGUIRE Proprietor.
GEORGE H. COES Stage Manager
B. P. ISAACS Musical Director

Owing to the detention of the steamer at Aspinwall, the Management has prevailed upon

BIRCH, BACKUS, and SHATTUCK, to delay their departure for the East until the 13th, and will appear in conjunction with the

GRAND REORGANIZATION OF THE

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Composed of the following talented artists:

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
P. B. Isaacs, George H. Coes,
A. J. Talbot, Mons. Charles,
C. F. Shattuck, P. Loomis,
Sig. Pinto, S. Wasburg,
J. H. O'Neill, J. B. Hows,
Frank Medina, H. Grob,

Dress Circle and Parquet, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 25
cents extra; Private Boxes, $5.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock,
precisely.

Saturday afternoon performances by the Minstrels, at
the Opera House.

CARPET CLEANING.

You can get your Carpets cleaned at the
STEAM-POWER CARPET Beating Machine for
Five Cents per Yard.

Orders left in our boxes, at the following places, will be promptly attended to:

Southeast corner Clay and Dupont streets.
Southeast corner Broadway and Dupont streets.
Northeast corner of Stockton and Jackson streets.
Southeast corner of Powell and Union streets.
Northwest corner of Taylor and Pacific streets.
Southwest corner of Bush and Stockton streets.
Northeast corner of Geary and Taylor streets.
Northwest corner of Kearny and Market streets.
Southeast corner of Howard and Third streets.
Northeast corner of Second and Folsom streets.

Or at the Postoffice, or at Carnes' City Letter Express, 621 Montgomery street, directed to

J. SPAULDING & CO., 113 Fremont st.

feb11-3m.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COM-PANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month
of MARCH, 1865:

MARCH 13th GOLDEN AGE.
MARCH 23d CONSTITUTION.
From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall
by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspin-
wall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC
STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,

Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern my25

METALLURGIC INSTITUTE,

FIRST STREET,

McKibbin's Railing Works (up stairs.)

CONDUCTED BY

G. F. DEETKEN,

MINING ENGINEER.

The only Thorough Metallurgic and Engineering
School on the Coast.

THEORETIC-PRACTICAL INSTRUCTION in Metallurgic
Roasting Operations, Amalgamation, Chlorination and Smelting of Gold and Silver Ores.

Also, on Mechanics, Mine Surveying, Topographic and Mechanical Drawing.

The attention of Superintendents of Mills and Mines is particularly directed to this excellent facility of acquiring a thorough knowledge of Metallurgic operations.

fe25-1f

HOMESTEAD FOR SALE!

ANY PERSON DESIROUS OF PURCHASing a valuable HOUSE AND LOT at a bargain, for CASH,
can hear of a chance, by applying immediately at the office of THE CALIFORNIAN. The property is within 10 minutes' walk of the corner of Clay and Montgomery streets, is in the southern part of the city, and in a neat private street and pleasant neighborhood. The House contains two Parlors (with sliding doors, gas chandeliers and marble mantel), a dining-room and kitchen on the first floor, and four bed-rooms on the second. Planked yard, flowering vines, outhouses, etc. Water in three different places on the premises and gas fixtures all through the house. It is built in a thorough and substantial manner, and is now under a monthly rent of $50. Size of Lot, 24 feet, by 80 feet in depth. Title, PERFECT. Price, $3,500.
Satisfactory reasons for selling will be given to a purchaser by applying as above.

fe18-1f

CATHOLIC GIFTS,

IN GREAT VARIETY!

Consisting of—

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,
STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,
MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES!

And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

For sale by

MICHAEL FLOOD,

Catholic Bookseller,

del17-1f

No. 428 Kearny street, San Francisco.

P. J. WHITE & CO.,

SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN—

BUTTER, LARD, HAMS, BACON, PORK,
SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,

And a general assortment of

GROCERIES,

Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Battery,

San Francisco.

Your trade is respectfully solicited.

del10-1f

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PIC-

TURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, ETC.

Especial attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDS

ENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

ja28-1f

THESE PLASTERS have the compact-
ness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove.
They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly hump, cured varicose veins and external neurisms.
For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm
or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak
back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases
they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.,
"Brandreth Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

San Francisco.

Sold by all Druggists.

del17-3m

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late east
INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition
from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says:
"Messrs. Steinway & Sons' endorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that
of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can
be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York.

my25

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2

SAN FRANCISCO.

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.

A. Roman & Co.,

TAKE PLEASURE in announcing the following
list of NEW BOOKS just received from the East:

Enoch Arden. 1 vol. small quarto, elegantly illustrated.
Blue and Gold edition.

Clever Stories of many Lands, by John G. Saxe. 1 vol.
4to, illustrated.

The Queens of Song. Being memoirs of the most celebrated female vocalists. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portraits. All lovers of the Opera will be delighted with this charming volume.

The Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, with a memoir.
2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, tinted paper.

Doran's Complete Works. 9 vols., cloth and half Turkey,
with the "Annals of the Stage."

Arctic Researches and Life Among the Esquimaux, by Charles F. Hall. 1 vol. 8vo, illustrated. Raikes next to that of Dr. Kane.

Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. 1 vol. 12mo.
The latest contribution to the great Theological Controversy in England.

John Gifford's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor. 1 vol. 12mo.
An absorbing story of American life.

Golden Leaves from the American Poets. 1 vol. 16mo.,
vellum and morocco. A tasteful selection from our
most popular Poets.

The Gentle Life. 1 vol. 16mo. An elegant series of Essays on the Formation of Character.

Following the Flag, by "Carleton." A fascinating juvenile.

Elina, by Charles Lamh. 1 vol. 12mo. Being the heretofore uncollected writings of "Elia."

Autumn Holidays in the Country, by the "Country Parson." 1 vol. 12mo.

The Queen of the County, by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids. 1 vol. 12mo.

A New Atmosphere, by Gail Hamilton. 1 vol. 12mo.

Looking Towards Sunset, by L. M. Child. 1 vol. 4to,

Love and Duty. 1 vol. 12mo,

Lost Love. 1 vol. 12mo,

Margaret Denzil's History. 1 vol. paper.

Bohemians of London. 1 vol. 12mo.

Autobiography of Gen. Scott. 2 vols. 12mo.

Woodcliff, by Harriet B. McKeever. 1 vol. 12mo.

Hymns of the Ages. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

Old Merchants of New York. Third Series. 1 vol. 12mo.

In addition to the above we have a large list of other
NEW BOOKS, together with a complete stock in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

All are cordially invited to call and examine.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

fe23-1m

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of

GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

S. W. H. WARD & SON,

NEW YORK,

387 Broadway.

323 Montgomery street,
San Francisco, Cal.

de31-3m

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened
for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro
Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf,
between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers
ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel
can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort,
cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of
families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil
of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance
of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor
hopes to merit the public patronage.

Terms easy.

fe18-1f

FRANK JOHNSON.

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!

CANTY & WAGNER,

(SUCCESSORS TO J. REIDAN.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS,

113 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Between Bush and Sutter, San Francisco.

N. B.—All CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.

Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to.

de3-2m

The Californian

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II, No. 16.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 18, 1865.

TERMS $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

An Unbiased Art Criticism—By Mark Twain.
Over the Mountains—A Trip to Virginia.
From Marysville—Correspondence of THE CALIFORNIAN.
Extracts from Paris Letters.
The Nightingale's Song.
A Strange Story.
The Case of Miss Harris.
Tennyson's Baronetcy.

ONLY A CLOD—Miss Braddon's New Novel, Chapter XIX. and XX.

EDITORIALS:

Representative Reckless Journalism.
A Question of Decency.
Maximilian's Maxims.

LOCAL AND INTERIOR ITEMS:

The News at Home and Abroad.

POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

Quits—By C. H. Webb.
Hawthorne, Two Sonnets—By C. W. Stoddard.
Hylas.
Enoch Arden abbreviated.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS:

A Condensation of the Telegraphic War News of the Week.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP:

Special Correspondence of THE CALIFORNIAN.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1865.

REPRESENTATIVE RECKLESS JOURNALISM.

A GOOD "GOAK."—A cotemporary calls THE CALIFORNIAN newspaper a "loyal" journal. This, we take it, is a good "goak." The editor of THE CALIFORNIAN is as bitter a Copperhead as ever went unhung. If our cotemporary meant by the word "loyal" to convey the idea that THE CALIFORNIAN is a Union paper, he is most wonderfully mistaken. The editor of THE CALIFORNIAN, like the editor of the Express, is loyal to the Southern Conthieveracy, loyal to the rebellion, and loyal to anything in opposition to our Government. Marysville Appeal.

It is rarely our custom to comment upon what cotemporaries say of us, especially when they speak to our discredit: but in the present instance we cannot refrain from republishing the above notice and referring to it briefly. A better illustration of the reckless journalism we have so often taken occasion to deprecate and denounce could not be desired. We do not know the editor of the Appeal, even by name; have never seen him to our knowledge, and certainly have never interchanged political views with him. Yet he, without the slightest warrant, takes occasion to denounce "THE EDITOR OF THE CALIFORNIAN" as "AS BITTER A COPPERHEAD AS EVER WENT UNHUNG!" This is scarcely courteous; we would characterize the assertion as untruthful by the only English word which befits it, were it not that we are opposed to bandying those words in print which men very seldom speak to each other, and never except to inflict a brand which is more disgraceful than a blow. Our friends in this city are well acquainted with our political sentiments, and we do not care to explain them to every stranger who chooses to arraign us. THE CALIFORNIAN in its course has always been consistently and unequivocally loyal. Supporting measures, however, it does not always think it necessary to support men, and it is not at all given to apotheosis. The election of Lincoln was advocated because it was plain that the return of McClellan would prove disastrous to the National Cause. We do not consider it necessary, however, to laud him as a grammarian or compliment him upon the style of his State papers. His best personal friends sometimes lament that he does not produce documents more calculated to win respect for him as the Head of the Nation, for the impression that rhetoric and republicanism are not necessarily at swords' points with each other, is universal. In this particular, while advocating his election we never urged his rail-splitting experience in youth as his most prominent qualification for the Presidency, though many of the journals which now oppose us were eloquent upon that theme. The present editor of THE CALIFORNIAN graduated in the editorial rooms of the New York Times, and was for some time an army correspondent of that paper; he was the first to denounce—in a letter to that journal, which even the Appeal will scarcely accuse of disloyalty—the inactivity and incompetence of Gen. McClellan—while most mouths were full of the folds of the anaconda—and he was among the first to urge vigorous measures and offensive movements for the suppression of the rebellion. He has never uttered or written a treasonable word in his life, and all his friends and associates know him to be utterly and thoroughly Union in feeling and expression; he can point with equal pride to the fact that he never has stood in the market place, vaunting his own loyalty while causelessly questioning that of his neighbor, and clamoring to be rewarded for the simple performance of his duty in giving all his efforts and energies to the preservation of the Nation's integrity.

A QUESTION OF DECENCY.

WE are really glad to see that action has been taken in the matter of the Anatomical Museum, lately opened in this city. Although these institutions have a regularly recognized existence at the East, our coast has not yet arrived at that pitch of depravity which demands public exhibitions at which decency revolts.

Our daily papers are usually regarded as the conservators of the public morals. In the present instance we are forced to say that they have been shamefully derelict. Had photographs of French actresses been on exhibition in shop windows, had songs been vended about the streets containing a single verse that permitted the possibility of a double entendre, had anything in short been cried or shown at which the most fastidious virtue could take alarm—which did not advertise—the result would have been patent. One great howl would have gone up, and a shut shop or an arrested boy would have been procured to afford a fruitful theme for the prolific pen, if there was any virtue in printers' ink.

It has never been our practice to impute unworthy motives to our neighbors, and at this time it were rather late to begin. But we cannot forbear asking how we are to construe the secret of their silence in the present instance. Of the multitude that have visited the "Museum" to which reference is made—and we are sorry to say that the number of its visitors has been materially increased since the arrest of the proprietors on the charge of an improper exhibition—we have yet to find the first one who has not expressed wonder that such an indecent show should be tolerated in the community. What object is to be gained by familiarizing the minds of the young with such subjects and figures as the contrivers of this "Museum" have seen fit to set forth in wax? A more ghastly burlesque than the whole affair presents, its villainous details hedged round and relieved by weak texts and stale proverbs such as: "Virtue is its own reward;" "To the pure all things are pure;" "Man, know thyself;" "Vice is a monster of such hideous mien," etc., can neither be imagined nor described. The idea that the exhibition is calculated to further anatomical knowledge is absurd and preposterous in the highest degree. In no medical college in the land can such an exhibition be found, and no student was ever expected or required to pass through such an infernal matriculation. Talk of the public good and the conservation of the morals of youth—it is nonsense! The only object of the proprietors is to fill their purses by pandering to the unclean curiosity and morbid tastes of the great multitude. And the sooner that they are ordered to pack up their traps and leave the city, under the penalty of being boiled in the melted wax of their own exhibition if they remain, the sooner will the city be freed from a pestiferous presence.

Why our staid dailies were persuaded to notice the exhibition under the various heads of "Amusements," "Dramatic and Musical," etc., we cannot imagine. It is true the concern has advertised liberally in all directions, but we are unwilling to believe that the comparatively paltry sum thus paid could buy our critics to lend their endorsement, or at least the sanction of silence, to something which their better tastes must necessarily condemn. If they have been guilty of yielding to pecuniary inducements in a matter of such public moment, we can only hope that they will be made share the punishment of the proprietors of the Museum, for whom at the present writing we can suggest nothing more severe than that they be shut up together in their own exhibition and condemned to a contemplation of their own creations for an indefinite period of time.

MAXIMILIAN'S MAXIMS.

THERE are very few of our cotemporaries that have not busied themselves with speculating as to Louis Napoleon's designs and Maximilian's intentions in Mexico. It has been amusing to see the theories offered on the rumor of some stupendous plot, to be dismissed when subsequent intelligence proved the rumor to be groundless. All this while we have refrained from comment, preferring to await the development of actual events before committing ourselves to any theory whatever; for to our thinking the mind of the most astute monarch in Europe, and his intentions as regards Mexico, are too profound and too well veiled to be fathomed by the pen of any paragraphist on this continent. It is very unsatisfactory to set out to measure the depth of a well with an innate conviction the while that our plummet cannot reach the bottom.

Adopting the idea, probably, that consistency is the best thing that can be done under the circumstances, the chances are that the French Emperor will shape his policy as circumstances may dictate, and we question whether it be exactly settled even in his own mind at the present moment what course he will pursue. Very much depends upon whether or not we succeed in the subjugation of the South, and until that problem is settled it is not probable that his hand will be very definitely revealed.

Maximilian, however, lets a little light in upon the policy he intends to pursue in the decree of religious toleration recently issued. Protecting the Catholic Apostolic Roman Church as the religion of the State, at the same time that he extends free and ample toleration to all religions disposed to civilization and good habits, he furnishes evidence that nothing within his power will be left undone to reconcile the people of Mexico to his rule. Mexico is pre-eminently a Catholic country—hence that religion is adopted as that of the State. But bids having been offered to foreign emigration, he proffers protection to all religions and announces his intention of letting men's consciences alone. This is wise; for a nation will bear dietary regulations with more complacency than they will religious restrictions. It seems Maximilian's intention to reconcile the people over whom he has an accidental dominion to his rule, and to offer to all immigrants a freedom somewhat similar to that which they enjoy in their own countries. If acting under the dictation of the French Emperor, as this step would indicate, it must be borne in mind that that monarch managed to reconcile the people of France to his coup d'etat—one of the most atrocious usurpations on record—and that an adherence to his counsels may enable Maximilian to reconcile the Mexicans to his assumed sway. In this event our interference in the matter may prove uncalled for when the time comes that we are able to offer it. The Monroe doctrine constrains us to interfere against foreign dictation on this continent against the popular will; but if the people consent there is little left for us to do.

PHILOLOGICAL VAGARIES.—We are sorry that the Marysville Appeal allows its admiration of state papers to interfere with that purity of English which is looked for in editorial columns. In a late issue it rolls "Kloptamania" like a sweet morsel under its tongue a dozen times, ignorant apparently that there is no such word in the language. Kleptomania, or Klopomania, but "Klopta"—never.

"ENOCH ARDEN" ABBREVIATED.

PHILIP RAY and Enoch Arden
Both were "spoons" on Annie Lee;
Phil did not fulfil her notions,
She preferred to mate with E.

Him she wedded, and she bore him
Pretty little children three;
But becoming short of rhino,
Enoch went away to sea;

Leaving Mrs. Arden owner
Of a well-stocked village shop,
Selling butter, soap and treacle,
Beeswax, whipcord, lollipop.

Ten long years she waited for him,
But he neither came nor wrote,
Wherefore, she concluded Enoch
Could no longer be afloat.

So, when Philip came to ask her
If she would be Mrs. Ray,
She, believing she was widowed,
Could not say her suitor "nay."

And a second time was married,
Gave up selling bread and cheese,
And in due time Philip nursed a Little Ray upon his knees.

But alas! the long-lost Enoch
Turned up unexpected-ly,
And was vastly disconcerted
By this act of bigamy.

Yet reflecting on the subject,
He determined to atone
For his lengthened absence from her
By just leaving well alone.

Taking to his bed, he dwindled
Down to something like a shade,
Settled with his good landlady,
Next the debt of nature paid.

Then, when both the Rays discovered
How poor Enoch's life had ended,
They came out in handsome style, and Gave his corpse a funeral splendid.

This is all I know about it;
If it's not sufficient, write
By next mail to Alfred Tenny-
Son, P. L., the Isle of Wight.

A STRANGE STORY.

OVERWORKED, and yielding to the solicitations of my wife and friends, I left the practice entirely in the hands of my partner, and accepted the invitation of my kind old friend Dr. Goodenough. The perfect rest, the lovely wild Welsh scenery, soon showed its effects, and day by day I recruited both strength and spirits; and ere long I was able to face, with a sense of exhilaration that I had long been a stranger to, the keen wind that then, in the early part of January, swept down into our quiet valley from the snowy heights beyond. Goodenough's quick appreciation of character, sturdy common sense combined with great tact and quickness, fitted him peculiarly for the care of cases complicated with any mental derangement. There were several under his care. As my own health improved in tone, I began to listen with interest to the particulars of the various cases, and felt gratified that my old friend should thus seek my opinion. He showed me his notes of one case which he had (as far as human eye could see) treated with perfect success. It was peculiar; the subject in his early youth had on one occasion, and one only, showed symptoms of insanity, the seeds of which lay dormant until after life. He must have been a man of great determination; for on his recent recovery he thus described his recollection of the occasion of the fit:

"One night, after a number of weeks of fearful sufferings, as I was lying in bed tossing, sleepless and despairing, a most horrible impulse seized upon me, an impulse impelling me to destroy one who, of all living beings, most deserved my love. I buried myself under the bedclothes, and struggled with the hellish impulse till the bed shook. It still gained strength. I sprang up, clung to the bedpost, and drove my teeth, in the agony of despair, into the hard wood. It was uncontrollable. I shut my eyes, bowed down my head for fear that I should see her, and rushed out of the house. Barefooted, with no covering save a night-shirt, I ran through the streets to the police office, and implored them to lock me up. Fortunately the officer on duty was a humane and sensible man. He gave me a watch-coat to wrap round me, kept me under his eye, and I suppose, sent to my friends, for my wife and sister came with clothing. The paroxysm had passed; and gasping, panting for breath in any form, I accompanied them home, steeped to the lips in despair."

This case, which was one of well-marked latent insanity (latent for nearly twenty years,) interested us much, and sincerely we trusted that it might not prove intermittent, of which latter type a very curious and well-marked case was under my friend's care.

"I know nothing of the history of the man," said Goodenough, "except that he came here many years ago, and voluntarily placed himself under the care of my predecessor. He occupies a small suite of rooms, makes a few acquaintances, and quite seems to shun the public sitting-room and billiard-room, where there are generally two or three convalescents to be found. Botany, on which subject he has written much and well, is his principal pursuit. But the most remarkable point is the persistency and regularity of his mental attacks. In the early part of each year (and you will have the opportunity, I imagine, of seeing this for yourself) he becomes careless of his person and dress, moody, and irritable—savagely passionate and violent—so much so, that towards the end of the month it has always been necessary to place him under restraint. Another curious phase in the case is, that as the cerebral excitement increases, his English is replaced by another language, that neither I nor any one here can understand. I judge from this he is not an Englishman; that his brain, losing the grasp over the acquired tongue, lapses to his native one. As he grows older the gradual recovery from each access of delirium takes longer and longer. In his lucid intervals, growing shorter every year, he has occasionally, at my earnest request, written what he can recollect of his state of mind during the accession of the attacks. This passage, with which he commences one of these papers, is remarkable, and shows in what way he expects death to supervene:

"It is a fearful thing for a man to be mad, and to be conscious that he is so. I am convinced that a thought of an intensely exciting nature passing through a brain in this state, or through one very easily excited naturally, can kill as quickly as a shock of electricity from a thunder-cloud, and that the death-bearing messengers in both cases are nearly allied. I have, while recovering from a violent attack of mania, not once, but several times, been struck down as utterly senseless by a thought as I could have been by a blow." * * *

"I have no doubt but some of those sudden deaths, for which no cause can be assigned or seen, are the results of this silent thunder, which bursts from the imagination when in a state of excitement or disease."

I took an early opportunity of calling on this gentleman, in company with Dr. Goodenough. It was in the middle of January, and the usual premonitory symptoms had begun to show themselves. His appearance was striking; but the attention was riveted on his eye, so cold, so clear, and pitiless, flickering now and again with a febrile brightness. Our visit was a very short one; but it was not until away from his presence that I could recall his massive chin, his firm thin lips hardly according with his rather narrow forehead and strangely projecting eyebrows. I learnt, with no feeling of pleasure, the next day, that he was anxious to see me. I accompanied Goodenough in his usual visit.

"Doctor," said he, "we can hear enough of our future state; we know, perhaps, too much of our present; but where can we learn our past? Look you! the soul never dies: neither is it born, at least not as our philosophy would teach us. Have I only existed forty or fifty years? I tell you cycles have passed since my thinking powers first came into play. You too—you have recognized people, ay, and places too, that you never before saw in this life. And you, sir," turning to me and raising his voice almost fiercely, "in what wild planet or outer world have we met, and then, too, in no friendly mood?"

And truly there flashed back on my memory that night in the wild forest, when with my spirits high overcome in the struggle with unknown horror, staggering into the clear moonlight, my knees trembling under me, dismayed but unsubdued, I was but able to cry, "I am not overcome; my spirit is not afraid," without which self-assertion my inner self felt it must have yielded to this unknown, unseen power. I know not what answer I returned to the wild adjuration of the madman.

After a moment's pause he said, quietly, "Do you know doctor, I believe it quite possible for a man to be in two places at once. Now, for instance, in my own occasional illness, I, as regards my body, remain here (though I should be sorry to vouch for that myself,) while I, as regards my thinking and intellectual powers, have most certainly been elsewhere. For as I slowly recover with the coming springtime, creeping with the flowers into a fuller life, I am imbued with the idea of long, cold, weary, watching, of some horrid, hate-inspiring thing; and as Dante makes those spirits, who on earth have loved both wildly and unwell, be driven together round and round the limbo they are in, by a fierce cold whirlwind—now torn away from, now driven back to, their unseen, never-shifting starting-point—so I sometimes think I have been surging round and round, with a purposeless hate, some still more hateful spot."

Toward the end of the month, the 26th, (how suddenly I recalled the date,) Goodenough and I were quietly talking after dinner, when an assistant called him out of the room. A few minutes after, the same man returned: "The doctor's compliments, sir, and would you step up to Mr. Engstrom's room?"

I entered his room quietly. Three men, assisted by the doctor, were holding down the unhappy man on the bed; and though they did not understand his wild imprecations, in a harsh, uncouth tongue, it was evident to any, from his savage gestures and hoarse, deep voice, that he was in fierce altercation with some imagined foe. I caught a word in Swedish, and soon followed the sense of all he said. Who was "Hilda?"—she who seemed fastened to his heartstrings by ties of wildest love and fiercest hate. What were the unheard questions that called forth such awful answers? On whose head were those fearful imprecations called down? Verily a full tide of sombre recollections flowed over my memory; and, urged by what instinct I knew not, I hurried, as in a dream, to the billiard-room, and, snatching an ornamented cue from the rack, I returned. I placed myself at the foot of the man's bed. "Loose him and let him go," I am told I said; and in sheer astonishment the men relaxed their hold to look at me. He sprang up to a sitting position, his wild eyes fixed on mine, and a deep, long-drawn stertorous breathing gave as it were a voice to his fierce glare. "Devil! would you again torment me before my time? but I have you now!" And with a frantic shout he sprang toward me. I shrank back, and, still keeping a firm eye fixed on his, held up as in an attitude of defence the butt of the cue. He staggered as does a man who receives a mortal blow. "Let be," I said to the men, who would again have seized him; and he, cowering back, shrinking from me, fell prone and gasping on the bed. Then feebly rolling himself in the clothes, amid faint cries for pity and deep-drawn sobs, half-choked by the dread death-rattle in his throat, this wicked, wilful soul fled into the presence of its Maker.

Silently we left the room, I leaning on Goodenough's arm. He poured out a glass of wine that I gladly swallowed.

"Now tell me," said he, "who is this man, and how did you learn his history? How did you acquire such a strange power over him, the too sudden use of which I cannot but regret? And lastly, what induced you to come into the room in the strange way you did?" (for he had not seen me when I first entered.)

"As to his history I know nothing, but am certain of it all. I feel I am not mistaken; and when I have told it to you, you will understand the rest."

"Good," said he, and left me. And for a long, long time I sat there dreaming of the past, as in a truce, with my eyes open.

And this, as follows, is what I told him the next day.

As a young man, I was extremely fond of travelling: indeed I am so now, finding that my moral as well as physical health improve by it; the bold wild scenery I always frequent induces a healthier and more manly tone of thought. I can then take a more general view of things, and less dimmed by the obtrusion of self. On one occasion I had even obtained my congé, though as yet undecided where to go—with what new scenery I should brush off the cobwebs of dull routine. It was Saturday, and the Illustrated was put into my hands. In it was an account and some sketches of the opening of a railway from Gottenburg to Stockholm. This decided me, and I sailed by the next boat for Gottenburg. Of the kindness and hospitality of every one I became acquainted with in Sweden you have already heard me speak, and no doubt you remember hearing me mention an English family; but I never told you how indelibly they were impressed on my memory by alter events. Our meeting, too, was strange. One night, going late to the opera—in truth it was not much, and I went only to see the ballet, in which two English figurantes appeared—I was thrust into a box in which I found an elderly gentleman nodding in one corner, and two pretty, fresh-looking girls occupying the front. I seated myself in the unoccupied corner, and followed as I was able, the play. I don't remember much of it; but I soon found the place unbearably hot; and seeing the ladies vigorously fanning themselves, I ventured to ask, in my best French, (for I was afraid to attempt Swedish,) if they would like the door opened. "You answer him, Lucy," said one; "you speak Swedish better than I can." That was quite sufficient introduction for me then; and when the curtain fell we were acquaintances of long standing; and the father being awake, I was introduced to him. I assisted at the cloaking, etc., preparatory to getting into the sleigh, and learnt that they lived within a few miles of Stockholm, where they had been staying for a few days; and I accepted an invitation to spend a couple of days, soon, at their house. They started, and I walked off to my hotel. In the supper room I again met the father, and found he was staying in the same house with me. We supped together, and the day for my visit was fixed.

I drove out. If you have ever driven in a sleigh you can understand how exhilarating was the clear bright air and tinkling sleigh-bells, as we trotted along over the crisp snow, by the soft white lakes and downy fir-trees, with their ostrich plumes stretching out over you. If you have not seen the like, I cannot attempt to describe it. I had a hearty welcome; the veriest misanthrope would have warmed to it. It was late when I arrived, and we soon sat down to dinner. I found the ladies had never learned to skate, but were burning to emulate their Swedish sisters. The next morning was devoted to skating lessons, for I had been in Canada, and had of course learnt there.

In the evening we sat round the wood fire, and mamma told a ghost story, and I told some more, until at last it required more courage than the young ladies could muster to go into the dark landing and light the bedroom candles, as they were accustomed to do, after saying good night.

The next day was windy, and we spent the morning in the old billiard-room, a low, queer-shaped, oddly-lighted room. We walked out after lunch, and on returning I noticed a date cut on the stone lintel of the front door—1753 I think, three years more than a century since the house was built. When I was alone with the father, after dinner, I asked about it. When he took the house it had been uninhabited for many years; and, though in a good situation in every way, both it and the grounds round it had a bad name. There was nothing definite; some old ghost story; and he got it cheap. There was some trouble about servants, certainly: they would not sleep in the house; but that was got over by their all sleeping on a small farm he had bought near.

Among other stories told that evening I repeated one of Edgar Poe's—The Startling Effects of Mesmerism on a Dying Man. None of them had ever heard it before, and even the father seemed interested. There was a silence of many seconds when I concluded, and then a rush of conversation on kindred topics.

"Do you know, my dears, that we all are living in a haunted house?—or, rather, the house itself is not haunted, though the grounds are."

A little murmur of surprise, and each sat closer to the other.

"I dare say, my dears, you have heard your father say how very cheaply we have bought the property. No! Well, at any rate it is on that account. He learnt that many years ago—you remember the date over the door—an old gentleman came and settled here with two sons. They seem to have lived a quiet, solitary life. The old man died. The eldest son, then of an age to shift for himself, realized as much money as he could, and disappeared. The old people about here will still talk of his wild, daring and mad frolics. The other seems to have carefully tended the property, and married happily enough. I suspect the orangerie and the little pier into the lake are of his building; and perhaps we owe the long shady avenue up to the house to his or his wife's taste; and no doubt the old summer-house overlooking the lake was as favorite a seat of hers as it is with us. One wild evening the brother returned, and was heartily welcomed home. Their life would hardly seem to have been as quiet and happy as before; and yet his younger brother's sweet, domestic little wife would appear unwittingly to have gained too much of his admiration. One evening, apparently, the two men were in the billiard-room alone, when high words, soon followed by the deep, short accents of hate, arose; and then a few quick blows, and the sullen noise of fierce struggle. I can imagine the wife with clasped hands standing trembling at the foot of the winding stone stairs. The door above opened, and her husband, with pallid face, staggered down almost into her arms. "Hide, Hilda, hide! or it will be worse for you than me." Scared more by the wild terror in his face and eye than by his words, she fled to her room, hearing the front door blown violently to by the wind. But her womanly, wifely instinct roused her; and while preparing hurriedly to follow her husband, she heard a heavy measured tread above her. Listening, she heard her brother-in-law go to his room, come down, and go out. Follow him she must, and did. Guided by the lantern he carried, with whose aid the footsteps in the snow were easily traced, she followed him round to the plantation behind the orangerie. Here, with an oath, the light was dashed to the ground. Faint, and nipped to the marrow by the cruel cold, she sprang forward, until the report of a pistol rang through the night air, and with a wild, loving cry she fell to the earth, while the birds from the heronry, close by, scared from their nests, wheeled round and round, uttering hoarse querulous cries. She came to herself again when all was silent, and struggled home, with a sensation as of a hand of ice on her heart. Not a soul was in the house. But at length her brother-in-law entered, flushed with labor and stained with earth. One glance assured him that she knew or divined all. And with what a cruel, hungry eye he must have looked at the only witness! Report says that she was locked into the furthest room on the second floor, and that there she died, faint whispers add, of starvation. It is said by the old people here that the younger brother was never seen after the evening of the 26th of January, and that you know is a day on which they say the light is always seen behind the orangerie.

The father here chimed in, and declared that a short time after his arrival he was being driven home very late at night over the lake. As they came near the little bay, above which the house stands, they saw a bright light among the trees. The driver refused positively to go on, and then turning towards land made a long detour through the woods, reaching the house with the greatest reluctance, and, refusing all offer of "schnapps," or more substantial refreshment, drove off as quickly as he could. It was so odd, that he entered it in his farm diary. Of course he had to fetch the book. We found it happened on the 26th of January. And while doing so we all remembered that we had again arrived at the anniversary of that day. I think we each saw that the others remembered, too; but I, perhaps hardly believing so implicitly the tale we had just heard, was the first to mention it. As it was only ten minutes to twelve then, I proposed to wait till midnight, and meanwhile lit the bedroom candles that had been brought in early from the hall. Twelve o'clock, and no light, for mamma and I looked out. Papa said he was too comfortable to move for anything but bed. Five minutes, ten minutes, a quarter, half-past, but no light; so we went to bed. I heard one door locked and bolted hurriedly as its occupants went in. I went to bed and slept soundly, though mine was the room at the end of the second floor.

It could not have been long before I was aroused by a tapping at the door, and I recognized my hostess's voice. "Look out of the window," she said, "towards the orangerie; the light is there as we have always heard it described. I thought you would not believe us unless you saw it for yourself," she added, half apologetically. I looked, and saw in the direction she mentioned a clear, round light, seemingly as bright and vivid as a powerful reading-lamp. It appeared to be only a foot or two above the ground, and, always remaining near the same spot, rose and sank, gently swaying about, quite unaffected by the brisk breeze still blowing.

I dressed hurriedly, with a strong sense of excited curiosity, and yet quite on the qui vive for a practical joke or other imposition. Leaving my room, I announced to Mrs. Clayton my intention of going up to the light. She did her utmost to dissuade me; but I wrapped up well and sallied out, with only a stout walking-stick in my hand. The wind was blowing in fitful gusts, and the trees, all dark and sombre, were stripped of their snowy plumes. Across the sky flitted wild dishevelled clouds, from behind which the moon uncertainly shone out. Passing the angle of the house, I saw the clear, full, powerful light in its old place, a long way ahead. Slowly crossing the open ground behind the orangerie, I endeavored to concentrate my mind on the effort it had to make (for the wild night had swept away all idea of practical joking) but the story I had just heard came vividly upon my mind. I believed it. I imagined how he, how she had crossed this open plot once before, and as I did so I felt that sense of a presence near me that made my temples throb. I shall ever believe that I saw the shadowy outline of a crouching female form near me, passing with abrupt and unequal steps towards the plantation. Suddenly stretching forth its arms it sank forward, disappearing as does a snow-wreath when blown away; and the light ahead surged upwards, red and angry. You know my theory on so-called supernatural appearances. Recalling them to my mind, buckling on as it were a mental armor, I approached and entered the dark belt of trees, all my attention being given to the light, which now seemed to rise higher than ever, diffusing itself as it did so into a luminous vapor that seemed drifting slowly toward me. I still advanced, though as it neared me a searching chill reached the very marrow of my bones, while my temples throbbed feverishly. The dim vapor surging round and round, still spreading more and more, seemed to assume the misty outline of a human form; while from the thicker mist at its summit, I thought, glared down on me two eyes—two eyes so cruel and malevolent, so full of hate and deadly purpose, that my very reason told me that here was a living agency—most cruel and murderous, certainly, powerful no doubt—against which as strenuous a resistance was necessary as though it were in flesh and blood. One faltering retrograde step would be my last. To become a living resistance, to oppose this deadly hate, was my only course. Hardly had these thoughts clearly formed themselves in my brain when the faint outline of the figure before me lost its clearness, and the misty cloud surged round, drifting yet nearer down upon me. It surrounded me; I was enveloped in its hazy folds; and the cruel eyes appeared at times close to mine, and then again far off. A clearer patch, where some young trees were growing further on in the wood, appeared to me now like a haven of safety, as the moonlight fitfully streamed down upon it. Towards it I turned. As though my thoughts of escape were divined, the form again assumed its distinctness, and barred my passage. With my knees trembling, and pulse leaping wildly, I stepped out in its direction. As I approached the dim form, I experienced a soft but firm opposition to my progress. Astounded by this new proof of living power, my knees knocked together, and involuntarily I stretched forth my hands. They seemed taken in a cold, firm grasp, and the stick was slowly wrenched from my hand. With all my physical strength failing I still pressed on, conscious of being as yet master of my own will. And then those cruel eyes, sinking down to a level with mine, floated close up to me, and I felt a soft, cold touch upon my throat that momentarily seemed to tighten. With one wild effort I cried, "This is not fear; the body quivers, but my mind is firm!" The grasp lightened on my throat, and the air became clear about me. And with my knees knocking together, I staggered forward into the clear moonlight, and sank for a time exhausted on the snow.

I do not think I can have lain there long before I recovered and went towards the house. The mental struggle over, the breezy night seemed fresh and pleasant to my fevered head; and when I met my anxious host and his wife I was able to tell them, with a tolerable assumption of calmness, that I had certainly seen something strange, but nothing that need alarm them; and, evading their curious questions, I returned soon to my room. I found the next morning that such a visible corroboration of their mother's story as the light gave, and which most of them had seen, had rather alarmed the younger, and very much astonished the elder part of the family. My account of it, therefore, was looked for with a great deal of interest. It must have been an unsatisfactory one, for, divested of my own sensations—and so I treated it as far as possible—there was little or nothing to tell; indeed, the crouching phantom of the woman seemed to them the most terrible part of the affair.

In clear daylight I visited the group again, following my nearly obliterated steps in the snow. I found that the clear patch of moonlight in the middle of the fir trees that I had so anxiously struggled towards, was but a little space, on which grew a few young birch trees. Mr. Clayton mentioned that wherever there was a clear space in the pine forest birch trees sprang up, and in a birch wood pine trees always shot up. The bare arms of the young trees had allowed the blessed moonlight to stream down, and form, as it had done for me, such a haven of rest. I remembered that it must have been on the hither side of this space that I first saw the light, and there, too, was a large space of clear snow. Placing myself on it, I experienced a slight tremor of the sensations I had experienced on the past night. You have heard me say perhaps that I believe no mortal will, however powerful and exorable, can exert itself at a distance without some tangible material object that may serve it (I hardly know how to explain my idea) as a starting-point, as a fulcrum for its lever. I scrutinized everything round me closely, but could find no sign, though my own sensations told me I was not mistaken. I explained more fully to Mr. C. my ideas on the subject, and asked leave to lay bare, and, if I thought necessary, to dig the ground I was standing on. He had no objection whatever. The farm-servant who brought down the tools in the afternoon hardly seemed to like the job; but I set the example, and he soon followed it. After some pretty severe labor, we got through the frozen crust into the soft earth, and then the man got out of the hole, and declared he could not—he didn't know why—work any longer; and as I stepped down into his place, and felt a chill sensation of fear creep over me, I did not wonder. A few hearty blows at the soil dispelled the feeling, and I presently turned up a scrap of leather that had evidently formed part of a shoe or boot. My host, who I imagine had looked on in astonishment at my proceedings, and rather permitted than joined in them, now himself became interested. Other and stranger things were soon brought to light, and before long we were all three working hard in the rapidly-increasing hole. In less than an hour we exposed the remains of a perfect human skeleton; and on clearing away the stringy fibres of roots that had interlaced themselves over it, we found a bullet still jammed over one of the little projections of the backbone. As we lifted the skeleton out piecemeal, buttons and buckles were found under it, proving too clearly its hurried burial. And alongside it, still close by its bony arm, was the broken butt of a cue, of a hard, heavy wood, in which the lozenge-shaped pieces of mother-of-pearl, with which it was ornamented, still kept their places.

You can understand now, my friend, the train of thought that led me to enter, as I did, that man's room last night.

I proposed to Mr. Clayton to report the finding of the skeleton, bearing such marks as it did of a violent death, to the police authorities; but the expense and trouble this might have entailed no doubt prevented its being done. At any rate, the remains were reinterred in the same spot, and their position was simply marked by a wooden cross. I left the country very soon after, but kept up for some time a correspondence with the family; and I distinctly remember being told on two or three different occasions of the reappearance of the mysterious light, and always about the same date. And indeed so convinced am I of the connection between your late patient and it, that though I have heard nothing for years of or from the Claytons, I will write to their house, on the chance of some of the family being still there; and we may, perchance, thus hear something that bears upon the subject. * * *

A good question for a debating society—Which is the most delightful operation—to kiss a fair woman on a dark night, or a dark woman on a fair night?

(For the Californian.)

HAWTHORNE.—TWO SONNETS.

THIS was the pen to glide in silence on Unheralded at first by the dull crowd:
His was the sweet, pure song that, never loud
Splurging and splashing noisily upon
Our sudden sense of worth, did yet anon
Prick through its fabric, seemingly endowed
With rarest excellence; and then was bowed Without its glitter—for the mask was gone.
But writing with that pure and ready flow
Of chosen words, with noblest aim and end;
So deep and noiseless, its true wealth to know
We need to fathom all its depth and send
The mind exalted through it while we throw
The world aside and with our soul attend.

FAIR is a broad and ever-growing tide
Of healthful waters, as a stream of thought
Pulsing with life and vigor is not caught
At the mere trifle, throwing out its wide
And far-embracing reaches, that beside Throbbling together in a song, have sought
To hem them with a margin, that is wrought
So beautiful with heights, where they abide:
The waters will not tarry till the hills
May stay them in their wanderings; above,
The heaven is full of brightness; so he fills
Our land with fame as broad, while we may prove
On this sea, where a blessing each distills,
He floateth, shrined in the union's love.

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 18th, 1865.

OVER THE MOUNTAINS.

A TRIP TO VIRGINIA—THE PAINS AND PLEASURES OF THE ROUTE—INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL.

VIRGINIA CITY, March 7th, 1865.

MY DEAR INIGO.—The last time I had the pleasure of seeing you, I observed to you that I was going to Washoe, and you no doubt, "in your mind's eye," seeing the state of the roads, affectionately remarked, you "hoped I might get there." Well, I did "get there," a week ago, and take an early opportunity of letting you hear from me. I know you are interested in Washoe. So am I; both of us have feet, "a few," on which we are often called upon to "stand and deliver" in the way of assessments, but we have never seen a dividend. Still, we were hopeful, we held on and waited—like a friend of ours in San Francisco we said, "the longest pole knocks the persimmons." Well, my dear INIGO, I have no hesitation in saying, and I say it boldly, it will require a very long pole to knock any persimmons for you and I. Don't suppose by this that I have been examining the mines; there is no necessity for that, everybody here is brim full of information, and not only willing but desirous to impart it—quite ready to tell one all they know and a great deal they don't know. Another thing, I don't believe in going so far underground. Whenever I think about death, I feel disgusted at the idea of being plumped into a hole, and covered up; I think it is a horrid way of disposing of one's "cold corpus," therefore I don't mean to go under, until I am obliged to. It is, moreover, so easy a thing for these "honest miners" to fool people. I am told here that a certain sea-going friend of ours was so fooled in the Gould & Curry while visiting the mine, that he would have bought all he could get hold of, if he had not been prevented by one of his friends here, who threatened to put him in a lunatic asylum. Afterwards, you know, he was only too anxious to sell, and tried to make us in San Francisco believe that he himself had "found 'em all out." Now I don't consider myself half so smart as he is; therefore only think how they might fool me!

Taking these things into consideration I shall not invest any more of my capital in "feet."

This is a wretched, God-forsaken looking place; all the gold in Christendom would not tempt me to reside here permanently. The streets are divided into small rivers, running streams of mud all the day through; at night it freezes and the population roll about, being unable to walk on the ice. When all the snow has departed, they tell me they are choked by the dust. Three days ago we had a terrific wind-storm: stage-coaches, and mud-wagons, chimneys, iron roofs, dry-goods boxes, overcoats and crinoline upset in all manner of ways. Montgomery street on a windy day was not a circumstance to it, as regarded the display of understandings; besides you had a fine chance of clapping to your bosom, without any previous introduction, the first pretty woman you met, your excuse being that you did it merely to keep her on her feet. On Sunday a "blow" was anticipated, and I am told that there were five hundred men waiting at the doors of one of the churches in anxious expectation of an opportunity for thus making themselves useful.

We have had some "caving" here, and the Empire, Imperial, and some other mines have suffered. As the city is tunnelled throughout, I expect it will all "cave" some day before long. I am living over "El Dorado," they tell me, but I don't expect to find much of a Dorado, if I should go under.

Two nights ago the Ophir "bust his biler," and the explosion shook the city. It was lucky our Occidental friend was not here; if he had been, and had made tracks in the dress, or rather undress in which he escaped from the earthquake, he would have found the snow rather severe. I assure you "costume is obligatory" here, and plenty of it!

I reached Washoe by means of the Dutch Flat route, which, by the by, is now called the "German Level," (make a note of that;) and went through a considerable "course of sprouts" on my way—in fact, travelling on any of these mountain roads just now must be something like what Brigham Young calls going to the infernal regions "cross lots." Still, I don't regret coming; I had a kind of fancy that sleighing over the Sierra Nevada would be sensational, and it was, "you bet." I "seared" considerably; however, it was worth the trouble, fright and everything else.

Up to Sacramento I did very well—getting a good state-room but no sleep before twelve o'clock, owing to about seventeen babies that were in the saloon, who danced, shouted, yelled and squalled as long as they were able, close by the doors of the staterooms. An American baby is a great institution, and can make more noise than those of any other country.

After leaving the steamer there were a few miles of railroad, and then mud-wagons; fortunately in ours there were only six passengers—our own party of three, and three gentlemen who smoked short pipes (which had seen a great deal of service, if one might judge from appearances,) and growled at the stage driver, swearing, every time they got an extra shake, they would sue the company, and that they knew he (the driver) was doing his best to upset the wagon. Two of these gentlemen were evidently old acquaintances who had not seen each other for some time, and each began to make enquiries about their "Mutual Friends." Said No. 1, "How is Simpson; is he at Smoketown, yet?"

No. 2.—"Simpson? oh, you mean the parson. Well, he happened a little misfortune; he always had a fancy you know for horse-stealing, and by an' by he got so keener, that he took all he could lay his hands on, and the folks they got tired on it, at last, and one day they hanged him."

No. 1.—"Poor Simpson, he used to preach some mighty good sermons."

No. 2.—"Yes, he did, but, you see, hosses is hosses, and they couldn't stand it no longer."

No. 1.—"And how's Jakey? he got religion and was sort o' pious, I remember."

No. 2.—"Well, he hain't there any more; a little accident happened to him. There was a young fellow at Smoketown had a dorg: it won't much of a dorg, and wor mighty crabbed at that; but he thought there worn't another dorg like it, and one day it took a notion to bite Jakey, so he ups with his pistol, and that dorg didn't bite any more—you bet; well, when the young fellow found his dorg wor gone where the good dorgs go, he wor almighty vexed about it, and though Jakey denied that 'twor him killed it, (you see he wor pious and didn't want a row,) 'toter one didn't believe him, and they fit, and Jakey finished him up. I don't think he meant to do it, and his knife was a mighty small 'un, but it ripped him up; so Jake had to make tracks, and I hain't heard on him since."

With such conversation did they beguile the tediousness of the journey, which at this portion of the road was not very interesting, as we were chiefly occupied in bobbing into mud holes, and scrambling out of them as well as we could, being on the point of upsetting several times, but managing to escape. We were bumped about considerably, but as the top of the wagon was canvas, our heads did not suffer.

We changed horses every ten miles, and had some very good teams; inferior ones would never have been able to get through. I am told the roads were worse than they have been at any time since the stages have been running. We made about three miles an hour.

The houses on the road where we stopped for meals are (with the exception of the ones at Dutch Flat and "Hunters," twenty-eight miles from Virginia City,) wretched in the extreme; one does not expect gilded mirrors and Brussels carpets, but they might manage to be a little more cleanly, as there seems to be no lack of soap in that region, and I am sure water is plentiful enough. The table-cloths looked like the sheets on the Vanderbilt line of steamers, which they used to tell us were washed once in six months; the knives and forks were not scrubbed—for fear it should wear them out I presume—and the glasses were never washed lest they should be broken; and, with all this, these people charge the prices of a first-class hotel—verily, they too ought to have a gold medal!

As we neared Dutch Flat the scenery began to improve, so that if one felt safe enough to enjoy it the trip would be very pleasant; but having to hold on all the way, and jump from one side of the wagon to the other so as not to be upset, rather distracts one's attention from the scenery—not that the upsetting of a wagon is to be dreaded so much, if it were on a level road, but when it involves rolling down the side of a mountain, where sometimes the wagon turns three or four somersets before it finally settles, it is rather trying to the nerves; however, we reached Dutch Flat all safe.

There we stayed an hour and got some dinner—sneak as it was. We expected to take sleighs there, but the snow having partially melted, were told we would have to proceed four miles farther in our mud wagon; one party, however, consisting of two gentlemen and the wife, (baby, of course,) and mother of one of them, started in a sleigh a few minutes before ourselves. On reaching the station, four miles from Dutch Flat, (which, by the by, is no station at all, but a level place on the side of a hill, covered with snow,) we found our sleigh. It was filled with snow, and had to be cleaned out before we could get into it; this was seven o'clock in the evening. We found here the passengers who had left before us in the other sleigh, and who were waiting for us. All the gentlemen "turned to" to clear out the sleigh. You would have been amused if you could have seen a friend of yours working away with a very dilapidated broom, clearing out the snow. It was very romantic, I assure you; we were a regular set of "Babes in the Wood."

One sleigh just held, comfortably, the passengers of our party, and away we started again, along with the people in the other sleigh, who had not changed conveyances and were consequently more comfortable, having a nice dry sleigh. Two miles farther on we stopped to change horses at a place where there was only a stable, and to our horror we were told that we must all be put into one sleigh. We were already quite full, as under the seats, (which ran round the sleigh and were uncomfortable, having no backs to them only a ledge about a quarter of a yard high,) there were packed sundry sacks of barley, so that we only had a small space in the middle for our feet; and you may imagine that five more passengers were no desirable acquisition. But there was no help for it; no place to stay in, and the snow falling fast and freezing on our clothes as it fell—for there was no covering to the sleigh—so after many times consigning the agent at Dutch Flat to a very warm place for swindling us in such an abominable manner, and swearing at the drivers—who, poor fellows, could not help it, and were so kind and careful all through the route that too much cannot be said in their praise—we allowed ourselves to be packed like sardines in a box, and began to ascend the mountain.

We were uncertain about the road, and therefore went very slowly. The snow was beating in our faces, yet we were obliged to discard veils, as they got wet and we found them freezing to the ends of our noses. There was very little moon, and the stars were almost obscured by the snow-storm, and in the drifts the poor horses sometimes could not keep their feet. Altogether, we had what a young friend of ours would call "a high old time."

The unfortunate baby, after vainly insisting upon being put down and allowed to walk, (for it could talk a little,) screamed until it had not breath to scream any longer, when it was obliged to subside for a while. We were packed so closely that we could not move at all, and, when the sleigh swayed about from side to side, were perfectly helpless, besides suffering from the cramp in our knees; if we had upset we would have been powerless to make an effort to save ourselves. I have no hesitation in saying that a bottle of "cold tea" which we happened to have with us was very useful and steadied my nerves amazingly.

At length we came to another stopping-place—ten o'clock; the stage from Virginia City which should have been there hours before had not been heard of, and it was feared there had been some accident. The party with the baby were already tired out, and would have remained, but there was scarlet fever in the house, so they decided upon moving on.

We waited an hour for the down-stage, which did not arrive, and at eleven o'clock we started with two drivers and a lantern on our weary way.

After battling with the snow for another hour or two, we came to a dead halt on the edge of a ravine, and one driver started in advance to explore the road, while the other remained with the horses. After some time the explorer returned and said the snow had drifted so much that it was impossible to go on, unless the gentlemen would get out and walk. My two companions and three others at once tumbled out, but there seemed to be an objection amongst the remaining ones.

"I paid to ride," said one, "and I don't mean to walk."

Said the driver: "Do you want to be upset and killed?" "Don't care if I am," was the rejoinder, "then I'll sue the company."

"So will I," said another, "leastways, my wife shall, if I get killed, and in that way I think she'll make more out of me than she does now, because the company can afford to pay pretty well."

"What's the name of this place, anyhow?" said the first grumbler.

"Yuba," said the driver.

"Yuba d-n!" shouted the passenger.

"No, sir," was the reply; "this is not Yuba Dam—only Yuba."

This "goak," as A. Ward would say, restored good humor, and all the gentlemen were soon on their feet. Then you may believe there was some ground and lofty tumbling in the snow, I supposing that the men would all either slide down the ravine or get lost in the drifts, and we should have to stop and search for their bodies. We women were put at the bottom of the sleigh, so that there might be less danger of its tipping over. None of us seemed to wish particularly to see the "other side of Jordan," inclining, on the contrary, to side with the poet who sang,

"I would not die in winter."

Well, Yuba was passed with a good many "dams," and once more we were packed up; the snow was all the time falling heavily, and there was to be no more stopping except to change horses until we had crossed the summit.

The road was now a little better, and our drivers beginning to get lively, commenced to sing the inevitable "John Brown." They could not get up much of a chorus, however, though we did the best we could under the circumstances. Then we had some more bad road, the poor little baby wailing and its mother quite worn-out, fast asleep, her face almost covered with snow. I did not suffer from the cold to speak of, in consequence, I think, of taking some more "cold tea;" it helped me amazingly.

At last we reached the summit—five o'clock in the morning, just daylight; it was magnificent!

"Rock upon rock incumbent hang,
And torrents down the gullies flung—"

the immense boulders far above our heads, apparently touching the clouds, with the snow lying on their peaks, and the pine trees surrounding looked like giant castles. It seemed like awaking in another world, and one almost expected to see a different race of beings from that which inhabits ours. In the distance, on a large boulder near the road, I saw an inscription. Instantly Scott's lines in the Bridal of Triermain popped into my head:

"It is given thee to gaze
On the pile of ancient days;
Never mortal builder's hand
This enduring fabric planned;
Sign and sigil, word of power,
From the earth-raised keep and tower;
View it o'er and pace it round,
Rampart, turret, battled mound—
Dare no more—"

and I expected I was about to make some grand discovery, but fancy my feelings when we were near enough to read, and I found it was nothing but a clothier's sign. I decided at once that I wouldn't buy mine at that shop, and so encourage such sacrilege.

All my romance evaporated after that, and soon we began to descend. The snow was drifted so much that one of our drivers started off in search of an ox-team to break a road for us; having succeeded in finding one we floundered through the snow until we reached Donner Lake, where they gave us the worst breakfast I ever had in my life—Manzanillo, perhaps, excepted. Should misfortune, my dear Inigo, ever take you to Donner Lake, don't drink any of the coffee they make there.

We left the party with the baby here—they were so used up that they could not go on—and were thenceforth less crowded and consequently more comfortable, but the snow was so deep that it took three hours to do the first ten miles, and the poor horses kept falling in the drifts. The second ten miles we did in one hour and fifty minutes and the third in an hour; then we reached our next stopping place. "Hunter's," a nice comfortable house, beautifully clean, and brightened by one of the kindest of landladies. I was quite enchanted with her: there, for the first time since we left Sacramento, I saw a clean towel, and had a chance of washing my face comfortably—the dear, good woman tried to make me believe that all the worst of the road was passed; but it wasn't, though, because I overheard our driver telling somebody that he expected to have his neck broken before he reached Virginia City. At "Hunter's" they gave us a nice dinner: we had some delicious trout, (caught in the Truckee river, they told me,) and at six o'clock were again on our road. Now we had miles and miles of sage brush, dead cattle lying here and there among it, and in the far distance the mountains where "——the gold in sandy heaps With duller earth incorporate sleeps;"

and very barren they looked after the Sierra Nevada with its splendid pines. As the sun set, however, their appearance changed entirely; then they seemed to be touched by the wand of an enchanter, and the boulders turned into huge bars of silver and clots of virgin gold, such as with "——their orient smile can win

Kings to stoop, and saints to sin."

The clouds resting on their top were blue and gold, and green and silver, with here and there a streak of crimson, and they formed themselves into gorgeous palaces, domes and pinnacles, tipped with all the colors of the rainbow; it was in truth a beautiful sight. Such visions, I fancy, must be continually before the eyes of the gold-seekers, or they would never rest contented in a place like this.

By this time we were changing horses and preparing to ascend the dreaded Geiger Grade. We had very little light; the stars were dim, and there was just enough snow on the road to make it unpleasant for a wagon, but not enough for a sleigh, until within three miles of the summit, where the snow was so drifted that we had to turn off the grade and take one of the old roads. Here the poor men had to get out again and wade. Our discontented passenger was worn out by this time or had smoked himself into a quiescent state; he said not a word, but turned out with the others, and I had the whole wagon to myself. I assure you I made acquaintance with every part of it and the bumping I then and there received I shall not soon forget. However, everything comes to an end, they say; it was over at last, and we reached Virginia City, very much astonished to find ourselves safe and sound. We were told for our satisfaction that we might travel over the road for five years and not have so rough a trip.

The hotel looked cold and comfortless; it was ten o'clock, and the chambermaids had "retired" for the night, one of the porters told me, and could not be asked to do anything. I was, however, relieved by hearing a voice call me by name, and volunteer assistance. I found it belonged to a chambermaid whom I had met with at some hotel in one of my previous wanderings, and though I think you once remarked to Lewis Leland (who, by the by, is much wanted about these "diggins," for they "can't keep a hotel" here) that "one cannot live by chambermaids alone," it was a great comfort to me to meet with one in this uncivilized country, who had the "run of the house" and could get me what I wanted. Wherever I go, I always make a point of being civil to chambermaids; and you see virtue, in this case, met with its reward. The poor girl looked very dismal and told me "living out in Virginia City wasn't what it was cracked up to be."

Said I, "Why don't you get married?"

"Married is it?" she replied, "ah, then, indeed, the men here is very desavin."

I mention this for the benefit of those young ladies in San Francisco who condescend to "live out," should they turn their thoughts towards Washoe, with the idea that husbands are plentiful as—I would say blackberries, but at this season of the year, blackberries are not plentiful, and I am at a loss for a simile.

For myself I can certify that living of all kinds here is very "shady;" the beef is fearfully tough; mutton ditto; the butter is strong enough to ascend the Geiger Grade alone, if it were left in the keg; there are a few eggs, and some fried potatoes; but if I stay here they won't last long, as I am blessed with a remarkably good appetite.

I have just had an invitation to go into the Chollar mine where they say "everything is lovely, etc.," but I don't see it in that light. I think I shall return to San Francisco by the "Pioneer" route, and, if I reach that place alive, will tell you which route I think the best. From all accounts, however, I shall be likely to take more notes in black and blue than in black and white, as there are only twenty-five miles sleighing.

MARY PERCEVAL.

FROM MARYSVILLE.

MARYSVILLE, March 12, 1865.

EDITOR OF THE CALIFORNIAN.—It is Sunday morning, bleak, cold and disagreeable. The streets are almost entirely empty, and the prospect from my window is dreary indeed. All who are not at church are under cover somewhere, probably enjoying their dolce far niente by the side of a roaring fire.

My trip from San Francisco was not marked by any alarming adventure, if we except the fact that I found Sacramento. Your versatile correspondent, INIGO, once said of that delectable place, that it was built especially for one to pass through, if one were going anywhere. He did not add that the quicker one passes through it the better, which proves that he is not disposed to sacrifice truth to a jest. Business, however, in Sacramento is exceedingly dull. Very few have money at present, though the majority hope "it will all be right in the spring." Now, when men meet on the street, the first question is "Can you loan me a dollar?" To which the invariable reply is "Ain't got a red." And the two immediately take consolation and "smile" ominously—to the disproof of their assertion, for the bars do not trust.

I see you have a travelling agent who passed through Sacramento on a canvassing tour. The Bee made it the occasion to give your paper a very flattering notice. Not more, however, than it deserves, for it certainly is the best literary paper that visits this section.

I found the Sacramentans preparing for their charter election. Two tickets were in the field—the "Regular" and the "Citizens." Great excitement was manifested, and much interest was shown in the result. Scarcely knowing to whom to give my powerful influence, as things then gave no indication which way the election would turn, not wishing to be counted in on the losing side, and believing that outsiders always know more about local policy than the inhabitants of a town themselves, I determined to come up here and watch the battle from afar. I made the "voyage" in the Gor Dana, commanded by the urbane Shallcross. We did not cross the stream, however, but navigated it lengthwise. On the boat a rather sour-looking individual wished to know if my name was "Not." I informed him in that polite manner which is peculiar to me that my name was not "Not." This seemed to displease my questioner, for his sour visage looked sourer still during the rest of the trip, and on the arrival of the boat he waited to see which hotel I intended to patronize, savagely booking himself and carpet-bag for the opposition. He was evidently on the lookout for some one who was Not.

Business in Marysville is almost as dull as in Sacramento. But business men are hopeful and expect everything will take a lively turn in a couple of months. I sincerely hope that they may not be disappointed, for if affairs do not soon change for the better, there will be a general "burst up" in this section, and your correspondent will have to be elected to some office or engage in some other nefarious pursuit in order to pay his board and wash bills. However, nul desperandum is the motto of

ROBIN HOOD.

QUITS.

SHE is dead! and they say for her fame
It was barely in time that she died:
Better thus—she could never brook shame;
For oh! she had terrible pride.

Sure the path to the grave was soon trod—
She is resting, and so let it be;
But why do the gossips all nod
And point with their fingers at me?

That a sin is not buried, they tell,
Though the sexton dig deep as he can;
Perhaps it was murder: ah! well,
Let God be my judge—not man.

For she mocked me at first when I came
To fling a young heart at her feet,
And she spurned me because of a shame
That was done ere my pulses had beat.

Her birth, so she said, had no stain—
She was one of a noble old line,
And the blood that flowed red in her veins
Could not mingle with current like mine.

On the world's brow I wrote me a name,
Fair cheeks flushed with pride at my tread;
Then I wooed her with gold and with fame—
I wooed, but I wooed not to wed.

I remember her speech—it was fine;
That the house of her sire had no stain;
By my faith, of that same noble line
That hoast will be made not again!

It was murder? Well, well, let it rest;
I will answer myself for the deed;
All tears are weak brine at the best,
And prayer serves all knaves in their need.

Vex me not, shaven priest, stand apart!
Dole thy tedious texts out to fools;
For I swear there is that in my heart
Just now that would puzzle the schools.

Of your Future I reck not a toss—
Earth has torments that Hell can not give!
There's a grave where the four roads cross—
She is dead, and I—I—I live!

C. H. WEBB.

OUR AGENT ON HIS TRAVELS

DR. A. WEILLER, agent of THE CALIFORNIAN, is making the tour of the country to obtain subscriptions. He reports very fair success, notwithstanding the tightness of the times, and writes that he has yet to find the man or woman who does not like THE CALIFORNIAN. We copy below a few of the notices he has received from the interior press. The contrast between the appended paragraph from the Marysville Appeal and an article which is reproduced in an editorial elsewhere, is noticeable:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have before mentioned this as one of the best literary journals published in San Francisco. Its articles are chaste, witty and elevating. Dr. A. Weiller, general agent for THE CALIFORNIAN, is now in this city on a tour to increase its circulation. INIGO's "Things," which are written for this paper, are worth the price of subscription.—Sacramento Bee.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—Dr. Alfred Weiller, agent of THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly literary journal published in San Francisco, has arrived in this city, and proposes to solicit subscriptions for that paper. THE CALIFORNIAN is a high-toned literary publication, and of such a character as should receive a liberal support from the people of the Pacific coast. We have not as a general thing been favorable impressed with the literary publications of California, but THE CALIFORNIAN is an exception, and is well worthy of a place in every household.—Marysville Express.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—Yesterday we had the pleasure of a call from Dr. Alfred Weiller, of San Francisco. He is the travelling agent of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary paper published in that city and edited by C. H. Webb, with great ability. We understand the Doctor will make a tour of this and the neighboring counties for the purpose of procuring subscriptions to THE CALIFORNIAN. We wish him success.—Marysville Appeal.

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Threes Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

MR. HILLARY SPEAKS HIS MIND.

AFTER that meeting in Hyde Park, Francis Tredethlyn came very often to the Cedars, so often as to engender a vague uneasiness in Miss Hillary's mind. She knew that he loved her. If that sudden declaration in the study had never occurred to reveal the fact, Maude must have been something less than a woman had she been blind to a devotion that was made manifest by every look and tone of her adorer. She knew that he loved her, and that he had done battle with his love in order that she might be happily ignorant of the pangs that tormented his simple heart. The highly educated girl was able to read the innermost secrets of that honest, uncultivated mind, and was fain to pity Francis Tredethlyn's wasted suffering. Alas! had she not indeed traded upon his devotion, and obtained her father's safety at the expense of her own honor?

Such thoughts as these tormented Miss Hillary perpetually now that Francis spent so much of his life at Twickenham. She perceived with inexpressible pain that her father encouraged the young man's visits—her father, who could not surely shut his eyes to the real state of the Cornishman's feelings; yet who knew of her engagement to Harcourt Lowther. She did not know that Julia Desmond had taken good care to inform Francis of that engagement, and that the young man came knowingly to his delicious torture. She did not know this, and all that womanly compassion which was natural to her, that pitying tenderness which showed itself in the injudicious relief of bare-faced tramps and vagabonds about the Twickenham lanes, and the pampering of troublesome pet dogs and canary birds—all her womanly pity, I say, was aroused by the thought that she was loved, and loved in vain, by an honest and generous heart.

Thus it came to pass that she could no longer endure the course which events were taking, and she determined upon speaking to her father. They had dined alone one bright June evening; they were not often thus together now, for Mr. Hillary had fallen into his old habit of bringing visitors from London, and the ponderous matrons and croquet-playing young ladies inflicted a good deal of their company upon Maude. They had dined alone, and Miss Hillary seized the opportunity of speaking to her father upon that one subject which had so long occupied her thoughts.

"Mr. Tredethlyn comes here very often, papa," she said, breaking ground very gently.

Lionel Hillary filled his glass, retiring as it were behind the claret jug, from which comfortable shelter he replied to his daughter's remark—

"Often?—yes—I suppose he does spend a good deal of his time here. I am glad that he should do so; he is an excellent young man, a noble-hearted young fellow—the best friend I have in the world."

Mr. Hillary was a long time filling that one glass of claret, and his face was quite hidden by the crystal jug.

"Yes, papa, he is very good; but do you think it is quite right—quite wise to invite him so often?"

"Right?—wise?" cried Mr. Hillary; "what, in the name of all that's absurd, can you mean by talking of the right or wisdom of an invitation to dinner? The young man likes to come here, and I like the young man, and like to see him here. That is about all that can be said upon the subject."

Maude was silent for some moments. It was very difficult to discuss this question with her father, but she had grown familiar with difficulties within the past few months, and was no longer the frivolous girl who had known no loftier causes of anxiety than the uncertain health of her Skye terriers. She returned to the charge presently.

"Dear papa, I am sorry to worry you about this business," she said gently, "but there are such peculiar circumstances in our acquaintance with Mr. Tredethlyn; we are under so deep an obligation to him, and—"

"And on that account we ought to shut our doors in his face, I suppose!" exclaimed Mr. Hillary, with some show of impatience. "My dear Maude, what mare's nest have you lighted upon?"

"It is so difficult for me to explain myself, papa you can never imagine how difficult. But I think you ought to understand what I mean. When Julia was here, Mr. Tredethlyn's visits were quite natural, and I was always glad to see him; but it was my application to him for the loan of that money which resulted in the breaking of Julia's engagement. I cannot forget that night, papa; nothing but desperation would have prompted me to appeal to Francis Tredethlyn, and now that we are under this great obligation to him, I feel that we are bound to him by a kind of duty. We have, at least, no right to deceive him."

"Deceive him! Who deceived him?"

"Willingly, no one. But he may deceive himself, papa. You force me to speak very plainly. Upon the night on which I appealed to him for that loan he told me that he loved me, even though he was then engaged to Julia. There was something in his manner that convinced me of his sincerity, though I was shocked at the want of honor involved in such a declaration. But now that his engagement to Julia has been broken off, indirectly through my agency, he may think it likely that—"

"He may think it likely that you would be wise enough to accept one of the best fellows that ever lived, for your husband. Is that what you mean, Maude?"

"Papa!"

"Oh, my dear, I have no doubt you think me a cruel father, because I venture to make such a suggestion. But surely, Maude, you cannot have been blind to this young man's devotion. From the very first it has been obvious to any one gifted with the smallest power of perception. Julia Desmond contrived, by her consummate artifice, to inveigle the poor fellow into a false position; but in spite even of that foolish engagement, he has been devoted to you, Maude, from the first. I have seen it, and have counted, Heaven knows how fully, upon a marriage between you and him."

"You have done this, papa, and yet you knew all about Harcourt," exclaimed Maude, reproachfully.

"I knew that you were a foolishly sentimental girl, ready to believe in any yellow-whiskered young Admirable Crichton, who could make pretty speeches, and criticize the newest Italian opera, or Tennyson's last poem. But I knew something more than this, Maude; I knew the state of my own affairs, and that my only hope for you lay in a wealthy marriage."

"And you thought that I would marry for money—you could think so meanly of me, papa!"

"I thought that you were a sensible, high-spirited girl; and that when you came to know the desperation of the case, you would show yourself of the true metal—as you did that night at Brighton; as you did when you asked Tredethlyn for the loan that saved me from ruin."

Lionel Hillary stretched out his hand as he spoke, and grasped that of his daughter. In the next minute she was by his side, bending over him and caressing him. Only lately it had begun to dawn dimly upon Maude Hillary, that perhaps this father, whom she loved so dearly, was not the noblest and most honorable of men; but if any such knowledge had come to her, it had only intensified the tenderness with which, from her earliest childhood, she had regarded that indulgent father. The experience of sorrow had transformed and exalted her nature; and she was able to look upon Lionel Hillary's weaknesses with pitying regret, rather than with any feeling of contempt or indignation.

"Dear papa," she said, very gravely, "you and I love each other so dearly, that there should be no possibility of any misunderstanding between us. I can never marry Mr. Tredethlyn; I know that he is good and generous-minded and simple-hearted; I feel the extent of our obligation to him, but I can never be his wife. It is for this reason that I am fearful lest any false impression may arise in his mind. Pray, dear papa, take this into consideration, and do not let him come here so often—at any rate, not until you have been able to repay him his money, not until the burden of this great obligation has been removed from us."

Mr. Hillary laughed aloud.

"Not until the money has been paid! I'm afraid, in that case, Tredethlyn will stop away from this house for a long time to come."

"A long time, papa! But you told me you would be able to repay the twenty thousand pounds," said Maude, turning very pale.

"And I dare say I shall be able to pay the money some day. Such a loan as that is not repaid in a few months, Maude. How should you understand these matters? The twenty thousand pounds went to fill a yawning gulf in my business, and it would be about as easy for me to get the same amount of money back out of that gulf as it would for a single diver to bring up the treasures of a sunken argosy."

Maude sighed wearily. It seemed as if a kind of net had been woven around her, and that she suddenly found herself in the centre of it, unable to move.

"Papa," she cried, "you don't mean that Mr. Tredethlyn's money is lost?"

"Lost! No, child; but it may be a very long time before I shall be able to pay him. If you were not so foolish as to throw away one of the noblest hearts in Christendom—to say nothing of the fortune that goes along with it—there would be very little need for me to worry myself about this money."

"Oh, I understand, papa. If I were Mr. Tredethlyn's wife, you would not be obliged to pay the twenty thousand pounds," said Maude, very slowly.

"I should not be so tormented about it as I am now. Say no more, my dear; you don't understand these things, and you drive me very mad with your questions about my affairs."

"Forgive me, papa. No, I don't understand—I can't understand all at once; it seems so strange to me."

She bent her head and kissed her father on the forehead, and then went quietly out of the room, leaving him alone in the still summer twilight, with a belated wasp buzzing feebly amongst the fruit and flowers on the table. Maude went to her own room, and sitting there in the dusk, shed some of the bitterest tears that had ever fallen from her eyes. The discovery of her father's views with regard to her had humiliated her to the very dust; the idea that Francis' loan would never be repaid was torture to her keen sense of honor; torture which was rendered still more poignant by the recollection of her own part in the transaction. Would he ever be paid? Would that money, for the loan of which—and never more than the loan—she had supplicated her friend's betrothed husband, would that money ever be returned to the generous young man who had so freely lent it? Her father had said it would in due course; but there was something in his manner that had neutralized the effect of his words. To Maude Hillary's mind this debt was a very sacred one, a debt which must be repaid, and for which she herself was responsible. Twenty thousand pounds!—all the faculties of her brain seemed to swim in a great sea of confusion as she thought of that terrible sum—twenty thousand pounds, which she was bound to see duly paid; and she was no longer an heiress, to whom money was dross. She was a penniless, helpless girl; worse off than other penniless girls, by reason of her inexperience of poverty.

She thought of Harcourt Lowther; and his image seemed to shine upon her across a wilderness of troubles; a bright and pleasant thing to look at, but with no promise of help, no inspiration of hope, no pledge of comfort in its brightness.

"Perhaps papa is right after all," she thought, "and Harcourt would scarcely care to burden himself with a penniless wife."

She was ashamed of this brief treason against her lover, almost as soon as the thought had shaped itself; only in her despair it seemed to her as if there could be no security of any happiness upon this earth.

"I will tell Francis the truth about myself," she thought; "he shall not be deceived as to anything in which I am concerned. He shall not be deceived as to anything in which I am concerned. He shall know of my engagement to Harcourt."

Maude did not go down-stairs again that night, nor did her father send for her, as it was his wont to do when she was long away from him. It may be that he scarcely cared to encounter his daughter after that conversation in the dining-room, which had been far from pleasant to him. He was not a father of Mr. Capulet's class, who could order his daughter to marry the County Paris at a few days' notice, or, in the event of her refusal, bid her rot in the streets of Verona. But from the very first he had been bent upon bringing about a union between Francis and his daughter, and he brooded moodily over the girl's resolute rejection of any such alliance.

"And what would become of her if I were to die to-morrow?" he thought; "and what is to become of my business if I fail to secure a rich partner?"

CHAPTER XX.

AN EXPLANATION.

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN, now so frequent a visitor at the Cedars, happened to present himself there upon the day after that on which Maude had come to an understanding with her father. The young man rode down to Twickenham in the afternoon, and found Miss Hillary occupied with two croquet-playing young ladies and a croquet-playing young gentleman, whose manners and opinions were of the same insipidly flaxen hue as their hair and eyebrows.

There was a tired look in Maude's face that afternoon, which was very perceptible to Francis Tredethlyn, although quite invisible to the neutral-tinted croquet-players. Her eyes wandered away sometimes from the balls and mallets, and fixed themselves, with a sad, dreamy look, upon the sunlit river or the distant woodland. Francis saw this, and that faithful Cornish heart grew heavy in sympathy with Miss Hillary's unknown trouble. There must be a little of the Newfoundland dog in the nature of a man who can love hopelessly; a little of that superhuman fidelity, a little of that canine endurance which has inspired so many odious comparisons to the disparagement of the inferior animal called man. Francis Tredethlyn's eyes followed Miss Hillary with a dog-like patience all this afternoon, during which he established himself in the estimation of the flaxen-haired droppers-in as one of the vilest of croquet-players and worst-mannered of men. But the croquet-players departed after taking tea out of a very ugly Queen Anne teapot and some old Sevres cups and saucers, which had been bought for Miss Hillary at the sale of a defunct collector's goods and chattels. Francis stayed to dinner, and dined alone with Maude and her father.

and found very little to say for himself. He was distracted by the sight of Maude's pale face and sadly thoughtful eyes. How changed she was from the bright and sparkling creature whom he remembered a few months ago in that house! How changed! What was the secret trouble which had worked that transformation? What could it be except sorrow for the circumstances that divided her from her distant lover? There could be no other cause for her unhappiness, since her father's commercial difficulties had been smoothed by that twenty thousand pounds so freely advanced to him, and it never occurred to Francis that she could possibly give herself any uneasiness about that money, so lightly parted from by him; nor could he think that any new trouble threatened the merchant's peace, for Mr. Hillary was specially gay and pleasant this evening.

After dinner Maude strolled out into the garden, and down to that delicious terrace by the river, where the big stone vases of geraniums looked dark and grim in the twilight. She walked slowly up and down the long esplanade with a filmy lace handkerchief tied coquettishly over her head, and her long muslin dress sweeping and rustling after her like the draperies of a fashionably attired ghost. Francis Tredethlyn furiously watched that white-robed figure in the shadowy distance as he sat at the dinner-table with Mr. Hillary, and would fain have left his glass, filled with the merchant's rarest Burgundy, for a stroll by the quiet river. Perhaps Mr. Hillary perceived this, for he presently gave the young man his release.

"Since you don't drink your wine, you may as well go for a stroll in the garden, Tredethlyn," he said, good-naturedly. "I see Maude yonder, and she'll be better company for you than I am."

Francis was by no means slow to take this hint. But once outside the dining-room windows, he went very slowly to the terrace on which Maude was walking. He walked in and out among the flower-beds, making a faint pretence of admiring nature in this twilight aspect. He stopped to caress one of Maude's Skye terriers. The animals were very fond of him now that he had learned to avoid that trampling on their toes which had been one of the earlier manifestations of his devotion to Miss Hillary. He loitered here and there on every possible pretext, and at last approached the fair deity in the muslin dress with very much the air of a schoolboy, who presents himself in that awful audience-chamber wherein a grim pedagogue is wont to pronounce terrible judgments upon youthful offenders.

He did not know that Miss Hillary had been expecting him all this time; and that her special purpose was to bring him to her side upon that solitary terrace walk, where she could talk to him freely without fear of eavesdroppers. He did not know that he was quite as much expected as the schoolboy who has been summoned to the parlor, and was to receive a sentence as terrible.

Maude welcomed him very graciously, and for a little while they strolled side by side, talking of the summer's night, and the flowers, and Skye terriers, and canary birds, and other subjects equally commonplace and harmless. Then they came to a stop, mechanically, as it is in the nature of people to do when they walk by the side of a river, and looked over the stone balustrade into the still water. And then a death-like silence came down upon them; and Maude Hillary felt that the time had come in which she must utter whatever she had in her mind to say. It was difficult to begin; but then all her duties of late had been difficult; and upon her knees the night before, in the midst of tearful prayers and meditations, she had resolved that there should be no more sailing under false colors as regarded this young man.

"Dear Mr. Tredethlyn," she began at last, "you have been so good to my father, so good to me—for to serve him is to render a double service to me—you have been so kind and generous a friend, that I have grown to think of you and trust you almost as I might if you had been my brother."

Poor Francis listened to this exordium with a very despondent air. Inexperienced as he was in the ways of the world, he was wise enough to know that there was nothing hopeful in such an address as this. When a young lady tells a gentleman that she can regard him as a brother, it is the plainest possible declaration that he can never be anything else. In this case it seemed an uncalled-for act of cruelty, for the Cornishman had never deluded himself by any false hope.

"I think of you almost as if you were my brother," Maude went on, with heartless repetition of the obnoxious word; "and I cannot help thinking, dear Mr. Tredethlyn, that you are scarcely employing your life as wisely or as well as you might. I don't think you were ever intended to be an idle man; and, again, with such a fortune as yours, a man has scarcely the right to be idle. There are so many people who may be benefitted by a rich man's active life. Oh, forgive me, if I seem to lecture you. You will laugh at me, perhaps, and think I want to set myself up as a strong-minded woman, a political economist, or something of that kind. But I only venture to speak to you because I think you waste so much of your time down here, playing billiards with the empty-headed young men who haunt this place, and lounging in the drawing-room to hear the frivolous talk of half a dozen idle women, myself among the number."

She spoke lightly, but she was not the less earnest in her intention she was only travelling gradually round to the point she wanted to reach.

"But I am so happy here," cried Francis Tredethlyn. "Ah, if you knew how I have tried to stop away—if you could only know what happiness it is to me to come—"

Maude Hillary interrupted him hastily.

"Yes, I know it is a pleasant life in its way," she said; "very pleasant and very useless. It is a little new to you, perhaps, and seems pleasanter to you on that account. But if you knew what dreary work it is to look back at a long summer season of operas, and concerts, and horticultural meetings, and boat-races, and not to be able to remember one action worthy of being recorded in all that time! I am getting very tired of my present life, Mr. Tredethlyn. It has ceased to be pleasant to me ever since I have known of papa's difficulties. It is altogether unsuited to me; for I am engaged to marry a poor man, who would bitterly feel the burden of an expensive wife."

The bolt was launched, and Miss Hillary expected to see some evidence that it had gone home to its mark. But Francis Tredethlyn made no sign. There was just a little pause, and then he said, very quietly—

"Yes, I know that you are to marry a poor man; but with such a wife a man could scarcely remain poor. I suppose it's only an ignorant, foolish notion, but I can't help thinking that for the sake of the woman he loves, any man could cut his way to fortune. I can always believe in those knights of the olden time, who used to put a badge in their helmets, and then ride off to the wars to do all sorts of miraculous things; and I fancy it must be the same now a-days, somehow; and that a man who loves truly, and is truly loved again, can achieve anything."

Maude was inexpressibly relieved by this speech.

"You know of my engagement, then?" she said.

"Yes, I have known it for a very long time."

"Ah, of course, Julia told you?"

"Yes, it was Miss Desmond who told me?"

"She had a perfect right to do so; there was no reason for any secrecy in the matter. I am very glad that you have known of it. You are so kind a friend that I should not like you to be ignorant of anything nearly relating to my father or myself."

"It is very good of you to call me a friend," Francis answered. It seemed to him as if some angelic creature was stooping from her own proper sphere to place herself for a brief interval by his side. "It is very good of you to take any interest in my welfare; and I feel that you are right. The life I lead is utterly idle and useless; but it shall be so no longer. Your father has very generously offered me a grand opportunity of turning both my time and money to account."

"My father? But how?"

"He has offered me a partnership in his own house."

"A partnership? a partnership in his difficulties—his liabilities?" cried Maude, in a tone of horror.

"Those difficulties were only temporary. The thirty thousand pounds I advanced have wiped out all liabilities, and your father's business stands on a firmer basis than ever."

"Thirty thousand! You have lent papa thirty thousand pounds?"

"I have not lent it, my dear Miss Hillary. I have only invested it in your father's business. There is no obligation in the matter, believe me; or if there is, it is all on my side. I get a higher rate of interest for my money than I should get elsewhere."

He stopped suddenly, for Maude had burst into a passion of sobs.

"Oh, how could he do it? How could he?" she cried.

"How could papa take so mean an advantage of your generosity? I love him so dearly, that it almost kills me to think that he should be base or dishonorable. I thought the twenty thousand pounds would soon be paid, and instead of that he has borrowed more money of you."

"My dear Miss Hillary, pray, pray do not distress yourself. Believe me you misunderstand this business altogether. It is not a loan. It is only an equitable and friendly arrangement, quite as advantageous to me as to your father. Upon my word of honor you do Mr. Hillary a cruel wrong when you imagine otherwise."

Maude dried her tears, and listened to the voice of her consoler. She was so anxious to think well of her father, that she must have been something more than an ignorant inexperienced girl, if she shut her ears to Francis Tredethlyn's arguments.

Those arguments were very convincing, very specious. Maude ought, perhaps, to have perceived that they were not the original ideas of Mr. Tredethlyn. She ought, perhaps, to have discovered the parrot-like nature of his discourse respecting all the grand prospects of the house of Hillary & Co.; but she wanted to think well of her father, and Francis Tredethlyn urged her to that conclusion. She listened to his discourse as eagerly as if he had been the most eloquent of living creatures. She felt a kind of tender friendship for him as he talked to her; never before had he seemed so nearly on a level with herself. She wanted to believe in his wisdom; she wanted to respect his sense and judgment, because he was the defender of her father—that beloved father against whom her own conscience had so lately arisen, a stern and pitiless judge.

The quiet river rippled under the summer moonlight before Maude and her companion left the terrace; so much had Francis found to say about the house of Hillary & Co., and the wonderful advantages that must come to him from a partnership in that great firm. Surely his enthusiasm must have arisen from some vague idea that even that commercial alliance would be some kind of link between Miss Hillary and himself. He talked very freely to-night, for Maude's confidence had set him at his ease; and in almost every word he uttered he naively revealed some new depth in his devoted love.

Late that night, when the Cornishman had gone away, Maude stood at her open window, looking out at the river, and thinking of all that Francis Tredethlyn had said to her.

"Harcourt Lowther never loved me as this man loves me," she thought, sadly. "Ah, what a pity that there should be so much wasted love and devotion in the world!"

And then the thought of Francis Tredethlyn's thirty thousand pounds arose in her mind—a terrible obligation, a heavy burden of debt; a debt that was perhaps never to be cancelled.

(To be continued.)

HYLAS.

"HYLAS! Hylas!" The echo replieth
Alone to the shout on the desolate shore.
"Hylas! Hylas! 'Tis Heracles crieth!"
In vain, anxious hero! Thy seeking give o'er.

The beautiful Hylas shall gleam not again
So white at thy side, nor rejoice in thy smile;
And Jason may track the blue stretch of the main,
But Hylas, bright Hylas, is sleeping the while.

O little to him is thy love! He's at peace
In the smooth-brimming spring in an amorous fold.
O little to him is the famed Golden Fleece!
A Naiad sat there, and her locks were of gold.

Her blue eyes were pensive, her shoulders were fair—
And, "Hylas, pray put down thy pitcher," sighed she;
Her waist was so wanton, her bosom so bare—
And, "Hylas, sweet Hylas, I'm dying for thee!"

Go, Heracles, go to Laomedon's aid,
For Hylas put down his gray pitcher of stone;
And the Argo may stretch her broad wings till they fade,
For Hylas half yielded, and Hylas was won.

A step, and her arm round his neck made a link;
A kiss, and complete was the chain of her spell;
A breathless embrace as she slid to the brink,
And Hylas, bright Hylas, was drawn in the well.

No beam saw his fate, if it glanced through the shade,
No dove cooed his lullaby, sweet and profound;
A dreamy wave dimpled their sinking forms made,
Where a tiny flower, brushed from the bank, floated round.

So, Heracles, hie thee to sorrowing Troy!—
Hesione weeps on the rock by the sea.
And Jason, set sail! for the bloomy-cheeked boy
Is at rest as the pearls and the sea-mosses be.

[Nathan D. Urner, in the N. Y. Leader.

LOVE OF CHILDREN.—Tell me not of the trim, precisely-arranged homes where there are no children; "where," as the good German has it, "the fly-flaps always hang straight on the wall;" tell me not of the never-disturbed nights and days, of the tranquil, unanxious hearts, where children are not! I care not for these things. God sends children for another purpose than merely to keep up the race—to enlarge our hearts, to make us unselfish, and full of kindly sympathies and affections; to give our souls higher aims, and to call out all our faculties to extended enterprise and exertion; to bring round our fireside bright faces and happy smiles, and loving, tender hearts. My soul blesses the great Father every day that he has gladdened the earth with little children!—Mary Howitt.

EVERY deep longing, however, is a prophecy of accomplishment; to every earnest seeker it is promised, he shall find. Accident is the apple of Newton, which, by its falling from the tree, brings the hidden thought and plan into reality. If the bent of the will, and the disposition, are but strong enough, sooner or later the apple falls—the opportunity is given.—Frederika Bremer.

A SARATOGA fashion gossip says: "Girls none too young to be in the nursery make their three or four toilettes a day." To which the Boston Post adds: "The little babies change oftener."

DRAMATIC MENTION.

WE are brought down to the briefest of mention this week. Hester Prynne, put upon the Opera House stage Friday evening of last week, was played on the following Saturday, giving place on Monday evening to the benefit of those who "stand and wait;" Medea and The Serious Family filled the bill, Miss Heron playing the part of Mrs. Delmaine in the latter piece for the first time. On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings Hester Prynne was revived to fair houses. Thursday evening was appointed for Mrs. Stark's benefit, Miss Heron being announced to appear as "Evadne" in The Bridal, the beneficiary as the "Duchess de Torrenneva" in Faint Heart Never Won Fair Lady. Owing to indisposition Miss Heron could not appear, and The Little Barefoot, Mrs. Edwin as the heroine, was substituted. The testimonial to Mrs. Stark was a good one, showing that our people are occasionally alive to their duties. We suggest that a benefit be gotten up for Mrs. Judah, one of the most deserving actresses that ever visited our coast, as well as an old time favorite. In response to a call signed by most of our prominent citizens and "2,000 others" Miss Heron's benefit in Camille was announced for last evening. We have no doubt that the house was a crowded one. This evening Miss Heron's engagement in this city closes with Gumede, after which she visits the Interior. In the afternoon the usual afternoon performance will be given. On Monday night Charles Wheatleigh takes possession of the Opera House stage; Harry Courtaine is under engagement to appear with him. The minstrels at the Eureka are leading off to the best of their ability; it cannot be denied that they offer quite a contrast to their predecessors and contrasts are said to be pleasant. Some new features are presented in the lady members of the troupe, Little Clara, and Misses Maria, Della Sager and Julia Morgau, whose features enliven the entertainment.

The Metropolitan was opened by Julia Dean Hayne on Thursday evening with The Hunchback, to a very satisfactory audience. Mrs. Hayne has lately returned from a tour northward, and she will be welcomed by many of our citizens as an accomplished artiste and an estimable woman. Playgoers are not all indifferent to such a copartnership of claims to their regard, though sometimes, it cannot be denied, moral worth seems to weigh lightly in the scale of success.

AN UNBIASED CRITICISM.

THE CALIFORNIA ART UNION—ITS MORAL EFFECTS UPON THE YOUTH OF BOTH SEXES CAREFULLY CONSIDERED AND CANDIDLY COMMENTED UPON.

THE Editor of THE CALIFORNIAN ordered me to go to the rooms of the California Art Union and write an elaborate criticism upon the pictures upon exhibition there, and I beg leave to report that the result is hereunto appended, together with bill for same.

I do not know anything about Art and very little about music or anatomy, but nevertheless I enjoy looking at pictures and listening to operas, and gazing at handsome young girls, about the same as people do who are better qualified by education to judge of merit in these matters.

After writing the above rather neat heading and preamble on my foolscap, I proceeded to the new Art Union rooms last week, to see the paintings, about which I had read so much in the papers during my recent three months' stay in the Big Tree region of Calaveras county; [up there, you know, they read everything, because in most of those little camps they have no libraries, and no books to speak of, except now and then a patent-office report, or a prayer-book, or literature of that kind, in a general way, that will hang on and last a good while when people are careful with it, like miners; but as for novels, they pass them around and wear them out in a week or two. Now there was Coon, a nice bald-headed man at the hotel in Angels' Camp, I asked him to lend me a book, one rainy day; he was silent a moment, and a shade of melancholy flitted across his fine face, and then he said: "Well, I've got a mighty responsible old Webster-Unabridged, what there is left of it, but they started her sloshing around, and sloshing around, and sloshing around the camp before I ever got a chance to read her myself, and next she went to Murphy's, and from there she went to Jackass, and now, by G—d, she's gone to San Andreas, and I don't expect I'll ever see that book again; but what makes me mad, is that for all they're so handy about keeping her sashshaying around from shanty to shanty and from camp to camp, none of 'em's ever got a good word for her. Now Coddington had her a week, and she was too many for him—he couldn't spell the words; he tackled some of them regular busters, tow'rd the middle, you know, and they threw him; next, Dyer, he tried her a jolt, but he couldn't pronounce 'em—Dyer can hunt quail or play seven-up as well as any man, understand me, but he can't pronounce worth a d—n; he used to worry along well enough, though, till he'd flush one of them rattlers with a clatter of syllables as long as a string of sluice-boxes, and then he'd lose his grip and throw up his hand; and so, finally, Dick Stoker harnessed her, up there at his cabin, and sweated over her, and cussed over her, and rasted with her for as much as three weeks, night and day, till he got as far as R, and then passed her over to 'Lige Pickerell, and said she was the all-firedest dryest reading that ever he struck; well, well, if she's come back from San Andreas, you can get her and prospect her, but I don't reckon there's a good deal left of her by this time; though time was when she was as likely a book as any in the State, and as hefty, and had an amount of general information in her that was astonishing, if any of these cattle had known enough to get it out of her;" and ex-corporal Coon proceeded cheerlessly to scout with his brush after the straggling hairs on the rear of his head and drum them to the front for inspection and roll-call, as was his usual custom before turning in for his regular afternoon nap;] but as I was saying, they read everything, up there, and consequently all the Art criticisms, and the "Parlor Theatricals vs. Christian Commission" controversy, and even the quarrels in the advertising columns between rival fire-proof safe and sewing machine companies were devoured with avidity. Why, they eventually became divided on these questions, and discussed them with a spirit of obstinacy and acrimony that I have seldom seen equalled in the most important religious and political controversies. I have known a Grover & Baker fanatic to cut his own brother dead because he went for the Florence. As you have already guessed, perhaps, the county and township elections were carried on these issues alone, almost. I took sides, of course—every man had to—there was no shirking the responsibility; a man must be one thing or the other, either Florence or Grover & Baker, unless, of course, he chose to side with some outside machine faction, strong enough to be somewhat formidable. I was a bitter Florence man, and I think my great speech in the bar-room of the Union Hotel, at Angels', on the night of the 13th of February, will long be remembered as the deadliest blow the unprincipled Grover & Baker cabal ever got in that camp, and as having done more to thwart their hellish designs upon the liberties of our beloved country than any single effort of any one man that was ever made in that county. And in that same speech I administered a scathing rebuke to the "Lillie Union and Constitution Fire and Burglar-Proof Safe Party," (for I was a malignant Tilton & McFarland man and would break bread and eat salt with none other,) that made even the most brazen among them blush for the infamous and damnable designs they had hatched and were still hatching against the Palladium of Freedom in Calaveras county. The concluding passage of my speech was considered to have been the finest display of eloquence and power ever heard in that part of the country, from Rawhide Ranch to Deadhorse Flat. I said:

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: A word more, and I am done. Men of Calaveras—men of Cuyoté Flat—men of Jackass—BEWARE OF CODDINGTON! [Cheers.] Beware of this atrocious ditch-owner—this vile water-rat—this execrable dry-land shrimp—this bold and unprincipled mud-turtle, who sells water to Digger, Chinaman, Greaser and American alike, and at the self-same prices—who would sell you, who would sell me, who would sell us ALL, to carry out the destructive schemes of the 'Enlightened [Bah!] Freedom & Union Grover & Baker Loop-Stitch Sewing Machine Party [groans] of which wretched conglomeration of the ruff-scruff and rag-tag-and-bob-tail of noble old Calaveras he is the appropriate leader—BEWARE OF HIM! [Tremendous applause.] Again I charge you as men whom future generations will hold to a fearful responsibility, to BEWARE OF CODDINGTON! [Tempests of applause.] Beware of this unsavory remnant of a once pure and high-minded man! [Renewed applause.] Beware of this faithless modern Esau, who would sell his birthright of freedom and ours, for a mess of pottage!—for a mess of tripe!—for a mess of sauer-kraut and garlic!—for a mess of anything under the sun that a Christian Florence patriot would scorn and a Digger Indian turn from with loathing and disgust! [Thunders of applause.] Remember Coddington on election day! and remember him but to damn him! I appeal to you, sovereign and enlightened Calaverasses, and my heart tells me that I do not appeal in vain! I have done. [Earthquakes of applause that made the welkin tremble for many minutes, and finally died away in hoarse demands for the villain Coddington, and threats to lynch him.]

I felt exhausted, and in need of rest after my great effort, and so I tore myself from my enthusiastic friends and went home with Coddington to his hospitable mansion, where we partook of an excellent supper and then retired to bed, after playing several games of seven-up for beer and booking some heavy election bets.

The contest on election day was bitter, and to the last degree exciting, but principles triumphed over party jugglery and chicanery, and we carried everything but the Constable, (Unconditional Button-Hole Stitch and Anti-Parlor Theatrical candidate,) and Tax Collector, (Moderate Lillie Fire-Proof and Fusion Grover & Button-Hole Stitch Machines,) and County Assessor, (Radical Christian Commission and Independent Sewing Machine candidate,) and we could have

* He used to belong to the Florence at first.

† I grant you that that last part was a sort of a strong figure, seeing that that tribe are not over-particular in the matter of diet, and don't usually go back on anything that they can chew.

carried these, also, but at the last moment fraudulent hand-bills were suddenly scattered abroad containing sworn affidavits that a Tilton & McFarland safe, on its way from New York, had melted in the tropical sunshine after fifteen minutes' exposure on the Isthmus; also, that the lock stitch, back-stitch, fore-and-aft, forward-and-back, down-the-middle, double-and-twist, and the other admirable stitches and things upon which the splendid reputation of the Florence rests, had all been cabbaged from the traduced and reviled Button-Hole Stitch and Grover & Baker machines; also, that so far from the Parlor-Theatrical-Christian-Commission controversy being finished, it had sprung up again in San Francisco, and by latest advices the Opposition was ahead. What men could do, we did, but although we checked the demoralization that had broken out in our ranks, we failed to carry all our candidates. We sent express to San Andreas and Columbia, and had strong affidavits—sworn to by myself and our candidates—printed, denouncing the other publications as low and disreputable falsehoods and calumnies, whose shameless authors ought to be driven beyond the pale of civilized society, and winding up with the withering revelation that the rain had recently soaked through one of Lillie's Fire and Burglar-Proof safes in San Francisco, and badly damaged the books and papers in it; and that, in the process of drying, the safe warped so that the door would not swing on its hinges, and had to be "prized" open with a butter-knife. O, but that was a rough shot! It blocked the game and saved the day for us—and just at the critical moment our reserve (whom we had sent for and drummed up in Tuolumne and the adjoining counties, and had kept out of sight and full of chain-lightning, sudden death and scorpion-bile all day in Tom Deer's back-yard,) came filing down the street as drunk as loons, with a drum and life and lighted transparencies, (daylight and dark were all the same to them in their condition,) bearing such stirring devices as:

"The Florence is bound to rip, therefore, LET HER RIP!"

"Grover & Baker, how are you now?"

"Nothing can keep the Opposition cool in the other world but Tilton & McFarland's Chilled Iron Sifes!" etc., etc.

A vast Florence machine on wheels led the van, and a sick Chinaman bearing a crippled Grover & Baker brought up the rear. The procession reeled up to the polls with deafening cheers for the Florence and curses for the "loop stitch scoundrels," and deposited their votes like men for freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of conscience in the matter of sewing machines, provided they are Florences.

I had a very comfortable time in Calaveras county, in spite of the rain, and if I had my way I would go back there, and argue the sewing machine question around Coon's bar-room stove again with the boys on rainy evenings. Calaveras possesses some of the grandest natural features that have ever fallen under the contemplation of the human mind—such as the Big Trees, the famous Morgan gold mine which is the richest in the world at the present time, perhaps, and "straight" whisky that will throw a man a double somersault and limber him up like boiled macaroni before he can set his glass down. Marvelous and incomprehensible is the straight whisky of Angels' Camp!

But I digress to some extent, for maybe it was not really necessary to be quite so elaborate as I have been in order to enable the reader to understand that we were in the habit of reading everything thoroughly that fell in our way at Angels, and that consequently we were familiar with all that had appeared in print about the new Art Union rooms. They got all the papers regularly every evening there, 24 hours out from San Francisco.

However, now that I have got my little preliminary point established to my satisfaction, I will proceed with my Art criticism.

The rooms of the California Art Union are pleasantly situated over the picture store in Montgomery street near the Eureka Theatre, and the first thing that attracts your attention when you enter is a beautiful and animated picture representing the Trial Scene in the Merchant of Venice. They did not charge me anything for going in there, because the Superintendent was not noticing at the time, but it is likely he would charge you or another man twenty-five cents—I think he would, because when I tried to get a dollar and a half out of a fellow I took for a stranger, the new-comer said the usual price was only two bits, and besides he was a heavy life-member and not obliged to pay anything at all—so I had to let him in for a quarter, but I had the satisfaction of telling him we were not letting life-members in free, now, as much as we were. It touched him on the raw. I let another fellow in for nothing, because I had cabined with him a few nights in Esmeralda several years ago, and I thought it only fair to be hospitable with him now that I had a chance. He introduced me to a friend of his named Brown, (I was hospitable to Brown also,) and me and Brown sat down on a bench and had a long talk about Washoe and other things, and I found him very entertaining for a stranger. He said his mother was a hundred and thirteen years old, and he had an aunt who died in her infancy, who, if she had lived, would have been older than his mother, now. He judged so because, originally, his aunt was born before his mother was. That was the first thing he told me, and then we were friends in a moment. It could not but be flattering to me, a stranger, to be made the recipient of information of so private and sacred a nature as the age of his mother and the early decease of his aunt, and I naturally felt drawn towards him and bound to him by a stronger and a warmer tie than the cold, formal introduction that had previously passed between us. I shall cherish the memory of the ensuing two hours as being among the purest and happiest of my checkered life. I told him frankly who I was, and where I came from, and where I was going to, and when I calculated to start, and all about my uncle Ambrose, who was an Admiral, and was for a long time in command of a large fleet of canal boats, and about my gifted aunt Martha, who was a powerful poetess, and a dead shot with a brickbat at forty yards, and about myself and how I was employed at good pay by the publishers of THE CALIFORNIAN to come up there and write an able criticism upon the pictures in the Art Union—indeed I concealed nothing from Brown, and in return he concealed nothing from me, but told me everything he could recollect about his rum old mother, and his grandmother, and all his relations, in fact. And so we talked, and talked, and exchanged these tender heart-reminders until the sun drooped far in the West, and then Brown said "Let's go down and take a drink."

M. T.

M. T.

MARK TWAIN.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CALIFORNIAN.]

NEW YORK, February 8th, 1865.

THERE are many literary folks in the war, as you know. Some, like Fitz James O'Brien, have died there. Others, like A. H. Duganne, whom some consider a literary man, are there still, and ought to relinquish letters for arms altogether. New York has sent, at various times, upwards of two hundred correspondents away; eighteen of these have been killed, and forty-nine have died of disease, either on the field or at home. I see, as I take up the papers now and then, the names of many odd folks who used to amuse me on bivouac. Prince Salm Salm, after being twice or thrice disgraced, turns up in Alabama as the Federal commander of a small town. Salm Salm, like Saint Alb and many others, is a petty adventurer with a facility for tripping up and falling on his feet. He obtained audience at Washington through a woman who ought to have been his wife, but wasn't, and when he went to the field she accompanied him. Afterwards, when Salm Salm turned out to be a spy or something the contrary of straightforward, the woman in question, being very beautiful, went over to the tent of a California Major-General whose gallantry in the field is equalled by his gallantry in the boudoir. The two reposed together, as we see Jupiter doing with his beauties between the pauses of thunderbolts, in fresco, and their loves made much lively comment and merriment among the subordinates. The General referred to is about being married, I hear. Salm Salm is fighting for Uncle Sam; and the beautiful being, who loved both of them equally well, is probably making some other wayfarer happy and on excellent terms with herself.

Saint Alb used to be an aide-de-camp to Gen. McDowell; he was an upright man, for his size, and had a weakness for writing a German book upon the war; but some time ago he married a widow lady, who gave him a comfortable little fortune in return for his society and title. Hereafter, therefore, the title of the Count Saint Alb will have a permanent hook to hang itself upon.

The Orleans Princes are the most distinguished of the imported grandees who have fought on our side. Gen. McClellan has been invited to spend an indefinite time abroad with them. He sailed some time ago, and means to quietly study the contest from the Old World, so as to save himself from any concession which his "friends" here might coax him to make. I do not give a political, but a literary criticism upon McClellan, when I add that he has been too ill-abused. He never seemed to me a brilliant man—and I have had personal opportunity to gauge him—but always an upright, polite and sensible man. With all his failures, who but Sherman has proved his superior? More than two years ago he failed to take Richmond, and the fact of that capital remaining untaken yet is McClellan's best testimonial. However, fame is a game of thimble-rig: now you see it—now you don't.

Mr. Lincoln still takes his food. You may not know that the old gentleman is a keen relisher of literature. He buys most of the new books, and passes opinion upon them. Humorous works and sententious criticism please him best. Some time ago he praised Hackett's olla podrida, and more recently paid an unsolicited compliment to "Orpheus C. Kerr." The latter gentleman has done nothing of late, save issuing a little book of excellent poems with absurd illustrations. He contemplates both a novel and a play, if indeed both of them are not already achieved. Newell's domestic matters, about which he has been so greatly maligned, redound in my opinion rather to his credit than otherwise. His wife, barring her admiration of the athletes, is a shrewd, enterprising woman, who is making money hand over hand in London. Boucicault is writing her a play. Had she been divested of her horse-dramatic traditions she might have scaled "society" after her marriage, and passed for what she is—a splendid physical creation with an errant but not a coarse mind to endow it. At any rate, Newell has passed through the fire unscathed. He is respected here by all who know him, and is thoroughly self-reliant, modest and dignifiedly courteous. He has not crossed the threshold of Bohemia, and that, with the few beer-takers who constitute it, is an unpardonable offence. But Newell has too much in him to turn his life into a pun and merge his manhood into a clique. The genius "hanging out" at Pfaff's is brilliant and sketchy enough, but it won't do to model big ships by. Ned House is the ablest of Pfaff's folks. He has been twice to Paris and brought away with him many exquisite recollections, which he is now publishing in the Weekly Review. House was the Tribune reporter of the John Brown raid and the subsequent execution. He is now the Tribune's dramatic critic, and professes to be something of an art-critic. We have no art-critic here of equal acumen and fearlessness. Hurlburt, of the World, has the latter only. He is the author of the celebrated "Elbows of the Mincio" article in the New York Times, and is a rattling paragraphist. But art, in New York, is mercenary and superficial. We have a few facile draughtsmen, but they do not care to lend themselves to any great idea, and with the single exception of Judd's Margaret and Irving's Tales, as illustrated by Darley, I recall no really excellent drawings emanating from any current artists. Sol. Etting and George White and Hammet Billings are laborers merely, not artists in the exalted sense of that prostituted word. Vedder and La Farge and Hoppin are among our most original designers, and I see that Arthur Lumley, a very tolerable draughtsman, has attempted to illustrate Drake's "Culprit Fay." There is really no love of art for art's sake anywhere in America. A glance at the biographies of current great artists abroad will suggest no counterparts to them here. See Eugene Delacroix, for example, recently deceased. He gave up everything that makes life cheerful to accomplish a revolution in painting. He never married; he half eschewed society; he closed his atelier to students, and for a whole lifetime dwelt apart, so that when he died the speaker at his grave said: "Here lies one who never found rest till now." With world-wide fame, Delacroix made no endeavors to lay up or to gain moneys. His object was, the foundation of a better school of drawing and color, the breaking up of the stiff, hard, David-ish classical. Sick all his days, nervous, fagged, feverish, he never forgot the great design, and wooed apart neither by fame nor luxury, died with his end achieved, and his name and creed among the grand masters. I used to stand before Delacroix's "Dante and Virgil" in the Luxembourg, and think of the time when he was too poor to buy a frame for it that it might be creditably exhibited. Yet in that one canvas laid his fame. He never left Paris but twice, and then upon art excursions. Music and literature wooed him together, but his divinity was perched upon the pallet alone. He had in the zenith of his fame but $2,000 a year. After his death his sketches brought close to a hundred thousand dollars. He had designs enough for many lifetimes.

See, also, Cornelius, the reviver of German art, the Albrecht Durer of our time. The child of a Dusseldorf janitor in a picture gallery, he grew up amid canvasses, and set himself from boyhood to lift modern art to the rank it had in the fifteenth century. He is now nearly eighty years of age, and his life has been a crusade. He has made art in Germany as exalted in purpose, if not in effect, as it used to be when kings were daily guests at the studios. Four cities have been embellished by his genius; without himself, and one or two others similarly endowed with noble ambition, German art would be insignificant. If we could find exemplars of marvellous fertility and spontaneous, uncontrolled genius, we may recall Turner the landscape painter, and Gustave Doré, the French designer. The latter has made in a short lifetime (he was born in 1833) upwards of fifty thousand drawings, none of which have been tame or commonplace. His illustrations of Dante were the most fantastic and tremendous conceptions which have ever preached in stone; his illustrations of the Bible, which the great Parisian firm of Hachette & Co., are getting up, will cost a million and three hundred thousand francs. When they are done he means to stop designing and take to painting. Gustave Doré was a poor boy from the Eastern provinces of France. Unlike the others of whom I have spoken he is a gay fellow, and takes his ease in his inn. He never meditates upon his drawings, but taps his head and they run like so much brain upon the block. The remembrance of these and the magnificent coterie of Paul Delaroche's, Shaffer, Guericault, Couture and the rest, tells us not only that art here is born stunted and crippled, but that, as yet, it lacks the spirit ever to grow at all. My English advisers speak of Wolman Hunt, the pre-Raphaelite, as about departing for the East to paint a great scriptural work. He will dwell at Bagdad. His "Christ in the Temple," painted in Jerusalem and occupying seven years, was purchased for twenty five thousand guineas.

Harry Sanderson, the pianist, came to New York the other day, from Havana. He is one of the best performers we have, but it takes a great deal of "priming" to get him in condition. They say with truth, that his execution is spirited. "Very so!"

I recommend for Lowell's next Biglow paper, the Episode of Mr. Biglow, our Consul in Paris, who being presented with the Emperor's key to his opera box, sent his servants to occupy it, to the bewilderment and disgust of the Imperial court. This is republicanism in its zenith. I think Biglow was quite right. The Emperor's box is "plenty good enough" for Yankee waiters.

The Florentine people, finding themselves metropolitans, have embraced the theory of magnificent distances and are about to demolish their ancient mediæval walls and put boulevards upon their sites. After awhile they will level Fiesole on the ground that it hides the view of their duomo.

What sort of libraries have you on the Pacific slope? The Boston public library, from a statement just published, has 150,000 books and pamphlets. That is a good beginning. The Astor library here is the best disarranged receptacle of literature in the world. Two librarians only are on duty, and the only man who knows anything about literature in it is the proprietor of a patent medicine, and neglects his post. The Mercantile Library is managed well only in the newspaper room.

The Philadelphia Bulletin has been sold at auction for $89,000, to Mr. Peacock, one of the present proprietors and editors. Terms cash. There was much excited competition, Mr. Money bidding for Mr. Peacock, and much surprise felt when his name was announced as the purchaser. G. W. Childs, proprietor of the Ledger, was a competitor, who led off the bidding with $50,000. The Bulletin shows the evil tenor of stock concerns; it formerly belonged to Alex. Cummings, the great shoddyite and projector of the New York World. He divided it into a stock affair and sold out the shares to his co-workers, who at last gained possession of most of them. The concern at once arranged itself into two factions, the respectable literary and the shrewd business. Gibson Peacock, the editor, headed the first, James Chambers, the cashier, headed the second. Some of the latter's friends were detected purloining; a law suit resulted; at last the Bulletin was sold out, and with the result stated. Cummings and Chambers were certain of getting it. The Bulletin is old foggyish, but profitable—a sort of diluted Evening Post.

Almost all the editors in New York have been sued for slander and libel by a crazy man named Tibbetts, who went mad over produce speculations. As most of the defendants are in stocks they may plead nonsuits on the ground of similar lunacy.

Count Joannes, the renowned litigant and humbug, has had Fiske, (Stephen R.) of the Leader, arrested for libel. Joannes is an inveterate bore at all courts of justice, and has been indicted for persistent and baseless prosecutions. His name, I believe, is George Jones.

This brings me to the end of my letter. I will quote a stanza before I stop from J. W. Montclair's new book, just issued. It consists of some excellent translations and some indifferent poems. The piece with which I conclude bears the old title of "Lenore," and is attributed in the original German to Burger. Its atmosphere is good:

ABOVE the stars are twinkling—
The moon is shining bright—
And the dead they ride by night.

"My love, wilt open thy window;
I cannot long remain,
And may not come again.

"The cock already crows—
Tells of the dawning day,
And warns me far away.

"My journey distant lies;
Afair with thee, my bride
A hundred leagues we'll ride.

"In Hungary's fair land
I've found a tranquil spot:
A little garden plot.

"And there within the green,
A little cottage rests,
Befitting bridal guests."

"Oh thou hast lingered long;
Beloved, welcome here—
Lead on, I'll never fear."

"So, wrap my mantle round;
The moon will be our guide,
And quick by night we'll ride."

"When will our journey end?
For heavy grows my sight,
And lonely is the night."

"Yon gate leads to our home;
Our bridal tour is done—
My purpose now is won.

"Dismount we from our steed;
Here lay thy aching head—
This tomb's our bridal bed.

"Now art thou truly mine;
I rode away thy breath—
Thou art the bride of death!"

DESULTORY.

EXTRACTS FROM PARIS LETTERS.

THE ARTISTS AT COMPIEGNE.

LET me tell you the stories told of the artists at Compiègne. One of the artists was extremely anxious to have the honor of painting the portrait of the French Emperor. He knew that the portrait would be bought at the price of one or two thousand dollars and sent to some provincial museum. The Emperor declined. He then attacked the Empress. She declined. He said he hoped they would at all events allow him to paint the portrait of the Imperial Prince. They declined to allow him to paint the portrait of the Imperial Prince. When the last day of his stay came he went to the railway station and longed about it until the next series of guests arrived, as they did that afternoon. Pretending to have come from Paris with them he got into one of the Emperor's carriages and drove to the Palace. The Chamberlain of service was astonished to see him and said in a tone of chilling coldness: "What gives us the pleasure of seeing you again?" The painter stammered: "I beg your pardon—the train quit the station just as I was entering it." The Chamberlain replied in the same tone: "Ah! that is unfortunate. Let us hope that you will be luckier this evening." The painter dined at table, but an half-hour before the next train for Paris left a servant told him the carriage was at the door, and he was forced to go, to his bitter regret. The first day he dined at Compiègne he beckoned to the waiter and said: "Old horse, is this the best wine you have got in this house of yours?" "Yes, sir." "Well, all I can say is, it is d—d poor stuff." "His Majesty drinks it every day and finds it excellent." "You are gasing, old boy. If he does he is no judge of wines." When the waiter placed the finger bowl on the table he took his revenge on the ill-bred painter by slyly saying: "This is not to drink, sir."

Another painter went down to Compiègne by mistake. The Court wished to invite a member of the Institute who has the same name as the artist, but by some mistake his ticket of invitation was sent to the artist. He is not eminent and he was sure there was some error; but upon modestly making inquiry at the proper place he was informed that there was no misunderstanding, for the invitation was of truth intended for him. He was delighted and to Compiègne he went. He was greatly puzzled to observe that the Emperor and Empress, while extremely affable, talked to him constantly about his scientific labors and the memoirs he had contributed to the Institute. He now felt certain there was some error and he appealed to one of the Emperor's aids, whom he knew, to counsel him what step to take in his embarrassment. The aide-de-camp examined the matter and discovered that there really had been a mistake. The Emperor and Empress were more affable than ever. His visit to Compiègne was destined to be chequered by unpleasant incidents. He one day showed the Emperor's aide a photograph of a battle piece he had just painted, which pleased the aide so much that he showed it to the Emperor, who at once said he would purchase it for one thousand dollars. The painter (afraid that he might expose himself to the suspicion of having turned his visit to indelicate account) begged to be excused as his painting was not on sale. The Emperor so pressed him to part with the picture that the artist begged His Majesty to accept it for a present. The Emperor consented. It was awkward in the artist to carry the photograph with him to Compiègne, and still more awkward to show it to anybody. When one invites a cotton manufacturer to his country house, the manufacturer does not carry patterns of his calicoes in his pocket, neither does he pull them out and show them. The intellectual laborers who shared the imperial hospitalities generally made a wretched figure. Prof. Oppert, who was invited there for his discovery of the mode of interpreting cuneiform writing, was seated by the Emperor's side in the theatre, and between the acts they talked first on one subject and then on another. At last the professor stupidly turned the conversation on politics and began to lecture the Emperor on what he ought to do. The Emperor cut him short in the midst of his harangue by saying: "What do you think of that actress? Isn't she very pretty?"

COMPOSERS AT THE "CAFES CHANTANTS."

This place of amusement was the café concert. Allow me here, however, to mention how the strict enforcement of their rule requiring all auditors to take some refreshment has proved to their very great loss. Men still entertain or dismiss angels unawares. One summer night a few years since a gentleman entered one of these places. The sharp-eyed bustling waiter swooped upon him with the traditional: "What do you want, sir?" "The Banks of the Rhone." "Sir, you must take something." "I tell you I take The Banks of the Rhone." "Auditors, sir, must take some refreshment." "What? you are performing my Banks of the Rhone, and I must pay you to hear my piece?" The waiter said nothing, but went to the master of the establishment and mentioned what had occurred. The dull proprietor came to the spectator and insisted upon his ordering some refreshment or leaving the place. "Very well. I see a glass of sugared water is the cheapest article on your price list.

Give me a glass. I warn you the sale of this object shall cost you dear." The next day the composer busied himself organizing a society of composers, whose songs were in those places, for the purpose of preventing their execution except upon payment of copyright. In a week he was successful, and that churlish reception he experienced has cost the master of the café chantant some $20,000. Had the proprietor treated the composer with proper consideration and given him the best his house afforded and conducted him to a seat of honor he probably would never have had to pay copyright on songs.

PAY OF CONCERT SINGERS IN PARIS.

Performers on instruments at these cafés chantants have been known to refuse seats in the orchestra of the Grand Opera, and Opera Comique. Singers constantly refuse offers from the provincial theatres. Mlle. Sax (whom Meyerbeer selected to fill one of the leading characters in L'Africaine) the star of the Grand Opera, rose from a café chantant. Mlle. Suzanne Lagier, the favorite actress of the Porte St. Martin, has made her first appearance at L'Eldorado. I have acquainted you with the vogue which Mlle. Theresa enjoys at the Alcazar. It was to counterbalance the favor, she enjoys the manager of L'Eldorado proposed to Mlle. Suzanne Lagier to appear at his establishment. What do you suppose she receives for salary? She has an engagement for two years at ten thousand dollars a year, the penalty of the bond of engagement is $50,000. Mlle. Theresa now receives the same amount of money, and she makes as much more by singing in drawing-rooms. Her income is still far removed from the figure of Mlle. Adeline Patti's revenue, nevertheless $20,000 a year isn't to be disdained. Just try me with it by way of experiment! Mlle. Suzanne Lagier made her bow to the public of L'Eldorado in well turned verses by Mous. Clairville, to which she wrote the score.

THE LICENCE OF PLAYER PEOPLE.

Although Shakspeare complained, even in his day, of players who speak more than is set down for them, the cafés chantants are charged with increasing this licence of the players. At some of the theatres here this licence is carried to such an extreme that in the course of a few nights scarcely a vestige remains of the original piece, and the extemporized play changes nightly as in those Neapolitan theatres or at Mme. George Sand's private theatre at Nohant, when the play-wright gives merely the canvas on which each actor embroiders what figures he pleases. It is said that Odry—a remarkable actor in farce—introduced this licence in its modern form. One day he was half an hour behind the time. The audience became extremely impatient and expressed its impatience in that boisterous manner with which you are as familiar at Boston as we are here. At one time it was thought the pit would surely tear up the benches. At last Odry made his appearance and the public was silent, expecting to hear Odry's very humble excuses. Vernet—another actor scarcely less celebrated than Odry—was on the stage and had taken a chair to wait for the storm to abate. Odry said in an agitated tone: "My dear boy, I am the victim of a deplorable accident." Odry's agitation was so great it really alarmed Vernet, who asked: "Pray what is it?" "Old horse, I wanted, imperatively required, a pair of new pantaloons to make my appearance in this piece. I went to an old clo' shop to buy a second-hand pair. The shopkeeper's wife was all alone in the shop. She gave me a pair. I tried on the right leg. It fitted me to a T. The pantaloons were wrapped up. I tucked the bundle under my arm. I drew on the pantaloons—and found the very d—l was to pay." "Pshaw! Get out!" "The right leg fitted me to a T, but when I drew on the left leg I found it was made for a fellow with a wooden leg!" "You ought to have carried it back." "Didn't I do that very thing? But the shopkeeper's wife wouldn't take 'em back!" She said: 'Look here, man, them pants was as how made for a wooden leg. Now the best thing you can do, if you don't want to lose your money, is to go and have a wooden leg put on.' As a fellow never suffers from gout or rheumatism or corns or chilblains or varicose veins or tight boots who has wooden legs, I thought the suggestion was a first-rate idea, and I went as fast as I could go to the wooden legs' shops. They were all closed! So I was obliged to return here and put on this old pair of pantaloons which I wear, seeing you and I don't stand on ceremony, but which I would not wear on the stage before an audience for all the gold in Paris. The very first thing I shall do to-morrow morning will be to go get me a wooden leg. I have half a mind to get two, because they tell me that there is a considerable discount if I take the pair. This is the reason I am so late." Vernet now saw the joke, and he exclaimed with comic astonishment: "Mon Dieu! man, you don't mean to say that you did all that in thirty minutes time?" "I didn't do nothing else, and, to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, when I saw that honest, industrious shopkeeper's wife working away as though her life depended on it, though her husband was far away in one of the back streets, crying 'Old clo'! 'Old clo'! I had to leave the shop at least half a dozen times to conceal my tears." You see now by what nonsense we are tickled. Such stupid stuff brings down the house.—"Spiridion" in the Boston Gazette.

THE NIGHTINGALE'S SONG.

THE following description of the nightingale's song is very life-like and very interesting. It is seldom that we meet with anything so accurate and well executed. As many of our readers have never been abroad, and mocking birds in cages, instead of nightingales in trees, afford all the after dark bird-vocalism we are accustomed to in this country, the sketch will be read with peculiar satisfaction:

It is now near midnight; and, as we know where a nightingale of first-class has taken up his position for several nights lately, we will move in that direction, so as to be in time to catch the first notes of his overture, which are sometimes very striking. A foot-road leads us down a steep path overhung with trees, and consequently now almost as dark as Erebus; so that we are glad to grope our way by feeling along a friendly post-and-rail fence on the one side, to a more open part of the valley, sprinkled over with low brushwood, and having a tree here and there standing in young symmetrical beauty and bold relief against the sky.

The woods, hemming this little glade on either side, make it appear, from where we now stand, very like an amphitheatre of Nature's own construction; and as we are close to the spot about which the nightingale has been singing lately, we arrest our steps lest the intrusion should surprise our songster and prevent his coming at the usual hour.

Thus, with bated breath, we listen for the voices of the night; and while contrasting the midnight quietude of the peaceful vale before us with the noisy rush of the tide of life through the great metropolis, we are at length roused from our reverie by the first almost startling notes of the bird we have been listening for.

Thrice a long-sustained note, gradually lowering about a semitone, as if to impart a shade of sadness to it, is repeated; and then a deep warbling shake follows, and afterwards a pause, as though to allow us time to think whether or not that bird has really got a soul, which he means to unburden to us to-night in the song commenced in such a purely artistic style. The pause is but for an instant or two, and then he begins again, singing in a leisurely manner, and allowing us good opportunity to judge of the scale and capability of his fine organ. After thus testing the power and flexibility of his voice, by singing in a rather detached and desultory manner for some quarter of an hour, his song gradually becoming more animated; the inspiring genius of music seems to have come down upon him, and he fain would tell us all his heart.

We listen, almost awe-struck, at the wondrous flood of melody that, without a break, keeps pouring from him; now swelling and rising in bravura passages till the very woods seem to ring with echoing harmony, and anon sinking to low dulcet tones, so soft and plaintive as almost to melt a sensitive heart to tears. We can hardly help at times clapping our hands at the termination of some ultra-brilliant passages; but one need not cry encore, for almost before our ravished ears have fairly taken it in, we hear another part commencing so sweetly melancholy that we know not whether joy or sadness is the bird's most charming mood. Now he has fairly entered into the full tide of song, we need not be at all afraid of going a little nearer or even close under the tree he is singing in, for no slight disturbance will cause that rich flow of music to cease; even as though he was too much engrossed with the angelic reudering of his inspired song to condescend to listen to meaner things. Having approached very near him, his loudest notes seem fairly to go through and through us with piercing brilliancy, and yet the more delicate pianissimo parts lose nothing of their delicious euphony, but fall in melting tones upon the ear, like nectarious drops of harmony.

When a slight break does occur, and he is quite silent for a moment, how really dead the place seems! The vitality of his voice seemed to permeate not only ourselves but all surrounding nature, and we did not even think how dark it was while listening to such a rapturous serenade. How beautifully expressive is the simple but telling eulogy of Milton on this bird's song, "Silence was pleased!" A page of blank verse, glowing with all the imagery this great poet was such a master of, would perhaps have told with less effect.

Strange thoughts creep in upon us as we passively drink in the rich flood of exquisite bird-minstrelsy which this darling little traveller from foreign lands pours with such lavish prodigality into the ear of night. How this nocturnal songster must often be singing in the dead of night when his humble mate, singing so mutely in the nest hard by, is the only listener!

One can hardly help feeling sorry that such delightful symphonies should lack an intellectual audience. It is something akin to the sensations a lonely wanderer experiences when the prairie before him is all suffused with the color of the most lovely flowers, which he believes no living soul has ever seen before, or perhaps will ever see again.

We live always! Knowledge is, and ever has been, progressive. The soul of man is as capacious as his aspirations are boundless, and he has before him duration infinite in which to labor and to know.—Kimball

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere ja25-tf

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATED
Salt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers,
Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, — FIFTY CENTS.

Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by

MRS. A. GRIDLEY,

Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor,
AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES.
TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,
Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,
SAN FRANCISCO

ja25-tf

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!

DE GRATH'S GENUINE
ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES!
Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetters, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
ja25 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

A THING OF BEAUTY
IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and rosy hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 418 Front street,
San Francisco

ja25-tf

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

an27

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED
Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

an27

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND DRESSING
THE Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Fetridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
ja25-tf Agents, San Francisco.

BREWSTER & CO'S
Carriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA,

will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE, and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES, and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of Broome street,

The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of No. 372, Broome street,

NEW YORK.

del7-5m

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING
Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE Reduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,
Southeast corner of Montgomery and California street,
San Francisco. del7-5m

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

CREATE A HEALTHY APPETITE!

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure Dyspepsia, Diarrhea and Constipation.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Invigorate the System and enliven the mind.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Overcome the effects of Drunkenness and Late Hours.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure all Diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Are Palatable to the Taste.

They are the

BEST BITTERS IN THE MARKET.

And when once used will always be called for again.

They are made in the most careful manner

From Pure Old Wheat Whisky, Medicated from Roots and Herbs

Especially adapted for the cure of all Stomachic Diseases and Liver Complaints.

Try Them and You will be Satisfied.

For sale everywhere by Druggists and Liquor Dealers or by

N. B. JACOBS & CO.,

423 Front street,
San Francisco.

fe11-6m

OPPOSITION STEAMER-DAY,
MARCH 13th!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK!
VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE!!!

THROUGH IN 21 DAYS!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

AMERICA,

W. L. MERRY, COMMANDER

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON MONDAY, MARCH 13TH

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely, Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit of the Isthmus is a pleasant trip. Meals furnished free by the Company while crossing. A baggage-master will be sent through by each steamer. Insurance on Treasure at the lowest rates.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,

fe25

Up stairs, San Francisco.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers
Fine Clothing
—AND—
GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CLOSET BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624 CLAY STREET, (Old No 17)

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2 3 and 4, San Francisco y2

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THERE is nothing new to write about this week. Matters remain in nearly the same position as they were a week ago. The great expected battle has not taken place yet, but there is no knowing what hour the struggle may begin. This is the "record" for two days' working of the wires:

March 9.—An expedition consisting of all the White and colored troops stationed at Key West, in the gunboats Honduras, Magnolia and Hendrick Hudson, had started on the 24th February for the purpose of taking St. Marks.

The Augusta Constitutionalist says that the soldiers of the Fifteenth Corps became drunk and pillaged Columbia, S. C., burning the entire length of Main street. Sherman ordered the burners and pillagers to be shot.

A quantity of tobacco amounting to 95 tons, and estimated to be worth $380,000, was captured by the Union troops at Fredericksburg. It is said to have been sent from Richmond for the purpose of exchanging it with bacon.

March 10.—The Richmond papers anticipate lively times in the neighborhood of that city—so soon as the weather becomes favorable. They say the lines about Richmond are impregnable, and argue that if Lee defeated Grant when he had under his command some 225,000 men, while that of the rebel commander amounted to about 60,000 men, he ought to defeat him again when the two combined Federal armies do not number 150,000 men! And so they go.

A despatch to one of the New York papers gives the following news from North Carolina:

Refugees who arrived in Newbern state that Fayetteville was in our possession last week, and that Sherman was within forty miles of Raleigh. The rebel soldiers were deserting in companies, and in some cases by regiments. Some of them were returning to their homes. The people pay but little attention to the proclamation of Governor Vance calling them to arms. In most places in North Carolina the people go forth to meet Sherman with words of welcome, and are not particular about placing their stock and supplies within his reach. A panic prevails among the negroes in North Carolina since the announcement that they are to be conscripted to serve in the rebel army. The rebels are now gathering them up, and a strong feeling exists among the conservative slaveholders to resist the measure, some of whom are arming their slaves in order that they may be able to resist the rebel authorities and thus retain their servants, who exhibit a readiness to fight for their masters and homes rather than for the Confederacy. A great number of negroes are flocking to Sherman's army.

March 12.—Lee telegraphs from his headquarters as follows, to Breckinridge:

"Bragg reports that he attacked the enemy yesterday, four miles in front of Kinston, and drove him from his position. He disputed the ground obstinately and took up a new line three miles from his first. We captured three pieces of artillery and fifteen hundred prisoners. The number of the enemy's dead and wounded left on the field is large as ours is comparatively small."

Kinston, near which the fight occurred, is situated on the direct route from Goldsboro to Newbern, and is about twenty miles east of Goldsboro, and about thirty from Newbern. It is supposed this force of the enemy was advancing from Newbern against Goldsboro for the purpose of cutting the railroad at that point.

An early attack on Mobile is indicated by the fact received from a rebel source, that twenty-two steamers and six Mississippi river transports are in the lower bay, and a large number of troops on Dauphin Island and at Pensacola.

General Emory, of the Nineteenth Corps, has succeeded General Hancock as Commander of the Middle Military Department, comprising the lower part of the Shenandoah Valley and other territory in that region, during the continuance of General Sheridan's more active field operations.

Maj.-Gen. Schofield and Brevet Brig.-Gen. Schofield arrived at Newbern from Wilmington, but bring no news from Sherman. The enemy are in considerable force at Kinston. Lee's corps from Hood's army was reported there. Some skirmishers belonging to the 15th Connecticut and 17th Massachusetts were captured. Bragg is reported in command. Gen. Cox commands our forces at that point.

March 13.—Advices to the New York Tribune which are deemed trustworthy, state that Sherman's army passed into North Carolina on the 3d.

The rebel Gen. Magruder, together with Sue Mundy and Henry Metcalf, were captured on Sunday last, by a party of 50 men of the 30th Wisconsin. They were concealed in a barn in Webster, Meade county, Ky.

A letter from Kinston says that Bragg again attacked Cox's force, making two separate assaults, which were repulsed with heavy loss to the enemy. A division of the Second Corps captured one piece of artillery and 200 prisoners. The enemy left the field in confusion, and all the killed and wounded fell into our hands. The enemy is reported to number from 15,000 to 20,000 men. A rebel ram is stationed at Kinston to protect the bridge across the Neuse. Lee and Breckinridge are said to have visited Kinston and given instructions to Bragg. Schofield remains in the field with Cox, giving every movement his personal attention.

March 15.—The New York Times thinks it probable that Sheridan has moved from Charlottesville to join Grant, by crossing the James river and the south side railroad. An alarm was created in Richmond on the night of the 11th, by the report that Sheridan was near the city.

Despatches from Gen. Lee to Breckinridge, published in the Richmond papers, state that Hampton surprised Kilpatrick at daylight on the 10th, and drove him from his camp, taking guns, horses, wagons and many prisoners. The guns were destroyed. The rebel Col. J. P. King was killed and Gen. Hume and Cols. Kugan and Morrison were wounded.

LOCAL MATTERS.

The U. S. Branch Mint re-opened Thursday, having been closed since the death of Chief Coiner Denio.

A male infant, three or four weeks old, was placed in the care of the Police, Wednesday, by Manuel Cerf, who found it on Market street, where it had been abandoned.

Two hundred thousand oranges and a large quantity of cocoa nuts and limes arrived from Huahine, Tahiti, by the schooner Flying Dart, Monday.

The U. S. Grand Jury have found four bills of indictment against Lot B Walls and Wm. Coes, jointly; also two against the latter and three against the former, individually. They are officers of the Great Republic, and are indicted for beating and wounding seamen under their control.

Insanity is becoming a feature of such terrible certainty that examinations by our Courts have to be systematized; Judge Cowles will officiate hereafter on Monday, at 1 P. M.; Judge Blake, Friday at 12 M. This will enable the friends of the unfortunate to bring them forward at stated times, with the assurance that they will be examined in regular order.

The Alumni of Phillips Academy, (Andover, Massachusetts,) residing in California, are to meet Tuesday evening next, at the Mercantile Library rooms, in response to a call from their "Alma Mater." The institution was the first incorporated Academy in Massachusetts; doubtless many of its graduates are now citizens of this State.

A "run" was made upon the office of the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, on Thursday, in consequence of unfounded and silly rumors in circulation. The Directors have made an exhibit which furnishes conclusive proof that the Institution is perfectly solvent, and that there is no cause for the panic.

The contribution-box in front of the Catholic Orphan Asylum was removed, with its contents, by some pilfering scoundrel—for whose villainy in robbing the parentless, there may be forgiveness, but we can scarcely comprehend it as a possibility—on the 15th inst. The box is believed to have been nearly full of the accumulated deposits of kind-hearted passers-by.

The Bulletin, which changes its city editors almost as often as economical people change their shirts, has a new incumbent of that office in Augustin Snow, a gentleman who arrived in the last steamer from the East. Mr. Snow was for a long time connected with the city department of the New York Times, filling for the past year the chair of city editor of the New York Commercial. He is a thorough newspaper man, and can scarcely fail to make his mark among us, but he will find the berth he occupies very different from what it is in New York, as the city editor here is his own reporter, and has no one to deploy in different directions except his own self.

Ireland's patron saint would have had no cause to complain that his piety and zeal in establishing the "true faith"—were not remembered gratefully, had he been cognizant of the honor accorded to his memory yesterday in this city. Mass was celebrated at all the Roman Catholic churches in the morning, and at St. Mary's Cathedral Grand High Mass was offered at 11 A. M. Various civic and military organizations marched the streets: there was an address at Union Hall; the suburban pleasure resorts were thronged with joyous visitors; in the evening, social parties, balls, etc., concluded one of the best celebrations of the anniversary of "Saint Patrick's Day" ever enjoyed either in or out of the Green Isle.

The body of a murdered man was found at Hayes' Valley, Tuesday evening; the attention of the police was called to the matter next morning; the body (the face having been so mutilated and being so far decomposed as to be at first unrecognizable) was taken to the dead-house, and under the supervision of Dr. L. J. Henry subjected to such chemical applications as to restore it to a condition in which it was readily known as that of Charles T. Hill. Circumstantial evidence indicates Thomas Byrnes as the murderer, and that the deed was committed on the night of the 20th of February, the incentive being the possession of a pin of the immense value of which deceased had boasted, but which it appears was in reality worth but about five dollars. Hill was about 27 years of age, a native of New York; he came to California in August last, and lived a "fast" life until his money gave out. Byrnes was one of his bad associates, and though he is not convicted of this crime is known to the police as an experienced transgressor. The daily press has teemed with the details of this affair for three or four days, but we think a mere record of the principal facts sufficient in a community not unused to tales of horror; even the most avid devourers of soul-sickening sensationalisms in real life must be very nearly sated by this time.

Officer Rose, on Tuesday evening last, recognized Mortimer, the man who a few weeks ago left him in the woods near San José after knocking him senseless and cutting his throat. Mortimer, it will be remembered, was in Rose's custody, and had lured the officer to a secluded spot under pretence of showing where certain stolen articles were concealed. Rose lost his prisoner, and very nearly lost his life; however, he is now able to do full duty, and has the satisfaction of knowing that Mortimer is again in custody. The murderous villain has, since his escape from Rose, been operating under an assumed name in Siskiyou, and has been convicted of robbery and sentenced to seven years imprisonment at San Quentin. He was identified by officer Rose as he was being taken to the station house in this city for safe keeping, while on his way to the State Prison.

The "San Francisco Benevolent Association" has been organized. No pompous announcement or grand flourish of trumpets heralded its coming, but quietly, unostentatiously, its very footfalls indicating the approach of true charity, it takes its place in our midst—and God grant that our people may welcome it as becomes not only its modest worth but the necessity—the want which could wait no longer—for such an institution in San Francisco. It proposes to trench upon the peculiar work or province of no society or order already existing; it intends to seek out and relieve the distress of those for whom no provision has been made, and in its membership and disbursements will know no distinction of faith or sect, whether religious or political. This city never needed such an organization more than at the present time, for with all the glitter of jewels and rustling of silks in the walks of fashion, there is too much painfully positive proof that all around us there is poverty, and not infrequently utter destitution. Aside from the benefits to be conferred upon that most worthy of all classes of poor people—those who do not go upon the streets, asking alms, but conceal their wretchedness just as long as inborn pride of soul can resist the demands of the poor, feeble body—the "Association" will be able to check the impositions successfully practiced upon persons of ready sympathy who have not time to investigate the cases they meet with. A "ticket" system is to be adopted; thus when a citizen is appealed to, he can send the applicant to the officers of the society, who will promptly ascertain the real merit or demerit of the individual asking assistance, and take measures to prevent a repetition when it is found that fraud has been attempted. We have not space for further remark upon this subject at present, but trust we shall be able from time to time to record the fact that the treasury of the "San Francisco Benevolent Association" is not allowed to become empty, and there are never wanting warm-hearted, generous contributors to strengthen the hands of its founders and agents. The Board of Trustees consists of the following gentlemen: Louis McLane, William C. Ralston, Elie Lazard, William Norris, R. B. Swain, J. W. Snow, R. G. Sneath, M. Ellis, Louis Sachs, Levi Stevens, D. W. C. Rice.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

A. B. Metcalf was killed at Virginia City, March 11th, by J. E. Doyle, formerly one of his familiar friends and companions. The act is said to have been committed in self-defence.

J. H. Richardson lost the sight of one of his eyes lately, at Santa Rosa, from the wanton discharge of a gun near his face by Pleasant Linville.

A bar of gold valued at $2,500 is shown in Nevada as the product of two days washing of the claims of the Sailor Flat Company at Blue Tent.

Very rich rock has been taken out recently at the Oak Flat Ledge, near Alleghany City. From five pounds of quartz thirteen and a half ounces of gold were extracted.

J. L. Johnson, while at work in a mining claim near Piety Hill, Nevada county, recently, met with an accident by which the upper edge of his hip-bone was broken, and he was considerably bruised about the body.

J. C. Sargent has been relieved from the command of the refractory juveniles for whom the State maintains a Reform school at Marysville. Probably the young scallawags need something more than a sergeant to enforce proper discipline.

The number of votes polled at the recent election in Sacramento was 2,535. The following candidates were elected: Trustee, S. D. Smith; Auditor, C. C. Jenks; City Assessor, J. C. Halley; City Collector, Capt. D. A. DeMerritt.

Six distinct shocks of earthquake were felt at Santa Rosa on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week. The chimney of a blacksmith's forge was thrown down, several pieces of crockery were displaced from their shelves, and plaster fell from the walls in a number of brick buildings.

The Sacramento Valley Railroad Company are about to build a bridge across Alder creek, a short distance above the present one. It will be of wood, and built on the plan of Leonard & Carroll's self-adjusting bridges. It will be of a single span, 150 feet in length, and covered, resting on granite abutments. The course of the railroad between Alder creek and Ward's ravine, a distance of about one mile, is to be made straight, thus doing away with the heavy curve between the above-named points.

USEFUL INFORMATION.

DISTANCES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

To various points:

To Fort Point, 4 miles, by omnibus, four trips a day.
 Loue Mountain, 3, street railway.
 Seal Rock, 6, cars and omnibus, two trips a day.
 Mission Dolores, street railways; Ocean House, 8.
 San Mateo, 20, railroad.
 Crystal Springs, 23, railroad and stage.
 Half-Moon Bay, 29, do.
 Redwood city, 30, do.
 Mountain View, 38, do.
 Santa Clara, 47, do.
 San Jose, 50, do, or steamer and stage, 54.
 Alviso, 46, steamer, daily.
 Ahmader mines, 67, steamer and stage; or by railroad and stage, 64.
 Santa Cruz, 78, railroad and stage.
 Oakland, 8, steamer and railroad, six trips a day.
 Alameda, 11, steamer, three trips a day.
 San Leandro, 15, steamer and railroad.
 Mission San Jose, 34, steamer, railroad and stage.
 Warm Springs, 37, do.
 Benicia, 30, steamer leaves at 4 P. M. daily.
 Sacramento, 117, do.
 Stockton, 117, do.
 Martinez, 33, do.
 Pacheco, 38, steamer and stage.
 Diablo Coal Mines, 44, steamer and stage.
 Suisun, 50, steamer, or 54 by steamer and stage.
 Vallejo, 28; Mare Island, 37; Napa city, 50.
 White Sulphur Springs, 67, stage from Napa.
 Geysers Springs, 118, do.
 Sonoma, 52, steamer, tri-weekly.
 Petaluma, 48, steamer, daily.
 Healdsburg, 80, stage daily from Petaluma.
 San Quentin, 12, steamer; Farallone Islands, 21.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Letters to any part of the United States, 3 cents for each 4 ounce or part thereof.

Drop Letters, 2 cents.
 Advertised letters, 1 cent in addition to the regular rates.

Valuable letters may be registered on application at the office of mailing, and the payment of 20 cents registration fee.

Transient newspapers, periodicals, blanks, proof-sheets, book manuscripts, pamphlets, and all mailable printed matter, except circulars and books, 2 cents for each and every 4 ounces. Double these rates are charged for books.

Unsent circulars, to one address, not exceeding three in number, 2 cents, and in the same proportion for a greater number.

Seeds, cuttings, roots, etc., 2 cents for each 4 ounces or less quantity.

All packages of mail matter not charged with letter postage must be so arranged that the same can be conveniently examined by Postmasters; if not, letter postage will be charged.

No package will be forwarded by mail which weighs over 4 pounds.

All postage matter, for delivery within the United States, must be prepaid by stamps (except duly certified letters of soldiers and sailors); otherwise, double the above rates will be charged on delivery.

Weekly newspapers (one copy only) sent to actual subscribers within the county where printed and published, free.

Letters to Canada and other British North American Provinces, when not over 3,000 miles, 10 cents for each 4 ounce. When over 3,000 miles, 15 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to Great Britain or Ireland, 24 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to France, 15 cents for each 4 ounce. Prepayment optional.

Letters to other foreign countries vary in rate according to the route by which they are sent.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-nathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
 Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
 645 Washington st., San Francisco.

BOOK-KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete BUSINESS EDUCATION, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4 3m

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvius's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made now arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHERS HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $8,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
 Over Parrott's Bank.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Chabriere of Paris, Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,

ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,

No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKEY.

For Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge. fe4 3m I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES, adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of SUPERIOR CARRIAGES, ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,
 ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

ATKINS MASSEY,

UNDERTAKER,

(At the Old Stand.)

No. 651.....SACRAMENTO STREET,
 First house below Kearny street.

Agent for Fisk's Metallic Cases. Office of the City and County Coroner.

NATHANIEL GRAY,

UNDERTAKER,

CITY AND COUNTY SEXTON,

641 SACRAMENTO STREET, CORNER OF WEBB,

Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC BURIAL CASES and CASKETS.

de17 3m

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY.
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.
 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, AND JOHN COLLNER

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN," Office, No. 328 Montgomery street, SAN FRANCISCO.

VANDALL, CARR & CO.,
 BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,

NO. 410 CLAY STREET,

(North side, between Sansome and Battery.

Particular attention paid to the printing of Briefs and Records. fe11 1f

PRINTING! PRINTING!!

DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Montgomery, - - San Francisco

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city. fe4 1f

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING
 HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON, NEW YORK, 323 Montgomery street, 387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
 de31 3m

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing anhydrous alcohol, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.
 HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

401 Battery, cor. Clay,
 ja25-tf San Francisco.

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other mal-practices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
 ja25-tf 401 Battery, corner Clay,
 San Francisco.

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGURY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents for the Pacific Coast,
 401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,
 San Francisco.

Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-1f

THE CASE OF MISS HARRIS.

THE case of Miss Harris, who killed Mr. Burroughs in Washington on Monday, Jan. 30, for an alleged breach of promise of marriage, involves certain principles of considerable importance to society and civilization. Miss Harris is described by the local reporters in the most lively and particular manner, as being of "good figure, rather slight, with a well-formed head, dark hazel eye, fine black hair cut short and worn in curls—naturally intelligent, with a highly sensitive organization," and only nineteen years of age, though, we are told, she appears to be a few years older. Of Mr. Burroughs, whom this fascinating creature has killed, we are in like style informed, that he was a "gentleman of unblemished morals, of the highest honor, of remarkably fine form," thirty-five years of age, and only a few months married. Immediately after having shot Mr. Burroughs in the Treasury Building, Miss Harris stated, and again two days afterward reiterated the statement, that he "had not seduced her," that he "had done her no harm," and she exclaimed with emphasis, "As God is my witness, I am virtuous!" In the personal statement she made after her arrest and committal, she stated that her sole reason for the bloody deed of Monday was, that Mr. Burroughs had broken a promise he had once made to marry her, and had married another woman. The rebutting evidence on this point, is found in a statement made by some of the friends of the deceased in Washington, that he had frequently told Miss Harris that he "could not reciprocate her attachment," that he "could not marry her," and that upon one occasion, when Mr. Burroughs mentioned to Miss Harris the subject of his marriage, she told him she was engaged to a Mr. Devlin.

But whichever of these statements may be credited, the fact remains that the reason given by Miss Harris for her act of homicide, was that Mr. Burroughs had broken a promise of marriage.

Now, admitting for the sake of argument, that this is true, the question arises how the whole matter is to be regarded, how the courts are to treat such cases, what is to be the verdict and the practice of society in the premises? May a woman, who has by any means been led to understand or fancy that a man intends to marry her, kill that man with impunity, if for any cause he do not marry her? And, in like manner, and on the same principle, may a man kill a woman who fails to keep a promise she may have made to wed him? Are jilted lovers of either sex to have the delightful privilege of mutual butchery at will or convenience?

We suppose there are few men who have arrived at the age of thirty without having at some time or other given at least a half dozen of Eve's daughters an idea that he might possibly marry them—without having murmured soft things which the fair creatures construed into protestations of devotion—without perhaps having been so weak or indiscreet as to utter some word which an eager listener might distort into a promise that she might yet be wholly, wholly his. In like manner, there is no good-looking girl of twenty summers who who has not, by word or by smile, by billing or by cooing, given each one of at least a score of beaux the impression that she would yet confer on him infinite felicity by making him the sharer of her crinoline. This is certainly a most unhappy characteristic of gushing and youthful hearts, and deserves to be severely frowned upon and reprehended by all devout people of both sexes and of all ages, over forty; but yet we know it has been so from the beginning, and we greatly fear it will be so to the end of time—or at least until the arrival of Dr. Cumming's millerium.

Now, while every man of thirty and every woman of twenty know these things to be so, all men and women of forty know how often and how sadly the budding hope becomes wilted, the expectation is disappointed, the promise expressed or implied, is broken. This too, is a grievous and quite painful matter; but the first poet sang about it; and every poet and poetess since the first has continued the strain; and we fear that the last wail of the last singer will be a wail of blighted love.

Now, to return to the question involved: May a woman or a man (for both sexes must here be sternly placed on the same footing) to whom a promise or a prospect of marriage has been held out, kill, of his or her own motion, the party who fails to come to terms or to time? May she or he lay in wait with pistol or knife and deliberately proceed to butcher the erst dear one who has been or is imagined to be, guilty of the wrong?

There is no doubt that a portion of the American people believe that this is a right that belongs to at least one of the sexes. The lavish sympathy that has been bestowed upon Miss Harris, in Washington, the large number of grave Senators and eminent persons who rushed to her cell to condole with her misfortune, the eagerness of distinguished counsel to take up her defence gratuitously, and the sentimentalism of the local press while giving the details—all show that in this case, as in so many others, there is an abstract justification of deeds of this kind in women, apart altogether from the merits of the individual case; for in the instance now under notice there has been no proof whatever of Mr. Burroughs ever having made the promise which Miss Harris alleges he broke.

We imagine, however, that the principle is one whose practice by either sex is not apt to be conducive of the highest virtue, or the highest beauty, in women or men, or in the relations of the one to the other. If Miss Harris may be excused for killing Mr. Burroughs because he broke faith, then surely there would be palliation for the heart-broken widow in taking revenge, even unto death, upon the murderess who bereaved her of the husband she loved; and if on such a pretext as is put forth by Miss Harris, the law and public sentiment justify her deed, we may conclude that the sooner all and every law on such matters is declared null, and men and women are reverted to the original condition of self-defence and personal vengeance, the quicker will we arrive at a state of things which must speedily prove its own cure.—New York Weekly Review.

TENNYSON'S BARONETCY.

ENGLISHMEN are strangely inconsistent beings. The untrue report that Mr. Tennyson had accepted a baronetcy, offered him by the Queen was received in some quarters with a feeling amounting to disgust, and in all with the shade of annoyance which men feel when they hear of a clergyman acting charades, or a duke playing Aunt Sally, or a Pope escaping in the dress of a footman, or anything else which, while quite legitimate, suggests an idea of incongruity. Yet if personal titles have any value at all to the country which grants as well as to the individual who receives, surely no more fitting recipient could be found than a poet who is more likely than any living sovereign, and as likely as any living statesman, to give a name to the age. The theory of such distinctions as that they recognize cheaply but more honorable, services done to the State, to the people, or in rare and exceptional cases to mankind at large, that they set the doer of them, as it were, upon a pedestal, so that men may see, and seeing imitate him. There is no country on earth, whatever its form of government, in which such a practice does not prevail, the instinctive sense of mankind baffling sentiments as strong as the French admiration for external equality, and laws as carefully framed as those which in America provide against the creation of an aristocracy. In this country, moreover, owing partly to the antiquity of its social system, partly to the intense love of family, and partly to the absence of any form of State distinction at once highly honorable and limited to one life—Lord Palmerston's effort to create such a dignity having been defeated by Lord Derby—it is felt that the recognition should be enduring, should elevate the memory as well as the person of the individual chosen, should if possible mark out the descendants of the man as honorable because heirs of the man who once benefitted the country. Of course we all know that the theory and the practice do not always accord, that a Phipps and a Havelock sometime appear in the same Gazette; that this man becomes a baronet because lead mining is vastly profitable, and that, because he gave up a seat very much required by the Government of the day; that one member is made an Irish peer because he has been useful to the Treasury, and another because he had an estate in Ireland with a great many voters upon it, but that is the theory of the practice. Well, if it is a sound one—and it is defensible, if only for the variety it introduces into society, the sort of color and vibration it produces in a picture otherwise too drab-colored and motionless—it is obviously wise as well as just to recognize all forms of service, to assimilate into the old system the new forces which time has developed. People see that clearly enough when the service is something tangible, ponderable, to be expressed in money, or defined in a short speech. Nobody objected to the elevation of Richard Arkwright, who had enabled England to win an industrial campaign, any more than if he had won a battle or bombarded a city; or of the first Peel, who showed the way to vast multiplication of wealth; or of Sir M. Peto, who built a parcel of gunboats when they were wanted; or of the half-dozen engineers and contractors who have been decorated for conquering nature in pursuit of their own fortunes; or of Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, who simply gave away more than anybody except a Mr. Peabody or a Duke of Northumberland ever does. The service in all these cases is tangible, visible, susceptible of description, but it is not more real, is rather less real, than that performed for the country by its writers, thinkers and poets. The chiefs of literature do at least as much for a people as the "captains of industry," and have besides this additional claim, that their work does not of itself produce the reward of which the great mill-owner, or contracting engineer, or even discoverer, is so sure. A man may advance the good government of mankind a century or two as Bentham did, or propagate a doctrine which produces millions in actual cash result as Adam Smith did, or purify the whole tone of a nation's thought as Wordsworth undoubtedly did, or hammer political speculation into the hardness necessary to practical work as Carlyle is held by his admirers to have done, without gaining more than the means of existence for himself. The modern world is ruled by forces which these men set in motion, and if the theory of distinction is sound at all it applies to them, as of old days to the only motors those days possessed, warriors and statesmen. If it be wise to elevate the soldier who wins the cam-daign or the Minister who removes an obstacle from the national path, why not the thinker who smooths the way for both, the poet who so elevates thought as to make both more possible? Or if the perpetuation of the family of one who has done service is advisable—and it at all events holds up before the minds of men one unselfish object—why should not the race of the great poet be as distinctly marked as the sons of a great captain, whether in war or industry? The descendants of Raleigh will, it is argued, seek habitually a higher ideal than the descendants of John Smith—but what would be the ideal of the family of Shakspeare? Three generations hence, which will be the higher impulse, or the most worthy of public and inevitable recognition—to be the grandson of Alfred Tennyson or the grandson of Lord Gough? If it is well to mark officially every kind of first-class merit, if it is good that certain families among us should possess, in addition to all qualities a tradition of honor, if it is politic to bind every force to the support of the social system, surely it follows that titles are well bestowed when granted to a great poet.

And yet, despite all reasoning, and the fullest recognition of the right of literature to be put on the same pedestal as soldiery, or statesmanship, or industrial leading, we cannot put away the sense that the popular instinct is correct, that the annoyance felt by almost every competent admirer of Tennyson was justified by facts. There is an incongruity in rewarding a poet of his kind with purely artificial distinctions, in paying for services performed in the region of imagination a price which is wholly of earth, which we can best describe by an illustration. Imagine the same recognition accorded to the great theologian—Luther created a Knight of the Empire, or Jonathan Edwards invested with the Garter, or Mr. Maurice gazetted to a baronetcy! Yet the absurdity of thus repaying men for increasing the world's knowledge of things divine is scarcely greater or more offensive than that of acknowledging by a title the services which poets have wrought in the region of thought and fancy. Men feel instinctively that the divine seeks his reward from a source higher than earthly monarchs, and though the poet asks fame in this world either from his generation or posterity, still the recognition he craves is as invisible to the eye, as imponderable, as little within the gift of monarchs or their counsellors as that of the divine. It is not from Heaven it is to come, but still it is not from thrones. There have been poets perhaps who from the varied range of their minds, from their grasp over all mortal things, from the completeness, as it were, of their mental powers, might accept any conceivable rewards, however spiritual or however earthly, and make of them new powers. Had Shakspeare known that only to have done him an injustice would one day be a patent of nobility, that his name was destined to live forever, and his genius to influence the thought of endless generations of English-speaking men, that his phrases would pass into the language as integral components of speech, that among a people multiplied thirty-fold and spread over dominions three hundred-fold greater than those of his Sovereign he would be regarded as first among the uninspired writers, the knowledge would probably not have shaken the balance of his mind, would have tempted him only to care less for the saleability of his plays. Yet he would have made an excellent country baronet, have administered justice much better than the gentleman who imprisoned him and became by the act immortal, have managed an estate as assiduously as, and probably more profitably than, any peer of his time. Goethe actually was Minister of State for a little principality, and governed Weimar a great deal better than any absolutist since his time—but Tennyson? There may be, we think there is, a sensuous side to his genius, an appreciation of the things of earth akin to that of Goethe's, but his fame has been won and his true power lies in an atmosphere far higher than that, in the region where all things, baronetcies included, are rated at their absolute value, where, though there is no equality—which is never anywhere anything but an artificial creation of man—the lines of distinction are drawn on rules other than those which influence either kings or society. In literature, his true kingdom, Tennyson's rank is not precisely that of baronet. It is by his grade among poets, not at rich diners, that Tennyson must be estimated, it is the enduring love of all English minds, and not the breath of a Queen, which will crystallize his name. After all, why do we argue—did he not write this?

"In such discourse we gained the garden rails,
And there we saw Sir Walter where he stood,
Before a tower of crimson holly-hocks,
Among six boys, head under head, and looked
No little lily-handed Baronet he,
A great broad-shouldered genial Englishman,
A lord of fat prize-oxen and of sheep,
A raiser of huge melons and of pine,
A patron of some thirty charities,
A pamphleteer on guano and on grain,
A quarter-sessions chairman, abler none;
Fair-haired and redder than a windy morn;
Now shaking hands with him, now him, of those
That stood the nearest—now addressed to speech—
Who spoke few words and pithy, such as closed
Welcome, farewell, and welcome for the year
To follow."

There stands the true and typical baronet, a good man and a useful in his way, but between him and Alfred Tennyson there is a gulf no monarch's favor will or can ever bridge across. London Spectator.

GOODWIN & CO.,

HAVING RECEIVED AT THE

LATE MECHANICS' FAIR,

—THE—

First Premium,

—ON—

FURNITURE AND MATTRESSES,

Would advise our friends and patrons that we have a large stock of such

Consisting of

Furniture.

PARLOR, CHAMBER,

DINING ROOM AND

OFFICE FURNITURE,

In every variety, now on hand, and anticipating a change in our business, we will sell for CASH at LOWER PRICES than were ever offered on this coast.

N. B.—TO THE TRADE we offer an unusual variety extremely LOW PRICES.

GOODWIN & CO.,

no12

No. 528 Washington street

RUPTURE.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street, Between Montgomery and Kearny. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street. de3

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS offered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,

CHRETIEN PFISTER,

oe15-1f No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair, SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office,) SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Rodfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz.: Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballard's, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand. We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. ja8-3m

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, Etc.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

WILSON & EVANS, No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco, And 122 J street, Sacramento.

de3-3m

B. A. HENRICKSEN'SPATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Minturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of battling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shifts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Callhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN, No. 28 Third street, San Francisco, de17-3m

CALIFORNIAHome Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Deering, A. B. McCreery, C. Dunsen, C. J. Janson, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heyemann, R. G. Sheath, C. F. MacDermot, J. C. Wilnerding, Levi Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Thibault, S. Hemenway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.

B. F. LOWE, President.

JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5-3m

REMOVAL.INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.*THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Talbot & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U.S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. JWM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent. no19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE

COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $750,000

Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $600,000

Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,

MERCHANDISE,

FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents, 206 Front street, corner of California.

THE REASON WHY

EVERYBODY USES

THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED

ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,

OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper. Second—It is more effectual. Third—It saves labor.

Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally. Manufactory, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco, ja1-3m

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;

JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;

STEAMBOAT GIN;

OLD TOM GIN;

IRISH WHISKY,

from Bond direct.

For sale by

ja28-1f

V. SQUARZA,

44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera, and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S

no26

San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platinum, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anæsthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. de10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVALE. F. BUNNELL,*SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. de3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPHIN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.*DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. jul8

PHINEAS BANNING,FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT*WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

M. HARKINS,

MANUFACTURER OF

LADIES', MISSES', AND CHILDRENSBoots and Shoes.

Also, GENTLEMEN'S BOOTS, SHOES and SLIPPERS MADE TO ORDER.

No. 151 FOURTH STREET,

Second door above Howard, east side,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Repairing of all kinds neatly and promptly done.

ALTA MILLS,STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, - - - - - SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., - - - Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large: Hominy, Small: Oatmeal, Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order. de17-3m

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5-1f

J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,SAN JOSE.*GEORGE T. BROMLEY, Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms. ju25

CARRINGTON & CO'SGENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every description, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

*Who wants anything from New York?THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewellery, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture, in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam engine —a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10. from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

*Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.COMMISSION CHARGE, FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

au6

40 Broadway, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Sent and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By G. C. LETCHER, Deputy Clerk. Ch cC. Delany, Plt & Attc de24-3m

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - TREASURER.

GRAND COMBINATION OF TALENT!

LAST NIGHT OF

MISS MATILDA HERON,

Supported by

THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

This Saturday Evening, March 18th, 1865,

Will be presented the great Play of

G A M E A ;

OR, THE JEWISH MOTHER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, March 18th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

BY THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

The Farce of

THE SERIOUS FAMILY.

MONDAY EVENING,

First night of the Engagement of

MR. CHARLES WHEATLEIGH

—AND—

HARRY COURTAINE.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

A CURE FOR EVERY FORM OF

Pulmonary Complaint!

COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH, SPITTING OF BLOOD,
LIVER COMPLAINT, etc., etc.

Consumption,

Which carries off more victims than any other disease,
and which baffles the skill of the Physician to a greater extent than any other malady, often

YIELDS TO THIS REMEDY,

when all others prove ineffectual.

AS A MEDICINE,

Rapid in relief, soothing in effect, safe in its operation, it is

UNSURPASSED!

while as a preparation, free from noxious ingredients, poisons or minerals; uniting skill, science and medical knowledge, combining all that is valuable in the vegetable kingdom for this class of disease, it is

INCOMPARABLE!

and is entitled, merits and receives the enviable appella-
tion of the

INVALID'S FRIEND.

Sold by all druggists and by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,

mh4-tf

San Francisco.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE!

FORTY YEARS' EXPERIENCE

Has fully established the superiority of

Redding's Russia Salve.

Over all other preparations

FOR THE CURE OF

Scalds,

Burns, Cuts,

Flesh Wounds, Boils,

Chilblains, Blisters, Bruises,

Felon's, Piles, Erysipelas, Ulcers,

Salt Rheum, Injuries by Splinters, Warts,

Old Sores, Ring Worm, Frost-Bitten Parts,

AND ALL CUTANEOUS DISEASES AND ERUPTIONS

GENERALLY.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE

Is prompt in action, removes pain at once, and reduces the most angry-looking swellings and inflammations, as if by magic—thus affording relief and a complete cure.

FOR SALE EVERYWHERE.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

416 and 418 Front street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL.

Montgomery street between Pine and California.

THOMAS MAGUIRE, - - - - - Proprietor.
GEORGE H. COES, - - - - - Stage Manager.
B. P. ISAACS, - - - - - Musical Director.

GRAND REORGANIZATION OF THE

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Composed of the following talented artists:

P. B. Isaacs, George H. Coes,
A. J. Talbot, Mons. Charles,
Sig. Pinto, S. Washburg,
J. H. O'Neill, J. B. Howe,
Frank Medina, P. Loomis,
H. Groh,

Dress Circle and Parquet, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 25
cents extra; Private Boxes, $5.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock,
precisely.

Saturday afternoon performances by the Minstrels, at the Opera House.

CARPET CLEANING.

You can get your Carpets cleaned at the
STEAM-POWER CARPET Beating Machine for
Five Cents per Yard.

Orders left in our boxes, at the following places, will be promptly attended to:

Southeast corner Clay and Dupont streets.
Southeast corner Broadway and Dupont streets.
Northeast corner of Stockton and Jackson streets.
Southeast corner of Powell and Union streets.
Northwest corner of Taylor and Pacific streets.
Southwest corner of Bush and Stockton streets.
Northeast corner of Geary and Taylor streets.
Northwest corner of Kearny and Market streets.
Southeast corner of Howard and Third streets.
Northeast corner of Second and Folson streets.

Or at the Postoffice, or at Carnes' City Letter Express, 621 Montgomery street, directed to

J. SPAULDING & CO., 113 Fremont st.

feb11-3m.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COM-PANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of MARCH, 1865:

MARCH 23d, - - - - - CONSTITUTION.
From Folson-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall
by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspin-
wall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC
STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,

mh4

Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern my25

METALLURGIC INSTITUTE,

FIRST STREET,

McKibbin's Railing Works (up stairs.)

CONDUCTED BY

G. F. DEETKEN,

MINING ENGINEER.

The only Thorough Metallurgic and Engineering School on the Coast.

THEORETIC-PRACTICAL INSTRUCTION in Metallurgic
Roasting Operations, Amalgamation, Chlorination and Smelting of Gold and Silver Ores.

Also, on Mechanics, Mine Surveying, Topographic and Mechanical Drawing.

The attention of Superintendents of Mills and Mines is particularly directed to this excellent facility of acquiring
a thorough knowledge of Metallurgic operations.

fe25-tf

HOMESTEAD FOR SALE!

ANY PERSON DESIROUS OF PURCHASing a valuable HOUSE AND LOT at a bargain, for CASH, can bear of a chance, by applying immediately at the office of THE CALIFORNIAN. The property is within 10 minutes' walk of the corner of Clay and Montgomery streets, is in the southern part of the city, and in a neat private street and pleasant neighborhood. The House contains two Parlors (with sliding-doors, gas chandeliers and marble mantle), a dining-room and kitchen on the first floor, and four bed-rooms on the second. Planked yard, flowering vines, out-houses, etc. Water in three different places on the premises and gas fixtures all through the house. It is built in a thorough and substantial manner, and is now under a monthly rent of $50. Size of Lot, 24 feet, by 80 feet in depth. Title, PERFECT. Price, $3,500.
Satisfactory reasons for selling will be given to a purchaser by applying at above fe18-tf

CATHOLIC GIFTS,

IN GREAT VARIETY!

Consisting of—

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, CRUCIFIXES,
STATUARY, ENGRAVINGS,
MEDALLIONS, SILVER ROSARIES!

And a general assortment of CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

For sale by

MICHAEL FLOOD,

Catholic Bookseller,

de17-tf

No. 428 Kearny street, San Francisco.

P. J. WHITE & CO.,

SUCCESSORS TO ROUNTREE, BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN..

BUTTER, LARD, HAMS, BACON, PORK,

SUGAR, COFFEE, TEA, FLOUR,

And a general assortment of

GROCERIES,

Which are offered at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

NOS. 419 and 421 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Battery,

San Francisco.

Your trade is respectfully solicited. de10-tf

Tyler Brothers,

No. 632 Washington street, San Francisco,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

SCHOOL BOOKS, STATIONERY,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS, JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PIC-
TURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, Etc.

Especially attention given to

LADIES' STATIONERY,

Which we STAMP WITH INITIALS, to Order.

VISITING CARDS

ENGRAVED, WRITTEN, or PRINTED!

jn28-tf

THESE PLASTERS have the compact-
ness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove.
They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly hump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms.
For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm
or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak
back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases
they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

THOMAS ALLCOCK & CO.,

"Brandreth Building," New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S,

San Francisco.

Sold by all Druggists.

de17-3m

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION at LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition
from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says:
"Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that
of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my25

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

ly2

SAN FRANCISCO.

NEW BOOKS.

A. Roman & Co.,

HAVE RECENTLY received the following NEW PUBLICATIONS:

Chateau Frissac or Home Scenes in France. A new French Society Novel, by Olive Logan, author of "Photographs of Paris Life." 12mo.
The Morrisons. A story of Domestic Life, by Mrs. Margaret Hosmer. 12mo.
A Tribute to Thomas Starr King, by Richard Frothingham.
12mo.

The Perpetual Curate. A Novel by the author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," etc. Octavo.

The Three Scouts, by J. T. Trowbridge, author of "Cudjo's Cave," etc. 12mo.

Family Secrets. A companion to "Family Pride,"
"Pique," etc. 12mo.

Mattie. A Story, by the author of "High Church,"
"Owen," etc. Octavo.

My Brother's Wife. A Life History, by Amelia B. Edwards. Octavo.

Comparative Geography, by Carl Ritter, Professor of Geography in the University of Berlin, translated by Wm.
L. Gage. 12mo.

Saint Paul in Rome. Lectures delivered in the Legation of the United States at Rome, by Rev. C. M. Butler.
12mo.

Guizot's Meditations on the Essence of Christianity, and on the Religious Questions of the day. Translated under the supervision of the author. 12mo.

The Brother's Secret, by William Godwin. 12mo.

Banting's celebrated letter on Corpulency, with a review of the work from "Blackwood's Magazine" and an article on Corpulency and Leanness from "Harpers' Weekly." 8vo. Pamphlet.

My Own Story, by Marian Leigh. 12mo.

Autumn Leaves, by Samuel J. Gardner. 12mo.

Cousin Alice. A Memoir of Alice B. Haven. 12mo.

Love in Marriage. An Historical Study, by Guizot, translated from the French. 12mo.

Diary of Mrs. Kitty Trevelyan. A story of the Times of Whitefield and the Wesleys, by the author of the "Schonberg-Cotta Family." 12mo., etc., etc.

Our stock of STANDARD BOOKS in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE!

ART AND SCIENCE

is very complete, to which we invite the attention of the Public.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

mar18-tf

WARDS SHIRTS

THESE SHIRTS are too well known to need any comments. A trial will convince the most fastidious.

A full assortment of

GENTS' FINE FURNISHING GOODS.

S. W. H. WARD & SON,

NEW YORK,

387 Broadway.

323 Montgomery street,

San Francisco, Cal.

de31-3m

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened
for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro
Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf,
between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers
ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel
can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort,
cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of
families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil
of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance
of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor
hopes to merit the public patronage.

Terms easy.

fe18-tf

FRANK JOHNSON.

PIONEER CONFECTIONERY!

CANTY & WAGNER,

(SUCCESSORS TO J. REGAN.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL CONFECTIONERS,

113 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Between Bush and Sutter, - - - San Francisco.

N. B.—All CANDIES sold by us are warranted to be manufactured from Stewart's Double Refined Sugar, and to be equal to any manufactured in the State.

Goods delivered to any part of the city free of charge. Country orders promptly attended to. de3-3m

The Californian

"SURELY THERE IS
A VEIN FOR THE SILVER
AND A PLACE FOR GOLD
WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOLUME II., No. 17.
OFFICE, No. 328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 25, 1865.

TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE
50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

PROSE ARTICLES—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

LECTED:
Things—by "Inigo,"
Brass—by "Ego."
From a Young Barrister.
A Scene in Our Navy.
Our Interior Correspondence.
Our Agent on His Travels.
Editorial Paragraphs.
The Countess of Albany.
The Bells of Lara.
Calcraft the Hangman.
Poets-Laureate of England.
Recollections of a Dancer.
Golden Shot.

ONLY A CLOD—Miss Bradden's New Novel, Chapter XXI.

NEW BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S:
Notices of New Publications.

LOCAL AND INTERIOR ITEMS:
The News at Home and Abroad.

POETRY—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED:

The Oak—by Emilie Lawson.
The Mother's Grief—by Ina D. Cool-brith.
Why Mourn?—By C. H. Webb.
Tu Quoquo.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS:

A Condensation of the Telegraphic
War News of the Week.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP:

Special Correspondence of THE CALIFORNIAN.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

The Theatrical and Musical Events of the Week, and Announcements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from our Foreign and Domestic Exchanges.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

(For the Californian.)

THE MOTHER'S GRIEF.

SO fair the sun rose, yester-morn,
The mountain-cliffs adorning!
The golden tassels of the corn
Danced in the breath of morning;
The cool, clear stream that runs before,
Such happy words was saying;
And in the open cottage door
My pretty babe was playing.
Aslant the sill a sunbeam lay—
I laughed in careless pleasure,
To see his little hand essay
To grasp the shining treasure.

To-day no shafts of golden flame
Across the sill are lying;
To-day I call my baby's name,
And hear no lisped replying;
To-day—ah, baby mine, to-day—
God holds thee in His keeping!
And yet I weep, as one pale ray
Breaks in upon thy sleeping;
I weep to see its shining band
Reach, with a fond endeavor,
To where the little restless hands
Are crossed in rest forever!

INA D. COOLBRITH.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 25th, 1865.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, March 25th, 1865.

THE Dramatic Chronicle having already announced that I have retired from the editorial control of that sprightly and valuable little sheet, it is probably unnecessary that I say anything about the matter in this place. Even had the Chronicle been silent about my retracy, however, I fancy that its many subscribers would have discovered my absence in the great falling off of interest in its contents.

Do you know, I think that little thrust at me, to which reference is made, one of the neatest things of the season. Strangely enough there was no malice in the paragraph, notwithstanding its sharp fun; so I conclude that the writer must be blessed with as good a digestion as I myself possess.

For it has long been a favorite theory of mine that no one can be a good jester unless he be primarily a good digester. In the latter line I am hard to beat, possessing powers which are only equalled by quartz mills and not at all approached by ostriches; indeed I think I could even digest the Laws of California, rivalling in that respect T. H. Hitt-L— who by virtue of his works should have his name changed and the final letter doubled to read Hit-LLD!

Moreover, I have an excellent appetite, in proof of which when I went into Peter Job's with Fiametta, the other night, for a late-lunch, and called for a fancy roast, she immediately remarking that my order was not well considered, as JOB WAS EMINENT ONLY FOR HIS BOILS, I did not leave the table.

If any one thinks that I can't mention any number of well-to-do men in town who would have folded up their napkins under the circumstances and quietly stolen away with them, they can win money of me. For instance: John Kelly, Harry Gregory, Rufus Canfield, Samuel Blaisdell, Li-Po-Tai, Mr. Piper, Canavan, Chief Burke, Mr. Bacon, "and 2,000 others" would have immediately got up and got—and it is not at all questionable whether or not they would have taken a few spoons with them.

For I hold that if men are too delicate to stand the Pacific Anatomical Museum, they are too delicate to stand anything in life. A more high-toned, thoroughly correct and continent exhibition was never opened on this continent, and my only surprise is that certain designing and malicious persons have been permitted to make a raid upon the proprietors. Talk of the persecution of the Jews, there never was anything in history to equal the wrongs which have been heaped upon these lineal descendants of that ingenious and peculiar people who many years ago attempted to palm off hyssop and vinegar for wine.

No parent should lose the opportunity of taking his children there at the earliest possible moment, and afternoon performances should be given for the benefit of families. Daughters would be particularly edified, especially if possessed of an enquiring turn of mind, and sons could not fail to be amused as well as instructed. It would materially enhance the general effect of the exhibition could the proprietors be secured and enclosed carefully in glass cases, but in the absence of this desideratum to see them roaming around among the "lifo like figures," which go to make up the collection has an almost equally salutary and pleasant effect.

Differing on this question from the position THE CALIFORNIAN has editorially taken, I here avow my conviction that morality is on the Wax in this community, in proof of which I refer sceptics to the florid Forentine Venus; and if the City would only purchase the whole collection for the adornment of the rooms where the Board of Supervisors meet, I do think the purposes of justice and humanity would be materially subserved.

If the respectable gentlemen who brought the show here are desirous to sell out, I haven't a doubt that a sale might be engineered to the city very comfortably. Of course none of the twelve who have a voice in such matters could be bought or bribed to lend their aid in passing any bill or purchase through, but I have lately discovered that some of them are not opposed to receiving presents when offered to them as citizens and not in their official capacity as Supervisors. There are an hundred thousand citizens in town who probably would not object to being complimented in some such manner, and I am one of them. For the distinction between being bribed and accepting a present of money, is broad and obvious. I, for instance, am a scribe; it is my duty to write for several influential journals in this city, and in Australia, England and Ireland, to say nothing of the Victoria Chronicle, to which latter paper my contributions over the signature of "Enrybo" have always been a marked feature and are at present creating a deal of attention. Suppose a case: an actor comes to me and says: "Inigo, I am not appreciated as I should be; write me up." I do write him up—in fact, set him write side up. And he, in his gratitude, presents me, not with a ring, a pin, a faded flower or a lock of his hair, but with a purse containing two hundred and fifty dollars in jingling gold coin—who then can say that I have been bribed or bought.

I wish some one would come and make me the offer—that's all. Really I am afraid that the mistaken impression which has got abroad relative to my honesty, will keep me poor all my life. In order to correct it I here publish and proclaim that my pen is at the service of any one who chooses to employ it, actor, artist, author, or codfish-monger—only I wish one thing distinctly understood, lest mistakes should occur: having no prejudices in the matter I should prefer to have the price I am to receive fully understood before starting in, and to prevent any possibility of a wrangle occurring at settlement time I should insist upon pay in advance.

For I do love money with a love which passes the love of woman, and just at the present time I am particularly in want of any amount—the larger the better. Tell of people being robbed; I only wish some one would rob me on halves. There is another assessment levied upon the mine in which I am interested, and I am anxious to pay it as soon as possible, for I am curious to see how soon they can levy another one.

The trustees and stockholders at the present time are engaged in a generous rivalry as to which can devote the most time to the interests of the company, the trustees giving every spare moment to the levying of assessments while the stockholders occupy all their leisure hours with paying them.

Just now the advantage lies with the trustees, and I fear it will continue with them to the end, for they seem to "hold the age"—that it is not a golden age for us on the outer edge of the ring is plain enough to the apprehension of any one accustomed to reason from facts.

My faith in "assays" is considerably shaken. Originally I fancy that regarding the richness of some undiscovered and undeveloped mine a superintendent must have written "an ass says so and so." A near-sighted secretary, who had not the courage to assess the company for the amount necessary to buy him a pair of eye-glasses, in reading the letter to a meeting of the Board interpreted the passage, "it assays so and so"—hence the unfortunate phrase which has beguiled and ruined so many. Professor Silliman capped the climax of assays with his report on Sheba—should that be printed as Professor Solomon's report on the Queen of Sheba, do not hold me responsible for the error.

What a jolly time the petroleum sharps who are coming out here from the East will have boring for oil! Were the whole world carefully searched over, it is questionable whether a better place to bore for oil than this coast affords could be found. For it is my opinion that those who are industriously disposed can commence at any hour in the day, and keep boring on as long as they please, without finding anything to interrupt their progress until they pierce the Tartarean tiles in some profound depth and the points of their drills are melted in the furnaces of Phlegethon.

Commencing with peat on the surface, down in the region just indicated any amount of saltpetre-oleum would probably be found, but the chances are that it would be too hot to be conveniently barrelled. St. Peter-oleum might possibly be struck if looked for in a higher level, but as for the real petroleum I fear the prospects of finding it will peter out finally, and that the hopes of adventurers will sink faster than their wells do.

Will cheese and butter ever be found in the earth's remote cellars? There is no reason why they should not be, for they both come from grass—grass is one of the earth's products, and finding it on the surface may surely be looked upon as an "indication." If a man found a crop of lamp-wick growing on his ranch he would at once conclude that oil lay beneath and demand a fabulous price for his property, and why may not the other sign hold equally good?

As developments show at present, it will soon be impossible to sink a shaft anywhere in the sand hills without finding a deposit of dead bodies, for horrors multiply day by day. There was a time when the digger after yams stood a chance of turning up only a dead baby or two in his garden, but now the remains of full grown men reward the diligent spade. When it is considered that within the past two years three murders and several robberies have been committed in the very heart of the city without the authors being apprehended, it is scarcely to be wondered at that murderers have now grown so bold as to go to their bloody work without even taking common pains to conceal their tracks. Warned by the result of this thoughtlessness in a late instance, they will probably be more careful in future.

INIGO.

A cry in which social spies should feel at home—Pekin.

WHY MOURN?

THE golden grain
Is ripened but to death;
And Summer's leaves
Must fall with Autumn's breath.

For all things die:
Behold! the marble urn
That shrines our dust
Shall crumble in its turn.

We mourn the Young;
They perish as the flowers,
Whose petals scarce
Have kissed Love's rosy hours.

We mourn the Old,
Who vanish from our sight
As Summer days
That fade in lengthened light.

A selfish grief:
They fall not as the leaves,
But ripened grain,
And angels bind the sheaves.

An aged friend
Whose years were as a crown,
But yester-night
Unto the grave went down.

As sinks the sun
Low-curtained in the West,
Its journey done:
So went he to his rest.

No warring strife:
And when had ceased his breath,
It was not Life—
You scarce could call it Death.

A soft-sealed smile
Fell like a sunbeam's play,
As though the soul
At parting kissed its clay.

The lines that Time
Upon the brow had traced,
Death's gentle hand
With kindly touch effaced.

So calm—so still
The peace that veiled the dead:
Were Death not mute,
Those parted lips had said:

O ye that mourn,
A selfish grief ye give;
Restrain your tears
To pour for those that live!

C. H. WEBB.

(For the Californian.)

A SCENE IN OUR NAVY.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A SAILOR—THE MORTAR FLOTILLA IN THE SOUTHWEST PASS—DRUNKEN OFFICERS, ETC.

I HAVE been in the Navy. Served my three years like a man, before the mast, at twenty dollars per month (in greenbacks) and a ration a day. More: I served in the mortar fleet under the gallant Porter who also served under Farragut, and I took part in the capture of New Orleans.

What I am about to relate took place before the bombardment; and I believe that this narrative will make the hair stand on end upon the head of many an old veteran, (perhaps on that of Farragut himself—for I doubt if he ever heard a detailed account of the affair,) when he sees related therein the great lack of discipline that flourished in the so-called Mortar Flotilla throughout the Mississippi campaign.

Be it understood that nothing in this article is meant to reflect upon the conduct of the volunteer officers who for the most part had charge of the vessels comprising the mortar fleet. A braver set of men never trod a vessel's deck. But I shall say enough to convince the most skeptical that except in vessels commanded by regular naval officers, there was a great lack of discipline, an almost entire absence of military rules and a familiarity between officers and men hardly to be believed. The story is actually true, to the writer's own knowledge, and written now from notes taken during his service.

The mortar fleet arrived at the mouth of the Mississippi river in the early part of March, 1862, and some of the vessels took their position above Pilot Town, in the Southwest Pass. The fleet was divided into three divisions: the Minx, (for obvious reasons I substitute fictitious names for the real ones, but the facts which I narrate may be relied upon,) on which the occurrence about to be related took place, belonged to the second, and was commanded by Acting Master Malt of Brooklyn, N. Y., who formerly had charge of a three-masted schooner that traded between Liverpool and New York. He was a short, thickset man, with large, round head and coarse features—a thorough sailor, but sadly in want of that education which would fit a man for a responsible command. He was a jolly fellow withal, who cared for no man, and, in his own parlance, "would go to the devil for whisky." The complement of the vessel's crew was forty-two men before the mast; the Acting-Master, three Acting-Master's mates, a medical officer and the Paymaster's clerk.

The senior master's mate, whom we will call Snarlem, was a fair specimen of what is known among sailors as a "Liverpool Irishman;" he had been in the "Black Ball line," and was a rough, ignorant, uncouth fellow, whom nobody liked. The second master's mate, named Pain, was a harmless, good-natured, half-witted sort of a fellow, from some place in Connecticut. He had made but one voyage before in his life, that from New Haven to New York, and how he obtained his appointment in the navy is best known to those who gave him his warrant. The third was a fellow named Gnat—a low, cowardly specimen of humanity, possessed scarcely of sufficient brains to be safely trusted to himself.

I think it was the morning of the 8th March that the Second Division was ordered to sail up the river to take its position for the bombardment of Fort Jackson. Just before this signal was made, the bark Houghton, the storeship of the fleet, had arrived. The captains of the Minx and the Snail, (Capt. Crane) who were great chums, went on board this vessel, and, while there, their respective schooners, under the direction of the executive officers, were getting under way. When they returned on board their own vessels they were somewhat the worse for frequent imbibitions of whisky. Malt immediately ordered the Paymaster's clerk to get up the whisky tub and "splice the main brace." Not only all the crew but all the officers, Malt included, took their "tod;" and when it had gone round once, Malt ordered the Paymaster to commence again, he with the rest of the officers taking a hand this time as well as before. When every man on the ship had drank twice, the captain asked them if they would like to have any more. Three or four came up and took their third drink. The schooner was then got under way and sailed along with a good fresh breeze up the river. Now, it was the pride of Capt. Q., (the division commander) to do everything in regular naval style. He therefore made the signal that the vessels should sail according to their numbers. (Every vessel had a large white number on her quarter.) The Minx was No. 9. When the vessels had arrived at the anchoring place, Capt. Q. signalled to anchor in the order in which they sailed, bringing No. 9 astern of the division flagship No. 8, No. 10 astern of No. 9, etc. Instead of observing this, Malt anchored abreast of the Swan, and the Snail came up abreast the Minx. No sooner had he dropped anchor than Malt called away his boat and went aboard the vessel of his chum—the Snail. In the mean time, Capt. Q., seeing how his orders had been disobeyed, called his boat and went alongside the Minx, where he sang out for Malt; but the executive officer, Snarlem, informed him the Captain was on board the Snail. Capt. Q., in great anger, then ordered Snarlem to hoist the anchor and drop the vessel astern. He then pulled for the Snail where was our friend Captain Malt. He called Capt. Crane: "Did I not tell you, sir," he said angrily, "to anchor astern of No. 10? Instead of that you have anchored abreast of No. 9, and thereby blocked the whole river."

Captain Crane made some excuse in rather an independent manner, upon which Capt. Q. replied: "Capt. Crane, consider yourself under arrest. Go below and let Mr. Hatch take charge of your vessel."

On hearing this sentence pronounced against his friend, Malt, who was still drunk as a fiddler, went to the gangway and shouted: "Capt. Q., if you put Capt. Crane under arrest, you've got to put me there, too. I'm in the same boat."

Had a lightning bolt fallen at the feet of Capt. Q. he could not have been more astonished. When he found speech, he thundered out: "Capt. Malt, go on board of your own vessel, and consider yourself off duty. Mr. Snarlem will take charge of your vessel till further orders!"

"Ay, ay, sir," replied Malt, upon which, he got into his boat, went on board of the Minx; related to Mr. Snarlem what had occurred; told him that he (Snarlem) was, till further orders, commanding officer, and cordially invited the Paymaster and Doctor to go below and take a "nip."

The next day when he was sober, he took council with his friend the Doctor, as to the course he had better pursue. "You see, Doctor," said the Captain, in explanation, "I have run agin Q. so often, that he'll shelve me; and, although I want to go home, I don't wish to be sent home in disgrace, nohow. What would you advise me to do?"

The Doctor looked grave, and advised him to send in his resignation. "I'll do it," said Malt, "but you must write it out for me."

To this the Doctor consented. He wrote out Malt's resignation, got that worthy to sign it, and sent it to Capt. Porter through Capt. Q.

On the morning of the 12th, Malt received an official letter from Capt. Porter, ordering him to report to the Captain of the Connecticut, for passage to New York, (that vessel was to sail the following day,) and then report in writing to the Secretary of the Navy.

Malt called the Doctor. "What's the meaning of this?" said he, handing that gentleman the document.

"It means," answered the Doctor gravely, "that as far as Porter is concerned, your resignation is accepted. He has given him the whys and wherefores, with a request that it be accepted, and that you get your discharge from the service!"

"Well, then, I guess the best thing I can do is to pack up my dunnage and go on board the Connecticut."

Malt then called Snarlem and said: "Snarlem, I'm to be sent home on board the Connecticut. As this is the last day I shall probably be with these boys, do me a favor and order up the grog-tub, that they may drink my health before I go."

"Splicing the main brace" was equally as pleasant a "ship's duty" to Snarlem as it was for Malt or the crew; the tub was therefore brought up, and placed in the forward cabin, and the crew invited to come and drink. The liquor was measured out to them without stint; some taking two and some three drinks. This was about 10 o'clock, A. M.

Now Malt, although as I have before said a very rough man, was very much liked by the crew, while Snarlem was generally disliked. They were therefore afraid that if he were sent home, Snarlem would have command of the vessel, in which event anything but pleasant times would be in store for them. So they proposed, that, with the consent of Malt, the petty officers should go to Capt. Q. and petition for Malt's reinstatement in command and the rescinding of the order, sending him home.

The chief in this movement, was the boatswain's mate, James Long. He was a tall, stout, good-looking fellow, as smart a sailor and as good a gunner as there was in the fleet, and generally looked up to by the crew as their natural leader. He therefore went to Malt, told him what had been proposed by the crew, and requested his consent. Malt was nothing loth to be again in command. He knew that we were on the eve of a battle, and he did not like the idea of being sent home in disgrace, without partaking in "the fun." He therefore readily consented; so Long and three or four others got a boat and pulled for the division flagship.

In the meantime, the news had spread through the fleet that Malt was going home, and several masters of the mortar schooners came on board to bid him good by. Of course an immense amount of drinking was done, and Malt was, in the course of another half hour, pretty well "how-came-you-so."

At about half-past 11, the deputation of petty officers returned to the vessel. Long, the spokesman reported in substance as follows: Capt. Q. had received them kindly, and had listened patiently to their story; stated that he was very sorry that things stood as they did with regard to Malt; that he would rather lose any other of his acting masters than him, and wound up by sending the deputation to see Porter, stating, that if Capt. Porter would look over the matter and reinstate Malt he would have no objection.

Off started the indefatigable Long and his messmates to Porter. The latter after hearing the whole story, stated that he had no objection in the world, but would leave the whole matter in the hands of Capt. Q.

Upon Long's return to Capt. Q. with Porter's answer, Q. said he would send a definite reply on board the Minx in about half an hour. Had Malt been but half sober he would now have sent the men below; but, drunk as he was, he plied Long with liquor, until that worthy was as drunk as himself.

The half-hour elapsed, but no boat had come from the flagship. Long, therefore, came to Snarlem and requested permission to go again on board for the answer. But Snarlem saw in what condition Long then was, and knowing that he would be blamed if he allowed a drunken petty officer to go on board of the flagship, refused.

"Why not?" queried Long.

"Because you are not in the condition to go. You are drunk."

Long reported back to Malt what Snarlem had said. Upon which Malt put on his coat, went on deck, and swore that he would take command of the vessel in spite of Snarlem. He therefore called away a boat and ordered Long and his associates to get into it.

At this juncture, Snarlem, who with the doctor and paymaster's clerk was writing in the forward cabin, took his revolver and went on deck.

"If any man attempts to leave this vessel without my permission," he said doggedly, "I'll blow his brains out. You, Capt. Malt, have nothing to say in this vessel until further orders from Capt. Q. Until then, I am commanding officer here. Besides," pointing to Long, "that man is drunk, and is not in a fit condition to leave the vessel."

"You lie!" shouted Long, coming up on the poop.

"If you say another word I'll put you in irons," said Snarlem.

Upon this Long, with a fearful oath, rushed upon Snarlem and grasped him by the throat. The latter endeavored to use his revolver, when Malt rushed upon him also, and the three went rolling along the deck, clasped in each other's embrace, swearing, kicking and struggling.

At this juncture, the second officer, Pain, who had been plying all the morning between the mortar schooners and the Connecticut, came on board. He likewise was drunk.

Seeing a fight, without waiting to know any particulars, he shouted: "If this is a free fight, I'm going to have a hand in, too!"

Running for his revolver, (he was in his shirt-sleeves,) he rushed into the melée, and soon the four were struggling along the deck—one indistinguishable mass.

The third officer, Gnat, was below. Being sober, it was clearly his duty to have gone on deck, called the crew to his assistance, and arrested the four. But he was afraid to act, and all the entreaties of the Doctor and Paymaster could not prevail upon him to move. He positively refused to do anything, saying he was not then officer of the deck, and it was none of his business.

All this took place in far less time than it takes to write it. When the row had continued three or four minutes, Gnat still refusing to do anything in the premises, the Doctor went aft, hoisted the ensign, union down, (the signal of mutiny,) and shouted out to the other vessels for assistance. In a moment the river was alive with boats filled with armed men making their way to the vessel. When Gnat heard this he called for a boat, pulled for Capt. Q., whom he met half-way, and told him what had occurred.

In the meantime several officers of the other vessels had come on board, and instantly all was quiet on the Minx. Malt had "put" over the lee gangway into a boat and pulled for a friendly schooner. Snarlem, with a face that very much resembled a beefsteak after undergoing the pounding process, was down below in one of the state-rooms, and Pain, still luxuriating in his shirt-sleeves, was walking fore-and-aft on the main deck, cursing, swearing and expounding. Long had mysteriously disappeared.

When Q. stepped on board, he found the poop crowded with officers, among whom were Porter, and the now much-lamented, gallant Renshaw. One of the officers had been below, put a pair of handcuffs upon the wrists of Snarlem, and turned the key of the stateroom upon him. Porter immediately commanded silence and demanded an explanation of the affair. This was given by the Doctor, who rather maliciously gave great prominence to the cowardly inactivity of Gnat.

Porter walked up and down the poop for several seconds, when he suddenly asked: "Where is Capt. Malt?"

"On board the mortar-schooner Warrior," was the answer of one of the master's mates.

"Captain Q.," said Porter, with ominous sternness, "get a file of marines and take Malt from the Warrior to the Connecticut; should he give you the slightest trouble, cut him down! Tell Snarlem to pack up his clothes immediately and go on board the Connecticut."

While Porter was giving these orders, our friend Pain took charge of the main deck, using language that was by no means in place on board a vessel of war. At last he attracted Porter's attention: "Who is that fellow?" he demanded sternly.

"It is Mr. Pain, sir, second officer of this vessel."

"Put him in irons," was Porter's mandate. Not so easily done as said, for Pain kicked and wrestled for some time before they could get the irons on. At last, when they thought they had him securely handcuffed, and were leading him to a boat, he abruptly turned on them, his hands free from the handcuffs, which had been improperly fastened, and cried: "You're a pretty set of wretches to put handcuffs on me, ain't you? Why, I could go to work and throw you all overboard!"

Q. was standing quite near Pain, when the latter delivered this harangue. His patience and good-temper were by this time nearly exhausted. Seizing Pain by the collar and shaking him, not very tenderly, he exclaimed:

"You mutinous rascal, if you say another word I'll have you gagged."

"Here," returned Pain, saucily, "take your hand off my collar, you'll tear it; don't you see it's a paper one?"

With a kick from Q. and a pull from half-a-dozen rough hands, Pain was huddled into the boat and carried off to the Loughton. In the meantime a search had been instituted for the boatswain's mate, Long, who was found in the cockpit, perfectly insensible. He was put in irons and carried to Porter's own vessel.

When these different arrangements had been completed, Porter turned to Gnat, and in a tone of the greatest contempt said: "You're a pretty fellow to be an officer in my fleet! You are worse than any of them! Go below, sir! I'll keep my eye on you for some time!"

After placing new officers on board the Minx, Porter and the rest retired to their respective vessels and once more the usual quiet was restored to the fleet.

Although in none of the vessels was the breach of military etiquette carried so far as on board the Minx, yet this description is but an exaggerated picture of many others. Nevertheless, when in action they were as brave as veterans, and showed examples of courage and endurance well worthy of imitation.

Most of those who were concerned in this affray have left the service, and the incorrigible Malt is once more plying the waters of the broad Atlantic, in the mercantile service.

W.

THE COUNTESS OF ALBANY.

WE doubt very much whether the history of the Countess of Albany, or even her name, is generally known to the great mass of the reading public, though she was so closely connected with the last scion of the royal House of the Stuarts. She was the wife of the Pretender, who, after his well-known adventures and failure in 1745, in the attempted recovery of the British Crown, took up his residence in Paris, where he was received with great distinction, both by the Court party as well as by the population in general. But he was not allowed to remain for any considerable time undisturbed in his place of retirement. His expulsion from the French territory was made one of the conditions of the treaty of peace in 1748, concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle. Charles Edward positively refused to leave the country, and much interest in his behalf was made with the Government, both by the Dauphin and other members of the Royal Family, to allow him to remain. But the interference was of no avail; the administration proved inexorable. The Pretender was seized in the Opera House on the 11th of December, 1748, conveyed in the first instance to Vincennes, and from thence was sent out of the country. He wandered about the Continent for some time, and it is supposed that he secretly visited London in the year 1750. When subsequently allowed to return again to France, Charles Edward was so dispirited and depressed by his wanderings and misfortunes that he fell into the habit of intemperance, of which mention is made in one of the despatches of the British Ambassador Stanley, who, writing from Paris in 1761, states that the Pretender was given to drinking to such an excess as to be often drunk in the morning, and carried senseless to his chamber by his attendants.

By the death of his father in 1766 he became titular King of England, but the elevation to the fictitious dignity did in no wise cure him of his inveterate propensity to intoxication; and the French Government, seemingly ashamed of their royal guest, drove him in 1770 once more from their soil. In the following year, however, it suited the policy of the French ministry—as a kind of demonstration or menace against England—to recall the Pretender to the capital of France, and he was informed by the Duke of Fitzjames, on behalf of the French Court, that if he would consent to be married to a wife chosen for him, a pension of 240,000 francs would be settled upon him. Charles Edward made no objection to the proposal, and the lady thus chosen was Louise, the daughter of the Prince of Stolberg-Gedern, a member of one of the most ancient and distinguished German families, raised to the princely rank in the person of his father. Her mother, too, was of a most noble family, of the illustrious House of Horn, maternally allied to the Bruces of Scotland and to other distinguished families, both in France and in the Low Countries.

The Princess Louise, born September 20th, 1752, lost her father, a general in the Austrian service, when she was in her sixth year. Her widowed mother received a pension from the Empress Maria Theresa, and she was placed in the educational establishment for young ladies of the highest rank of nobility, at Mons, in the Austrian Netherlands. Here she remained until her twentieth year, when she was married to Charles Edward, who was then fifty-two years of age.

The marriage was celebrated at Macerata, in the private chapel of Cardinal Marefoschi's palace, on the 17th of April, 1772, that day being Good Friday—a circumstance which elicited, some years after, the remark from Louise, the Countess of Albany, that her marriage proved what a marriage on such a day—"a day of Christendom's lamentation"—might have been expected to turn out. The newly married couple arrived, five days after their marriage, at Rome, where they were received with something like royal honors, though, on the part of the Papal Court, no formal notice was taken of the Pretender's announcement to Cardinal Pallavicini, the Secretary of State, of the arrival of the King and Queen of England. The title, however, under which the royal pair was better known was that of the Count and Countess of Albany. The Countess is described as a woman of most dazzling beauty, of great powers of conversation, and as turning everybody's head. Their residence in Rome proving disagreeable, owing to their equivocal position, they retired early in the year 1773 to Sienna, and in October of the following year they took up their abode in Florence. Soon after his arrival in that city, Charles Edward's health gave way, he was seized with symptoms of dropsy, his old habits of intemperance had gained a greater ascendancy, and he was almost confined to his apartment. He required the Countess, whether from helplessness or from jealousy, to be in constant attendance upon him, an office which she fulfilled with every mark of propriety and attention.

It was at this period, in the autumn of 1777, that the poet Alfieri arrived in Florence. It were beside our present purpose to draw a biographical sketch of this renowned tragic writer, beyond observing that he was a Piedmontese by birth, of a noble family, of independent fortune, and of a most impressionable temperament. He set out on his travels when he was but seventeen years of age, and found himself very soon engaged in amatory adventures. In Holland he fell in love with a young married woman, who appeared not altogether insensible to the advances of the youthful Italian; but the suspicions of the husband being awakened, and all further intercourse broken off, the poet became so very much affected that it was necessary to bleed him; and he was with difficulty restrained from tearing off the bandages and wilfully bleeding to death. In England a somewhat similar adventure was attended with graver circumstances. Alfieri had fallen in love with the wife of a peer, who returned his passion and admitted him into her house. The intrigue was discovered to the husband, who challenged the poet; they fought in the Green Park; Alfieri, being ignorant of the use of arms, was speedily wounded in the arm. His antagonist, declaring himself satisfied, assured the poet that he would no longer stand in his way of free access to the lady, as he intended to be speedily divorced from her. The ardent lover, as may be supposed, made no delay in offering his hand to the object of his passion. But on the third day after the duel, the lady frankly told him, that previously to their acquaintance she had bestowed her favor on a groom still in her husband's service, and that this man, in a fit of jealousy, had betrayed both intregues to her lord. Alfieri, though at first greatly staggered, mortified, and full of resentment—and the more so as the whole affair, the duel, the intrigues, appeared in the newspapers—was nevertheless so full of infatuation that he clung to his paramour, and travelled about with her for some time. He was made the defendant in the subsequent proceedings for a divorce; and we may here mention, considering the lapse of time, the names of the parties. The peer was Lord Ligonier, and his frail partner Penelope, daughter of George Lord Rivers.

We know not the precise period at which Alfieri parted from his paramour, but we know that not very long after his arrival in Florence he became acquainted, through the agency of a friend, with the young and fair Countess of Albany. He states that he had not gone many times to see her before he felt himself, as it were, unconsciously caught, and agitated by a passion of the mind to which he had heretofore been a stranger, and the more profound and lasting in proportion as it was less impetuous and fervent. "Such was the flame," he says, "which little by little got the upper hand of my every thought and feeling, and will never be extinguished in me but with my life."

It can hardly be questioned that the Countess reciprocated Alfieri's passionate feelings, and allowed him to take an active part in her separation from her husband. This occurred in the month of December, 1780. It was the custom of the Pretender, on St. Andrew's day, to indulge to the greatest excess in drinking; and in a fit of intoxication he committed a most brutal assault on his wife, beating her at night and in bed, and attempting to strangle her. Making her case known to the Grand Duke, she was advised by the Tuscan Court, in concurrence with the opinion of the Pretender's own brother, Cardinal York, that she should throw off her worthless husband for ever, and retire into a convent. Alfieri assisted in her removal; and Charles Edward declared that he would give a thousand zechins to anybody who would kill the gentleman who assisted his wife on that occasion. Alfieri, in referring to the Countess's removal, observes: "Suffice it to say that I saved my lady from the tyranny of an irrational and constantly drunken master, without her honor being in any way whatever compromised, nor the proprieties in the least transgressed." There are, however, some historical writers who cast considerable doubt on the purity of their intercourse from the beginning. The present Lord Stanhope, in his "History of England from the Peace of Utrecht," remarks: "The Count and Countess of Albany lived together during several years at Florence, a harsh husband and a faithless wife; until at length, in 1780, weary of restraint, she eloped with her lover Alfieri." We doubt whether this allegation is borne out by facts; for her removal to the convent, under the immediate protection of the Grand Duchess, can hardly be designated an elopement; and her subsequent retirement to Rome was in accordance with the advice of her brother-in-law the Cardinal, and under the sanction of the papal Nuncio. Her removal to Rome took place at the end of December, 1780; and we are told by an historian of the period that she was treated with the greatest respect by Cardinal York, who frequently invited her to his residence at Frascati.

Alfieri did not immediately follow the object of his passion to Rome; he tarried for a while—perhaps to save appearances—at Florence, but after a short interval he set out for Naples, passing through the Eternal City on his way. He remained but a few days in Rome, during which he contrived to have a brief interview with the Countess, and of which he speaks in these terms: "I saw her a prisoner behind a grating—less vexed, however, than I had seen her at Florence, but for other reasons I did not find her less unhappy. We were completely separated, and who could say for how long we were so?"

Alfieri's restless spirit did not allow him to remain for any length of time at Naples; he speedily found his way back to Rome, and passed most of his evenings with the Countess, and with whom he was occasionally seen in public. This extreme intimacy of the two parties, "although," as Alfieri assures us, "it did not exceed the bounds of honor," created the greatest scandal in Roman society—otherwise not very fastidious in regard to such matters; and the Pretender, aroused from his fits of drunkenness to a sense of his supposed dishonor, with the assistance of his brother the Cardinal, laid his grievance before the Pope, by whose order Alfieri was commanded to leave Rome within fifteen days. In pursuance of such order the poet left the city for Sienna, on the 4th of March, 1783, declaring that he was at his departure "like one stupid and deprived of sense; leaving his only love, books, town, peace, and his very self in Rome." During his separation, however, he carried on a steady and regular correspondence with the Countess, who reciprocated all his tender effusions. His banishment from Rome terminated in the summer of 1784, when, through the mediation of the King of Sweden, it was arranged that a formal separation should take place between the Countess and her besotted husband. Accordingly, a legal instrument was executed, signed by herself, Charles Edward, the Cardinal, and attested by the Pope; in conformity to which she relinquished her pin-money as a return for an amicable divorce à mensa et thoro, and to be at perfect liberty to select her own place of residence for the future.

Nor was it long before the Countess made the fullest use of her newly acquired freedom; she met Alfieri at Colmar, in Alsace, where they passed two months together. At the end of this period, and as winter was approaching, she returned to Italy, taking up her abode at Bologna; while Alfieri remained for a time at Pisa, not being allowed to enter the papal territory. In the ensuing summer they met again at Colmar, from which place, after a brief sojourn, she removed to Paris, whence in the autumn of 1786 she returned to Colmar, accompanied by Alfieri.

Shortly after his separation from his wife in July, 1784, Charles Edward, whether to annoy the Countess or from a feeling of remorse, publicly acknowledged his natural daughter by Miss Walkingshaw, sending for her from the convent in which she was brought up, installing her as mistress of his family, and conferring upon her the title of Duchess of Albany. Her society, however, tended in no degree to soften or to mitigate the brutal and intemperate habits of her father; on the contrary, as he grew older he became more confirmed in his drunken propensities. "He exhibited to the world," as Wraxall observes, "a very humiliating spectacle;" and another writer remarks that "his daughter was employed in checking him when he drank too much and when he talked too much." He thus continued to linger in a state of helpless imbecility to the beginning of the year 1788, when, on the 29th of January, he was seized with a paralytic stroke which deprived him of one-half the use of his body. Two days after, January 31st, Lord Hervey, the British envoy at the Florentine Court, writes: "This morning, between the hours of nine and ten, the Pretender departed this life." His remains were interred at Frascati, and little or no regret was expressed by his kindred or friends, as his latter years were so much darkened by his vices and extravagances. After his death, his brother the cardinal assumed the title of Henry the Ninth: he seemed distinguished for no other quality but that of his extreme superstition and bigotry, which rendered him generally odious and unpopular. It is recorded of Pope Pius VI., that after a lengthened interview with the Cardinal, he observed that he was not surprised at the eagerness of the English to rid themselves of so tiresome a race.

The daughter of Charles Edward, the Duchess of Albany, did not long survive her father; she died at Bologna in 1739, from the effects of a painful operation to which she had to submit. She appears to have been a person of pleasing looks and animated expression, with regular features, though without pretensions to striking beauty. Her miniature, once in the possession of her uncle the Cardinal, has now passed into the hands of the Countess of Scaffold; her face is said to resemble too much that of her father to be considered handsome.

It was not long after the death of her husband that the news reached the Countess, who was then residing at Paris. Alfieri reports that she was seriously affected on receiving the intelligence. "Her grief," he says, "was neither factitious nor forced; for every untruth was alien to this upright, incomparable soul; and, notwithstanding the disparity of years, her husband would have found in her an excellent companion and a friend, if not a loving wife, had he not thrust her from him by his constantly unfriendly, rough, and unaccountable behavior. I owe to pure truth this testimony." A French writer, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, ascribes her grief to a feeling of remorse at having deserted her husband in his helplessness and bodily infirmities. "The Duchess Charlotte," this writer says, "entering the house of Charles Edward, the deserted child coming to the rescue of the deserted spouse, the natural child replacing the lawful wife, and exercising her pious and salutary influence over the old man—these were contrasts which could not but painfully affect the proud Countess. Madame D'Albany had too elevated a soul not to feel the painfulness of her situation." And yet we can easily believe, without imputing to the Countess, as this writer does, feelings of compunction and remorse, that her grief was altogether unfeigned and sincere. The instinctive and better feelings of our nature, and especially those of the softer sex, will prompt us to be deeply affected at the separation from those with whom we have lived in the bonds of the closest intimacy, and with whom we have shared, even for a brief space of time, the joys and sorrows of life.

We are not, however, so much concerned in the inquiry what may have been the true state of the Countess's feelings on learning the demise of her late husband, as what were her relations to Alfieri after that event. It is somewhat difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, as the opinions on the question are conflicting and widely different. While some writers of that period assert that they were privately married, others, on the contrary, maintain that no such union ever took place, and that their connection was never consecrated by the nuptial vows. Thus much is certain, that in every country whither they went, whether in Italy, France or England, they were received in the very best society, as though they were legally joined together as husband and wife; this may be accounted for by the report of the private marriage. But if we are left to judge by the epistolary correspondence of the parties themselves, we should hardly be led to believe in the matrimonial connection. Alfieri never speaks of the Countess otherwise than as "la mia donna," (my lady,) and "la dolce meta di me stesso," (the sweeter half of my being); and she addresses him as "cel ami incomparable," (this my incomparable friend.) The mother of Alfieri, in a letter addressed to him, writes thus: "I do not believe that the lady who you announce is coming with you can feel any liking for me, since I have not the happiness to be acquainted with her. But if this be so, I would fain flatter myself that it is the effect of a tie which I hope may be of a nature to forward your earthly happiness as well as the salvation of your soul. This would be my greatest comfort, as it is my only longing desire."

Those who are of opinion that no marriage ever took place account for it upon the ground that the Countess could not make up her mind to lay aside her royal pretensions, and that Alfieri had no taste for the vulgar and prosaic state of matrimony, and preferred the condition of lover of a Queen. It is certain that the Countess clung with great and foolish tenacity to her royal rank; and we are assured by Wraxall, who had an opportunity of visiting her at Paris, that in one of her rooms she had a throne set up, emblazoned with the royal arms of Great Britain; that her attendants habitually addressed her as "Your Majesty;" and that royal honors were paid her by many of her visitors, and especially by ecclesiastics. Both Madame de Stael and the Duchess of Devonshire, who were frequent visitors of the Countess, addressed her as a royal personage, probably more from a feeling of compassion than from a sense of propriety. It must have been a great shock both to the Countess and to Alfieri, with their high notions and aristocratic pride, to hear the painter David, at their own table, on the day after the terrible procession of the French King and Queen from Versailles, use the following language: "It is a great misfortune that this Megara (the French Queen) was not torn to pieces or had her throat cut by the women, for there will be no peace during her life."

The progress of the Revolution, and its more ferocious and sanguinary complexion, determined the Countess and her companion to quit Paris. They departed from that city in the autumn of 1790 for Normandy, and in the following spring they visited England, passing their time partly in London and partly in the provinces. We can easily imagine that two such notable persons as the Countess and Alfieri attracted considerable attention in England, and, notwithstanding their equivocal relation, were received in the very best and most fashionable circles of the metropolis; and what may be regarded as very surprising is, that the former was presented at Court. Horace Walpole, in a letter to Miss Berry, on the 19th of May, 1791, speaks of the matter in the following terms: "The Countess of Albany is not only in England, in London, but at this very moment, I believe, in the Palace of St. James'; not restored by as rapid a revolution as the French, but, as was observed at supper at Lady Mount Edgecombe's, by that topsy-turvyhood that characterizes the present age. Within these two days the Pope has been burnt at Paris; Madame du Barry, mistress of Louis Quinze, has dined with the Lord Mayor of London, (Boydell,) and the Pretender's widow is presented to the Queen of Great Britain. She is to be introduced by her great-grandfather's niece, the young Countess of Aylesbury. That curiosity should bring her here I do not quite wonder, still less that she abhorred her husband; but methinks it is not very well bred to his family, nor very sensible, but a new way of passing eldest."

On the evening of the same day, after the presentation had taken place, the writer added a postscript to his letter, in which he makes the following statement: "Well, I have had an exact account of the interview of the two Queens, from one who stood close to them. The Dowager was announced as Princess of Stolberg. She was well dressed, and not at all embarrassed. The King talked to her a great deal, but about her passage, the sea, and general topics; the Queen in the same way, but less. Then she stood between the Dukes of Gloucester and Clarence, and had a good deal of conversation with the former, who may perhaps have met her in Italy. Not a word between her and the Princess; nor did I hear of the Prince, but he was there, and probably spoke to her. The Queen looked at her earnestly. To add to the singularity of the day, it was the Queen's birthday. Another odd accident: at the opera at the Pantheon, Madame d'Albany was carried into the King's box and sat there. It is not of a piece with her going to Court, that she seals with the royal arms."

It was generally supposed that the chief object of her visit to England was to obtain pecuniary aid from the Royal Family; and if she failed in the object at that period, subsequently, and at a later date, a grant was accorded from the Crown. It appears, from a passage in Lord Stunhope's Life of Pitt, that in 1806, when Cardinal York was forced to leave Rome in consequence of the French invasion, and thereby losing his ecclesiastical income, King George, "on the recommendation of Mr. Pitt, granted a yearly pension of £4,000 to the last of the Stuarts. The Cardinal died in 1807, when Lord Hawkesbury wrote announcing that a part of this pension, £1,600 a year, would be continued by his Majesty to the Countess of Albany." That she was greatly straitened in her finances during her residence in England is evident from one of Alfieri's letters written at that period, 1792, in which he attributes the abridgment of their projected tours in the country to pecuniary difficulties. Accordingly, early in August of that year they quitted England, and returned to France.

But it appears that their stay in Paris was very limited in its duration. After the proceedings of the 10th of August that city became an unsafe place of abode, while, at the same time, it was a matter of great difficulty to escape from it. Provided, however, with passports from the Danish and Venetian ambassadors, the only remaining foreign ministers about the revolutionary Government, and furnished also with an order from the sectional authorities, the Countess and her companion attempted, on the 18th of August, to quit the French Capital. But on arriving at the barrier, though permission to pass was given by the officers of the National Guard posted at the spot, yet their progress was obstructed by a band of the lowest populace, who rushed out from a neighboring cabaret, and vowed vengeance against the aristocrats. It was after a violent struggle, and with considerable difficulty, that they escaped from the ruffians and proceeded on their journey. After remaining a month at Brussels, they travelled through Germany and Switzerland to Florence, where they took up their permanent residence with occasional excursions into the country. Alfieri employed his time in preparing for the press some of his most distinguished productions, both in prose and in poetry. He died at Florence, on the 7th of October, 1803, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. Having all his life long been a professed free-thinker, he died without the ministrations of the church, though it was said that, in his last moments, he manifested some religious yearnings, to which the Countess paid no attention, and was blamed for her impiety and thoughtlessness. The truth is that she herself was an unfaithful member of the Church of Rome. The remains of Alfieri received, notwithstanding the poet's skepticism, the homage of so devout a Roman Catholic as Chateaubriand, who attended his funeral and bent over his coffin. By his last will he left to "the Countess Louise d'Albany" all his property, "moveables and immoveables," as well as all his books and MSS., and confiding to her care alone the publishing of all his posthumous works—an undertaking which she most scrupulously carried out.

If we are to judge her feelings by the following letter, which she addressed to Count Baldelli shortly after the death of Alfieri, her grief at his loss must have been most profound and poignant: "You may judge, my dear Baldelli," she writes, "of my grief by the manner in which I lived with the incomparable friend I have lost. It will be seven weeks next Saturday; and it is as if this misfortune had befallen me yesterday. You who have lost an adored wife may conceive what I feel. I have lost all consolation, support, society, all, all! I am alone in this world, which has become a desert for me."

Alas for the human heart—"deceitful above all things"—and the fickleness of woman! a few months after the death of Alfieri, M. Fabre, a painter of some celebrity, was taken into favor by the disconsolate mourner. Yea, it is even insinuated that she loved Fabre before Alfieri's death. Certain it is that he was installed in the poet's place, in the Casa di Alfieri, as it is still called, and situated in the Lung Arno. The painter was then thirty-seven years of age, and the Countess fifty-one. Their relations seemed to create no scandal in the best circles of the Tuscan capital, for at no former period had the Casa di Alfieri been frequented by a society so brilliant and fashionable. The most eminent Florentine nobility, and all foreigners of any note, constantly crowded the salons of the Countess's residence. Among the rest of the litterati who visited the Casa di Alfieri, Lamartine was one, in the year 1810; and he records his impression of the Countess in the following terms: "She was a little woman, whose figure had lost all lightness and all elegance. The features of her face, too rounded and too obtuse, also preserved no pure line of ideal beauty. But her eyes had a light, her fair hair a tint, her mouth an attraction, all her physiognomy an intelligence and grace of expression, which made you remember if they made you no longer admire. Her soft manner of speaking, her easy manner, her reassuring familiarity, raised at once those who approached her to her level. You did not know whether she descended to yours or elevated you to hers, there was so much nature in her bearing."

The company that assembled constantly at her salons excited at last the suspicion and vigilance of the French police; and in the month of May, 1809, she received a peremptory imperial order to repair to Paris without delay. She repaired thither, accompanied by Fabre. No sooner had her arrival been announced, than she was summoned to an interview with the Emperor Napoleon. After a few complimentary words, he immediately addressed her thus: "I know your influence over society in Florence. I know also that you employ it in a sense adverse to my policy; you are an obstacle to my projects of fusion between the Tuscans and the French. This is why I have summoned you to Paris, where you will have full leisure to satisfy your taste for the fine arts." She was detained in Paris till near the end of the year 1810, when she was allowed to return to Florence. Here she ended her days; she died on the 9th of January, 1824. By her will she named Fabre her universal legatee, after bequeathing a few objects of no great value to some of her relatives and special friends.

Fabre thus inherited all the books, statues, paintings, medals, and curiosities collected by both Charles Edward and Alfieri. He now resolved, having raised a monument to the Countess, to leave Florence, and to retire to his native country. He presented the Grand Duke with all the manuscripts of Alfieri, but the rest of his treasure he carried away with him, and he subsequently bestowed the whole on his native city Montpellier. Such was the foundation of the Musée Fabre, which is still existing in that city. Fabre died in the year 1837.

Of the Countess little can be said except that her life was one full of vicissitudes and chequered scenes. Her character presented nothing very remarkable; nothing of the romantic or poetic entered into its composition. A woman of a sensitive or delicate mind would scarcely have chosen a French painter to replace a royal husband, or a favored poet like Alfieri. All we can say is, that the interest which is attached to her name and history is derived from the fact that she was the wife of the Pretender, the last of the royal House of Stuart.

RATHER BORING.—Sam Boring was elected sheriff of one of the counties of California. Sam was educated in the Southwest, in one of those districts where the only alphabet they had was taken from the brands on the hides of stolen cattle—so the story runs, but for the latter statement we do not vouch. Now, in process of time and by process of law, Sam took a horse from a debtor by force because he would not pay. The horse was taken to the nearest town, about ten miles, and left at a livery stable. This town was about four miles from the county seat, where the sheriff kept his office. In a few days the debtor, seeing he could not escape payment, called on the sheriff, saying, if his horse would be allowed him, he would ride down among his neighbors and get the money. The sheriff knew it would be all right, and wrote the following order to the livery man for the horse:

"Mr H C—pleas let the barrer of this not have his horse
S BORING Sheriff"

It was an awful time for mind; but the "barrer" trudged the four miles on foot and presented the "not." The livery man read the document, nodded and smiled, put it carefully in his pocket, and began to whistle. The other was in somewhat of a hurry, and said so. Livery merely looked at his applicant, as much as to say, "D'y'e take me for a sawney?" Owner of horse said, "Come, give me that animal as quick as you can, for I have a long way to go and it is getting late." Livery, bristling up, inquired if the applicant took him to be a fool. "You must think I, like yourself, can't read. Here you come to me asking me to give you the horse, at the same time passing into my hands an order from the sheriff explicitly telling me not to let you have the horse." A sight of the document was demanded, drinks followed, and debtor walked to the county seat and back again through the mud—eight miles of the hardest kind of footing—to get an added to not, in order to make a note of it!—Harper's Magazine.

(For the Californian.)

THE OAK.

KING of the mighty forest
And the grove!
Tender sweethearts 'neath thy foliage
Whispered love;
Children, now grown old and hoary,
'Nenth thee played;
Many in the little churchyard
Low are laid.

Thou hast hushed the trembling wood-dove's
Weak alarms,
Thou hast rocked the proud young eagles
In thine arms;
And thy bright leaves in their plumage
Of they bore,
To the clouds and snow-capped mountains
Where they soar.

Thy great branches to the thunder
Echo lends,
And alike the breeze and whirlwind
Are thy friends;
Like the muttering of the earthquake
When it heaves,
Is the rude laugh of the tempest
In thy leaves.

When the winter fire shall light thee,
In thy blaze
Perchance some youthful poets'
Eyes may gaze;
When thy blue smoke's hazy banner
Is unfurled,
Will his wild imagination
See a world;

Where are sky-bright glowing arches,
Rainbow-spanned,
And a grotto built of jewels,
Fairy-planned;
And Fame's enticing temple
With its throne,
Its deathless crown of laurel
All his own.

But he sees not fond hopes faded,
Dear loves lost,
As Time shall chill the warm blood
With his frost;
He dreams not that his trusting
Heart may be
By the ax of sorrow stricken
Like a tree.

Gaze on, thou foolish dreamer!
Thou wilt learn
That the soul which throbs for glory
Thus shall burn.
A few gentle friends will cluster
Round the flame,
While Death writes in the ashes,
This is Fame!

EMILIE LAWSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 25th, 1865.

(For the Californian.)

BRASS.

"THE greatest study of mankind is man," but the most successful study for man is effrontery. You require no ability, you want no talent—only aim for unblushing brass, and success is certain. If you are a lawyer, deeply read, conversant with practice and the possessor of a flowing style, unless you have assurance you are a failure. If a minister, master of all the theological dogmas that have ever shaken the world or imbued the minds of men, unless you have effrontery, you may hang your harp on the willows. If you are a physician, intimate with all the ills that flesh is heir to and all the balms that heal, and have not brass, you were better off in the shroud with which patients are so familiar. Genius, tact, effrontery—but the greatest of these is effrontery.

"Put money in thy purse," says "Iago," "put money in thy purse." But "Iago" was mistaken. "Put brass in thy face!" would have been an incomparably better advice to "Cassio." While he was sweating his vitals away in the lagging pursuit of gold, the brazen face was coining it from his countenance and carrying off the prize.

To the ambitious there is no recipe so valuable as this. Does statesmanship allure you to her dizzy heights? Affect some strange doctrine, no matter how disgusting or misshapen; spout it with vehemence, illustrate it without stint, soar to the skies on the pinions of fancy, drag down the stars to deck its brow, dive down to his Satanic majesty's dominions for blue fire and yellow brimstone—this gives you prominence as an orator.

Then for position, do not be abashed at greatness. If you meet the Governor or the President and have not been introduced, take his arm and introduce yourself and your peculiar principle at the same time. Tell him his last message was the most elegant and eloquent production ever issued from the pen of man—that his last appointment has been received with hilarious delight and approbation. If he hints at leaving you tell him you will go to dinner with him. If you have been introduced, however, no matter how slight the acquaintance may be, slap him on the back as loudly and publicly as possible, call him Fred. or Abe., and tell him your friends insist on running you for U. S. Senator or some other minor office. Don't leave him in any event till he invites you to take a drink.

This gives you position; no one seeing you so familiar with such distinguished men will fail to conclude that you are either already an illustrious man or destined to become one speedily.

If you aspire to the legal profession, read Hart's California Practice, and the first volume of Oregon Reports; shave your head so as to give you a professional forehead, carry some Patent Office Reports and Congressional Globes in a green bag, and volunteer in some important case as amicus curiæ. Don't allow the judges to put you down. If they attempt it resist it as impinging on the sacred rights of advocates; if they commit you for contempt, so much the better—it will give you prominence at once. If they do not, argue all cases on high constitutional grounds. Never descend to discuss minor principles. There is nothing like assuming that every law that ever passed the Legislature, Congress, Parliament or Mount Sinai is unconstitutional and void. This course places you at once at the head of the profession, and the next step will be your appointment as United States District Judge for Dacotah Territory.

These examples might be indefinitely extended, but the two cited will suffice for the present. Remember in all things mingle brass—it is the sterling metal now-a-days. Without it all else is naught—with it nothing else is needed. It is all and in all. Ego.

OUR AGENT ON HIS TRAVELS.

IT will be observed that our agent is still penetrating the interior, and the appended notices testify to the kindness with which he is received by the press. One of our exchanges express its conviction that the charge of copperheadism against the editor of THE CALIFORNIAN is unfounded—on that it can safely bet. We thank our friends for the kind hand they have extended to our agent, and trust that similar good fortune will fall to him in every place he visits—for he is a gent.

Dr. Alfred Weiller, agent of THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly literary journal, published in San Francisco, is soliciting subscriptions in Marysville for that paper. We hope he will come this way during his peregrinations. THE CALIFORNIAN is a high-toned literary publication, and of such a character as should receive a liberal support from the people of the Pacific coast.—Herald, Suisun.

We can assure our readers that THE CALIFORNIAN is a first class literary and family journal, full of interesting matter and ably edited. It is established on a permanent basis, and Californians should take pride in extending its circulation. Dr. Weiller, its gentlemanly agent, is now in town soliciting subscriptions, and we hope sincerely that he will meet with good success.—Grass Valley National.

Dr. Alfred Weiller, agent of THE CALIFORNIAN, called upon us yesterday. He is soliciting subscriptions for that paper in this county. THE CALIFORNIAN is edited by C. H. Webb, Esq., formerly war correspondent of the New York Times. It is a journal of high literary character, and will undoubtedly become popular.—Nevada Transcript.

Dr. Weiller, agent of THE CALIFORNIAN, an excellent literary journal, is in town, and will remain a few days to solicit subscriptions therefor. THE CALIFORNIAN is the best literary paper published on the Pacific coast, and if it has not so many original (?) contributors as some of its contemporaries it unquestionably publishes less trash. The matter it contains is carefully prepared, well-digested, and worthy of perusal. A charge of Copperheadism has been made against the editor of THE CALIFORNIAN, Mr. C. H. Webb, but it is our conviction that it is wholly malicious and unfounded.—Nevada Gazette.

GOOD FOR YUBA.—A subscriber says he clips the following paragraph from the Sacramento Bee. He thinks "the deed therein recorded is worthy of the highest commendation, and should be commented on as a noble example for other sections of the country." He is right:

The neighbors of Mrs. Reynolds, a widow lady residing two miles below Yuba City, Sutter county, clubbed together on Thursday last, and plowed and sowed with barley and wheat some sixty acres of land on her premises. Twenty-eight plows and a number of harrows were kept running the whole day, and the work was thoroughly done. This is one of the most commendable acts we have had the pleasure of recording these many days. Such neighbors are an honor and a blessing to any community. The affair closed with a party in the evening, and the widow's good neighbors returned home happy in the consciousness of having acted well their part.

THE Aroostook Pioneer tells how crinoline was employed to manage a skittish horse. As two ladies were driving on the road to Tobique, the horse became frightened at a large boulder by the roadside, and refused to budge; whereupon one of the ladies, going to the frightful object, which had so unconsciously impeded their progress, spread herself all over it, and so completely covered it from sight, that the horse became at once manageable, and carried them to their journey's end without further mishap.

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XXI.

HARCOURT LOWTHER'S WELCOME.

WITHIN a month from that night on which the merchant's daughter and Francis Tredethlyn had lingered so long together on the terrace up the river, Maude Hillary sat at her desk in the little study, trying to begin the most difficult letter she had ever had occasion to write.

The letter was to be addressed to Harcourt Lowther, and the three words, "My dear Harcourt," were already written on the rose-tinted foreign note-paper; but beyond those preliminary words Maude found it very difficult to proceed.

That which she had to tell the distant soldier, sorely tried by inglorious idleness in a penal settlement, and inclined to resent every stroke of ill fortune, was by no means a pleasant thing to tell. She had to announce to him that the promise she had made long ago in the twilight by the river had been deliberately broken. She had to tell him that she was the plighted wife of another man; and she was not free to reveal to him any one of the strange circumstances that had pressed so cruelly upon her, pushing her, little by little, into this renunciation of her first and only love.

It was only a very commonplace letter that Miss Hillary could write to her discarded lover. She could only tell the old, common story, and put in the hackneyed pleas, so often heard in the court of Cupid: her father's wishes; her desire to secure his happiness rather than her own; and then a wild, womanly prayer for pity; an entreaty that her lover would believe in the existence of stronger reasons—higher motives—the nature of which she was not free to reveal. And last of all, after many pages of passionate supplication for pardon, with not a little violation of the nicer laws propounded by Lindley Murray and his successors—at the very last there came one page blotted with tears, earnest yet incoherent, in which Miss Hillary implored Mr. Lowther to forget her, and to seek happiness with a happier woman. Never had she loved him so dearly as while she wrote that last page, in which she resigned him forever. Surely Queen Guinevere's diamonds must have sparkled their very brightest just in that one angry moment in which she flung them into the river.

Yes, it had come to this. Maude Hillary, like a modern Iphigenia, had sacrificed herself for the benefit of her father. The burden of that debt which had been incurred by her agency had weighed too heavily upon her girlish breast. Somehow or other Francis Tredethlyn must be paid; and since he loved her so devotedly, so foolishly—since he held her as the brightest treasure to be won by aspiring man—it was surely better that he should take this poor recompense than go altogether unrewarded. It may be that Maude Hillary would under no circumstances deliberately have broken faith with her betrothed lover. But these grand crises, upon which the fate of a lifetime may depend, are apt to come very suddenly upon us. The great flood-tide of fate arises, and carries away the weak creatures afloat on its resistless waters. A moment of hesitation—a few faltering words—half doubtful, half imploring, and the thing is done.

It had all happened on the day on which Francis Tredethlyn accepted Mr. Hillary's magnanimous offer, and allowed himself to be created a sleeping partner in the Australian house. It was only natural that on such a day Francis should dine at the Cedars; and it was only natural that Lionel Hillary should make a little speech about the young man, telling his daughter of the generosity of this noble-minded Cornishman, who had been something more than a son to him—a friend, a benefactor, a preserver. What praise could be loud enough for a man who would lend thirty thousand pounds without security? And then this noble-minded Cornishman, whose heart was like a great lump of tinder—only wanting the feeblest spark to kindle it into a blaze—burst out into a passionate declaration of his love. What was his fortune but so much dirt, which he was only too glad to fling under the feet of Miss Hillary? Would he not go out into the world to-morrow penniless, barefoot, a beggar, if by so doing he could add to her happiness? He asked a few such questions as these; and then cried out suddenly that he was a despicable wretch, and that he was ashamed of himself for saying all this, when he knew that Miss Hillary's heart was given to another man. He would go, he said; she should never again be tormented by him. She should not be annoyed by so much as the mention of his name. After which passionate speech Mr. Tredethlyn grasped the merchant's hand, and then made a rush towards the door. He would fain have suited the action to the word; he wanted to go away that moment, and hide himself forever from Maude Hillary. But before he could reach the door Maude was by his side, with her hands clasped about his arm, her face looking upward at his, and drowned with tears.

"How good you are!" she cried. "Don't go away; we cannot part from you like this. You have been so good to my father. Ah, how can we ever recompense so much devotion! If my esteem—my gratitude—can make you happy, they are yours—they have long been yours. I renounce every other thought, every other duty. I can have no duty higher than this."

The last words were almost stifled on her lips, for Francis Tredethlyn caught her to his breast as passionately as in that last scene of the Lady of Lyons.

"Maude, my love—my angel—you will renounce, for my sake—you—will be my own—my wife!" he gasped, incoherently. "No—no, I cannot accept such a sacrifice—I am not so mean, so selfish, as to—"

But Mr. Hillary, hovering over his daughter and the generous-minded young Cornishman, would not allow Francis to finish this sentence.

"My dear boy!" he exclaimed—"my darling Maude! nothing upon earth could give me greater pleasure than this, because I know that it is for your mutual happiness. What joy can be deeper or purer than that of a father who knows that his child has won for herself the devoted affection of a good man?"

"And the thirty thousand pounds will be sunk forever and ever in the firm of Hillary and Co.," the merchant may have thought at the close of that enthusiastic address.

Thus it was that Maude Hillary arrived at the very point towards which fate and her father had been pushing her for the last twelve months. After that passionate impulse of self-sacrifice had passed away, a dull, dead feeling of pain took possession of her breast. Alone in the quiet of her own pretty rooms; alone through the long sunny July mornings with her books, and Berlin wool work, and piano, she had only too much time to consider the step she had taken; she had only too much time to think of her broken vows, her scattered hopes. And she did think of these things—with cruel remorse and self-upbraiding, with bitter and unavailing regret.

And now Francis Tredethlyn appeared to her all at once in a new light. Alas! he was no longer the noble-hearted friend to whom she could appeal for help in the day of trouble. He was no longer the humble adorer, kneeling on the lowest step of the altar, remote and submissive. He was her affianced husband and had a right to her society. He had a right to attend her walks and rides, to linger near the piano when she sang, to hold perpetual skeins of Berlin wool during those tedious morning visits which he made now and again to the Cedars. All these privileges were his by right; and other people gave place when he approached Miss Hillary, and watched to see her face brighten as he drew near her. It was not that Francis himself was in any way altered. His adoration of his bright divinity was no less humble than of old—even now when he knew that the goddess was to descend from her pedestal and exchange her starry crown for the orange blossoms of an earthly bride. He was in no way changed; the distance between himself and Maude Hillary was as wide as ever. He could see it before him—a palpable gulf, across which he beheld her, a strange creature, in a strange land—a creature who might hold out her hand to him once in a way across the impassable abyss, but who could never draw him near her. Alas for Francis Tredethlyn's loveless betrothal! that dreary distance was growing wider every day now that Iphigenia knew the hour of sacrifice was drawing near.

It had been one thing to think of Mr. Tredethlyn as a friend—a dear and devoted friend, worthy to be regarded with an almost sisterly affection. It was another thing to contemplate him as a future husband. All his ignorance, his homely ways of speaking and thinking, his little awkwardness and stupidities, his vacillating temperament in the matter of spoons and forks at those elaborate Russian dinners—all these things pained Maude Hillary now as cruelly as they had galled Miss Desmond's proud spirit some six months before. And then to the faint shivering pain of disgust was joined all the bitterness of contrast. Never had Harcourt Lowther's image seemed so near to this wayward girl as it seemed now, when she was the promised wife of another man, and tried most honestly to shut the memory of her old lover completely out of her mind. Never had he been so near to her. His graces of manner, his accomplishments, the light touch of his pointed fingers on the piano, the deep organ tone that he alone amongst amateurs could draw out of a flute, the free outlines of his pencil, the transparency of his water-color sketches, the graphic humor of his pen-and-ink caricatures; the airy wit, which never verged upon the borders of vulgarity; the fervid eloquence, which never degenerated into rant; the trenchant satire, which never sank to the vile level of personal spite; she thought of her discarded lover, and all the showy attributes that had won her girlish love arose before her in cruel contrast with the deficiencies of Francis Tredethlyn.

Yet all this time she was very kind to her betrothed husband. It was not in her to be scornfully indifferent to the man whom she regarded as her father's friend and benefactor. She was not a woman to sacrifice herself with an ill grace. The silent warfare went on within her breast. She struggled and suffered, but she had always the same kind, cold smile, the same gentle words for the man whom she had promised to marry.

And in the mean time the hands went steadily round upon all the clock dials, and the inevitable hour drew very near. Busy milliners and dressmakers, bootmakers and outfitters, came backwards and forwards from Wigmore street to the Cedars, and were busy and glad. Mr. Hillary's credit was unlimited, and it was almost as if a princess of the blood royal had been about to marry. Francis Tredethlyn bought the lease of a big, black-looking house in a new neighborhood near Hyde Park; and there were negotiations pending for the purchase of an estate within a few miles of Windsor.

August was melting into September. Already there were bright glimpses of red and yellow here and there among the sombre green of the woodlands. The wedding was to take place very early in October; the guests were bidden, the dresses of the bridesmaids were chosen, and in the still evening Iphigenia walked alone on the terrace. She was very seldom alone at this hour, but to-night her father had taken Francis Tredethlyn to a club dinner, given by a bachelor stockholder of some eminence in Mr. Hillary's circle. To-night Maude was alone; and leaning upon the broad balustrade, with her elbow resting amongst the thick ivy that crept along the stone, she looked down at the still water—the dark, melancholy water—and thought of her past life.

It seemed so far away from her now, left so entirely behind—all that frivolous past. She seemed to have grown out of herself since the knowledge of her father's troubles had come upon her; and looking backwards she saw a careless and happy creature, who bore no relationship to this thoughtful woman, before whom all the future seemed a blank and dreary country, unilluminated by one glimpse of sunshine.

She turned away from the water presently, and walked slowly up and down the long terrace. There seemed to be a melancholy influence in the evening stillness, the dusky shadow lying upon every object, the distant peal of bells floating across the river from some church where the ringers were practicing; even the voices of passing boatmen and the low monotonous plash of oars took a pensive tone, in unison with the hour and Maude Hillary's sad, remorseful thoughts.

She was near the end of the terrace, close to that ivy-grown old summerhouse which had sheltered the patched and powdered beauties of King George the Second's Court, when she was startled by the sound of a chain grating against stonework, and rapid steps on the flight of stairs leading from the terrace to the river. The young men who came to the Cedars were very fond of making the journey by water; so there was nothing strange in the sound of a step on the river stair. Maude turned to meet the intruder with a sense of weariness and vexation. He would not be likely to stay long, whoever he was; but the prospect of even ten minutes' idle conventional discourse jarred upon her present frame of mind.

Maude turned to meet the unwelcome visitor with a languid sigh, and saw a man hurrying towards her in the twilight; a man in whose figure and dress there was a careless grace, an indefinable air of distinction, which, in Maude Hillary's eyes, stamped him as different from all the rest of the world.

He came hurrying towards her. In a moment he was close to her, held out his arms, eager to take her to his breast. But she recoiled from him, deadly white, and with her hands extended, motioning him back.

"Don't touch me," she cried; "don't come near me. Ah, you don't know—you cannot have had my letter."

"What letter?" cried Mr. Lowther, staring almost fiercely at the shrinking girl. These sort of things so rapidly make themselves understood. Harcourt Lowther saw at once that something was wrong. "What letter?"

"My last; the letter in which I told you that—Ah, how you will hate and despise me! But if you could know all, Harcourt, as you never can, you might excuse—you might forgive—"

A torrent of sobs broke the sentence.

"Oh, I think I understand," said Harcourt Lowther, very quietly. "You have thrown me over, Miss Hillary."

She held out her clasped hands towards him with an imploring gesture; and then in broken sentences, in half-finished phrases, that were rendered incoherent by her sobs, she recapitulated something of her letter of explanation. Lowther's face had blanched before this, and his lower lip quivered now and then with a little spasmodic action; but he listened very quietly to all Maude had to say.

"I ought never to have expected anything else," he answered, when she had finished her piteous attempt to explain and justify her conduct without revealing her father's commercial secrets. "I don't know that I ever did expect anything else," he went on very deliberately. "What has a penniless younger son to do among the children of Mammon? How can the earthen pot hope to sail down the stream with the big brazen vessels, and escape wreck and ruin? Don't let there be any scene between us, Miss Hillary; I hate all domestic tragedy, and I think if my heart were breaking—and men's hearts have been known to break—I could take things quietly. You have grown tired of our long and apparently hopeless engagement, and you have promised to marry somebody else. It is all perfectly natural. May I know the name of my fortunate rival?"

"His name is Tredethlyn—Francis Tredethlyn."

"A Cornishman," added Harcourt Lowther—"a fellow who has lately come into a great fortune?"

"Yes. You know him, then?"

"Intimately. I congratulate you on your choice, Miss Hillary. Francis Tredethlyn is a most excellent fellow. I have reason to speak well of him, for he was my servant for a year and a half out yonder in Van Diemen's Land."

"Your servant?"

"Yes. He was really the best of fellows; and in the art of brushing a coat or cleaning a pair of riding boots was positively unrivalled."

(To be continued.)

POETS-LAUREATE OF ENGLAND.

"I HAVE something to tell you
Which you will not be sorry at,
'Tis—that I am sworn in
To the office of Laureate!
The oath that I took
There could be nothing wrong in,
'Twas—to do all the duties
To the dignity belonging."—Southey.

A FEW weeks ago, the rumor prevailed that Queen Victoria was about to confer upon the Poet-Laureate, the dignity of a baronet; and although progress in the matter is for the moment suspended, we sincerely trust that her Majesty's desire to compliment the "Great Poet," will soon terminate in the Laureate becoming Sir Alfred Tennyson, Baronet! Our appreciation of him is evidenced by the fact, that the sale of his works in the United States is greater than in England! This circulation is attested by the numerous and beautifully illustrated editions annually issued by his Boston publishers. However, the most recent and noticeable instance of his popularity among us, in the case of Enoch Arden, which was republished here in a complete form (in single number of several newspapers) for a few cents; ensuring to the author, within the space of a week, a host of American readers, that may, without exaggeration, be numbered by millions!

"It is now more than thirty years (observes a cotemporary,) since the Quarterly Review attempted to extinguish a young poet, who had then published the second of two thin volumes. He was treated in the loftiest tone of contempt, and not the slightest token of appreciation was suffered to qualify the ironical praise and total scorn which breathed through the article." Since the year 1833, more than the time allotted to a generation of men has elapsed; and the poet Tennyson, whose first efforts were thus received, has lived to enjoy the highest literary distinction, which it is in the power of the Queen of England to bestow, and to find himself the most popular poet among all classes, since the palmy days of Byron and of Moore. Added to which, he will be the first Laureate thus actually ennobled; and, with Bulwer-Lytton and Lyell, they will be worthy successors of Sir Walter Scott, in the line of literary baronets. (The hereditary title of "Baronet," is the highest honor ever conferred upon a Man of Letters in England, with the exception of Macaulay, who was raised to the peerage.) The occasion affords us an agreeable opportunity to glance at the History of the Laureateship. The Greeks were the first to crown with laurel poets successful in musical contests, and from them the practice was adopted by the Romans. The appellation—Laureate—seems to have been derived, through the Italian, from the Latin, (Laurus, a bay,) in allusion to this ancient usage, which was revived in the twelfth century. Custom, rather than vanity, has perpetuated the office at the English Court.

Petrarch, "the Italian songster of Laura and of Love," received the crown at the Capitol, in Rome, on the eighth of April, 1341; from his early youth the laurel was endeared to him by a verbal resemblance with the name of his mistress. The ceremony of his coronation is described by Gibbon:

"Twelve Patrician youths were arrayed in scarlet; six representatives of the most illustrious families in green robes—with garlands of flowers—accompanied the procession; in the midst of the Princes and nobles, the senator, Count of Arguillara, a kinsman of the Colonna, assumed the throne; and at the voice of the herald, Petrarch arose! After discoursing on a text of Virgil, and thrice repeating his vows for the prosperity of Rome, he knelt beside the throne, and received from the senator a laurel crown, with a more precious declaration, 'This is the reward of merit.' The people shouted 'Long Life to the Capitol and the Poet.' A sonnet, in praise of Rome, was accepted as the effusion of gratitude and genius; and after the procession had visited the Vatican, the profane wreath was suspended before the shrine of St. Peter," etc.

Tasso—the author of one of the greatest epics ever written—was told by that just and learned Pope, Clement the Eighth, that he was about to award him the laurel crown, "that it might be as much honored by him, as in former times it had served to honor others," but, unfortunately, he died as it was about being conferred upon him, in 1595.

In several European countries, the sovereign has assumed the privilege of appointing a court poet, with various titles. In Germany there were Laureates at a very remote period. The French, though they have had royal poets, never had Laureates; and, although the title has existed in Spain, but little is known of those who bore it. Allusion to the office we find in "Don Quixotte."

In England, Baston and Gulielmus appear to have acted, respectively, in the capacity of royal poets to Richard the First (A. D., 1189) and to Edward the Second. Warton, in his "History of Poetry," shows that the Poet Laureate is undoubtedly the same officer who, in the reign of Henry the Third, was styled the King's Versifier, and to whom one hundred shillings were paid as his annual stipend. There is a tradition that Edward the Third, emulating the crowning of Petrarch, conferred the office on Chaucer, and that in the year 1389, Richard the Second originated the annual allowance of wine.

The succession of royal poets—or Poets-Laureate—from the time of the "Father of English Poetry," has been as follows, with the dates of their accession to office:

Geoffrey Chaucer, A. D.	1373	Naham Tate, A. D.	1693
Henry Scogan,	1400	Nicholas Bowe,	1714
John Kay,	1461	Lawrence Eusden,	1719
Andrew Barnard,	1485	Colley Cibber,	1730
John Skelton,	1510	William Whitehead,	1738
Edmund Spenser,	1530	Thomas Warton,	1785
Samuel Daniel,	1559	Henry J. Pye,	1790
Ben Jonson,	1615	Robert Southey,	1813
Sir W. Davenant, Kt. ,	1638	William Wordsworth,	1843
John Dryden,	1670	Alfred Tennyson,	1850
Thomas Shadwell,	1689

Henry Scogan is mentioned by Ben Jonson as the Laureate of Henry the Fourth, but neither he nor his successor have left us any poetry to prove their pretensions to the office. Andrew Barnard, an Augustinian Monk, was also Historiographer to Henry the Seventh. Skelton, writing in the same reign, styles himself Poet-Laureate, but the Laureateship of which he speaks, was a degree conferred upon him by the University of Oxford, with an official robe, on which was embroidered the name of "Calliope," the muse of Epic poetry. Skelton was Laureate to Henry the Eighth, whose tutor he had been; but he so lampooned Cardinal Wolsey (in his poem of "Why come ye not to Court?") that he was deposed for alluding to his "greasy genealogy;" our readers will recollect that his Eminence was the son of a butcher. Spenser, the "Prince of Poets," is recorded as Laureate to Queen Elizabeth to whom he dedicated his "Fairy Queen." Daniel was employed about the court in writing masques, and birthday odes; however, as a poet, he has been undeservedly neglected. All the productions of the Laureates were in Latin, prior to the Reformation, which, among other blessings, banished the narrow pedantry of monastic erudition, and opened the way to the cultivation of the English tongue.

Ben Jonson, the great dramatist, became Laureate, with a salary of 100 marks ($322) granted to him by James the First. Some of his poems are singularly beautiful. In the reign of Charles the First, the earliest patent of this office seems to have been issued, which fixed the present salary of £100 a year, with a tierce of Canary wine. Davenant was knighted by the king at the siege of Gloucester; he was also Court Historiographer with an additional £100 a year. Dryden, likewise, held the double appointment, but was deposed at the Revolution. Shadwell, the last of the historiographers, owes his immortality to the ridicule of his predecessor. Tate officially celebrated the birthday of William the Third; and is chiefly known by his metrical version of the Psalms. During his tenure of office, the Laureateship was attached to the department of the Lord Chamberlain; and continues so, up to the present day. On the accession of George the First, Rowe was appointed by the ejection of Tate, who died in poverty. Eusden commenced a series of Natal and New Year's Odes, which were regularly continued till 1810. His reputation may be gathered from his epitaph:

"Eusden, a laurelled bard, by fortune raised,
By very few was read—by fewer praised."

The Birthday Odes of Colley Cibber are, by no means, exceptions to the usual insipidity of such compositions.

Whitehead felt the constraint that obliged the Laureate to write annual odes, when he penned the following indifferent lines:

"His Muse obliged by sack and pension
Without a subject, or invention,
Must certain words in order set
As innocent as a gazette;
Must some half meaning, half disguise,
And utter neither truth—nor lies."

He was appointed on the refusal of the Laureateship by Gray; and Warton on the refusal of Mason. Warton resolved to render the position respectable, and one would scarcely suppose that the subjects were composed by restraint; for his lyric strains greatly enhanced the literary estimation of laureates.

On the death of Warton, the abolition of the Laureateship was recommended by the historian Gibbon, who considered that "the best time, for not filling up the office, when the king is a man of virtue, and the departed poet a man of genius." But his advice was disregarded, as the friends of Pye claimed for him the position, to the credit of which he did not contribute.

On the next vacancy, it was offered to the author of Marmion, who declined it; but Scott recommended Southey, who was bound by the same obligations as his predecessors—notwithstanding his reasonable desire that he "should write when and in what manner he thought best;" but after a few years he ceased to furnish official odes; and those which he did compose are now forgotten. The facetious manner in which he announced his appointment to his daughter is given in the quotation at the head of this article. His emoluments consisted of the usual salary of £100; but, he says, "the tierce of wine was wickedly commuted at £26." In addition to this he had a pension of £200; which, in 1835, was increased to £500. His works not being very profitable, he refused a baronetcy on account of his limited means.

In 1843 we find Sir Robert Peel writing to Wordsworth, kindly urging him to overcome his reluctance, and become Laureate. The Bard of the Lakes, being seventy-four, feared he might be unfit to undertake the tasks expected of him; but, on being assured that it would be a sinecure as far as he chose, (which has since become the rule,) he accepted the office. Once, and only, did he sing in the discharge of his duties; and then there was more obscurity than poetry in what he wrote; but he "earned the bays before he wore them"—as he indited national odes long prior to his Laureateship—the more valuable because they were non-official. In addition to the salary of £126, he had a pension of £300. Serious thoughts were again entertained, on the death of Wordsworth, of abolishing the office, but fortunately this notion did not prevail, as the position was accepted by Tennyson.

If the Laureateship were to be retained at all, no more fitting appointment could have been made; for the laurel, dignified by the brows of Ben Jonson and of Dryden, (names second only to those of Shakspeare and of Milton,) has been sullied by appearing on the temples of Whitehead and of Pye. From the day of Tennyson's appointment to the present, he has not only maintained, but he has increased his well-earned reputation; for in no language, probably, is there such another series of Elegies as the In Memoriam—so deep so musical, so imaginative, and exhibiting such solemn affection for the dead. He still further established his fame by the Idylls of the King, confirming it by the volume of poems of last year contained in the volume of which Enoch Arden is the eponym. By universal consent, the "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington," is the finest work of art which any Poet Laureate has ever produced, in the discharge of the functions of his office.

In former times the appointment of Poet-Laureate conferred a great public honor upon some special bard, placing him high above his fellows; but according to modern conceptions, a genuine poet like Tennyson confers equally as much honor on the office, as the office upon him. And if personal titles possess any value, no more fitting recipient could be found than a poet who is more likely than any living sovereign, and as likely as any living statesman, to give a name to the age he lives in; although it is Tennyson's literary reputation, and not the breath of a Queen, which will, hereafter, crystallize his name.

With the exception of Andrew Barnard, who was a Frenchman; and of Tate, who hailed from the Emerald Isle, all the Laureates were natives of England. Skelton, Eusden and Warton were clergymen.—N. Y. Home Journal.

BEING TAKEN UNAWARES.—A beggar who had tried many ways for increasing his finances, at last hit on the plan of pretending to be dumb. A gentleman who was passing by knew the beggar by sight, and going up to him, asked him promptly, "Pray, how long have you been dumb?" The beggar was taken unawares, and had no time to decide on not speaking, and answered quickly, "From my earliest youth." So, sudden or startling events seem to give the mind, as it were, a good shaking, and the truth comes out in spite of ourselves. We often say on the sudden a thing which, though perfectly true, nay, because of its truth perhaps, we should keep back, if we were at ease and not taken by surprise.

LIMITATION.

EACH is bounded by his nature,
And remains the same in stature
In the valley, on the mountain.
Scoop from ocean, or from fountain,
With a poor hand—or a richer,
You can only fill your pitcher.

THERE is a great difference between reading a book alone, and with persons who appreciate the beautiful, and share our admiration.—De Stael

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

"Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

All kinds of JOB PRINTING done with neatness and despatch, at reasonable rates.

DR. ALFRED WEILLER is an authorized Travelling Agent for THE CALIFORNIAN.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1865.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

FRIDAY evening of last week being the occasion of Miss Heron's benefit, brought an audience to the Opera House which must have somewhat reminded that lady of old days. Camille was on the bills, and inspired by the tribute thus voluntarily paid to her, the beneficiary played it with even more than her accustomed grace and spirit. Saturday evening her engagement in this city closed with Gamea. Although not fully recovered from a sickness which necessitated her withdrawal from the bills one night of last week, and required a summoning of all her resolute will to enable her to go upon the stage on her benefit night, Miss Heron opened with Hester Prynne in Sacramento on Wednesday evening, ten years having elapsed since her first appearance in that city. We learn from the Union that she was greeted with an excellent house, and if the critic of that paper may be taken as authority, she impressed the audience most favorably. We observe that the Union falls into the practice, almost exclusively a Californian one, of criticising the face and figure of an actor before speaking at all about the acting, which is about as legitimate as it were to speak of the number of hairs in the artist's pencil or criticise the shape of his hand when treating of a picture from his easel. Miss Heron is supported by Frank Mayo as "Dimmesdale," and J. H. Warwick as "Roger Chillingworth," the Union remarking that while the rendering of the former actor's part was "judicious and satisfactory," the latter "misconceived the character of Roger Chillingworth, who was not an ordinary melo-dramatic villain but a grim, calm, deliberate Puritanical impersonation of vengeance." We can well believe that the criticism is just.

That excellent and deservedly popular actor, Mr. Wheatleigh, took possession of the Opera House on Monday evening, opening with Nine Points of the Law and The Bull in a China Shop. Mrs. Edwin and Harry Courtaine both appeared in the former piece and contributed materially to its success. In light comedy Mr. Courtaine is excellent, and we understand that he has taken a notarial oath to abstain from all former eccentric rolls and adhere for the future to his legitimate one on the stage. Tuesday evening, The Victims and Uncle Sam filled the bill, The Chimney Corner and The Model of a Wife doing duty on Wednesday, Mr. Wheatleigh appearing in both pieces. Thursday evening, The American Cousin was brought out, Mr. Wheatleigh of course as "Asa Trenchard," Mr. Courtaine as "Lord Dundreary." We have before taken occasion to comment upon Mr. Wheatleigh's excellent portrayal of what are commonly called Yankee characters; it is sufficient in the present instance to say that in his hands they are purged of the exaggerations and disgusting attributes with which stage tradition has so long chosen to invest them. Courtaine's "Dundreary" was good, modelled of course upon the great original which Sothorn furnished. Our only regret that this character was ever discovered arises from the fact that all English fops for the next century bid fair to be merely second editions of that most unnatural character. Mrs. Edwin, Mrs. Saunders, Mrs. Perry and the rest of the regular company—except those who have followed the Heron's flight—appeared in the piece, and it passed off with nothing to detract from its success. Last evening Masks and Faces was on the bills, and this afternoon Nine Points of the Law and On His Last Legs will be given, The Octoroon to follow in the evening, and to be repeated Monday evening. When we say that "Salem Scudder" is one of Wheatleigh's best characters, it is equivalent to saying emphatically to everybody: Go and see him. The Magnolia, adapted by "a talented young townsman of ours," will soon be produced.

The Eureka still flourishes, its end-men preserving that exuberance of wit and humor with which they inaugurated their season. The effect of seeing only two of the performers blacked is somewhat curious, suggesting the idea that an era of miscegenation has indeed dawned. Of course it were a pity for Miles, Morgan, Miles, Maria or Clara to black their pretty little faces, and burnt cork would scarcely add to the lightness of their hearts, but at least a slight saddle color might be given the other members of the troupe without any permanent injury to their complexions. With dances, songs, and champion jigs we are happy to receive the door-keeper's assertion that the Eureka is doing well, and we trust that it will not soon weary in well doing.

Mrs. Grantly, whose debut at the Opera House was announced to come off some time since, informs us that she is to appear on Monday evening week, and that this time there will positively be no postponement. The piece d'occasion is The Wife.

NEW BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S.

THE Eastern presses seem subject to spasms. Occasionally quite a period of time is permitted to elapse without the appearance of a new book, and then the atmosphere suddenly becomes heavy with their flying leaves. Foremost in the package which the last steamer brings us, we have series second of Muller's Science of Language, composed like the first series of lectures delivered before the Royal Institution in London. It is scarcely necessary that we praise a work which has received universal commendation, or that we endorse the learning and research of an author like Muller; the ground upon which he treads in these lectures is familiar to him, and his feet never wander.

In Ritter's Comparative Geography, translated from the German, we have a valuable text book for schools and colleges. Geographical Studies, by the same author, was before translated, but the abstrusity of that work would naturally prevent its becoming popular with the masses or interesting to any save cultivated scholars. The present volume brings geography down within the reach of the multitude and makes its study a pastime rather than a task.

The Brother's Secret, by William Godwin, is one of those interminable and involved novels in the smallest and most painful of print, which few publishers but the Petersons have the courage to issue, and which we wonder that any persons at all have the courage to read.

Book the second of Our Mutual Friend, by Charles Dickens, now being published serially in Harpers' Magazine, is issued by John Bradburn. We do not know whether or not this reprint is quite in accordance with the ethics which prevail among publishers, but it is a question which they themselves must settle. Our Mutual Friend bids fair to become everybody's friend.

In Meditations on the Essence of Christianity, M. Guizot rallies round the standard which has been so patiently upheld and so vigorously assailed since first it was planted. It is indeed a little singular that between the many who are hammering away at the outer walls of the church, to say nothing of those who deal shrewd blows within, the fabric should stand so long. Guizot is a careful writer, and a practiced thinker, and to all reflective minds his works especially commend themselves.

The Rev. C. M. Butler publishes lectures delivered in the United States Legation in Rome under the title of St. Paul in Rome. The author avowedly aims to make us familiar with the lights and shadows of that historical picture in which Nero and Paul were both introduced. We have an idea that St. Paul would find himself rather uncomfortable in the Rome of to-day, and it is not clear that Nero would like it as a permanent place of residence. The author has brought much study and care to the preparation of his work.

A pretty little volume in green and gold, fresh and dainty as an early spring flower, has Ballads written on its back, and the title page bears the name of Amelia B. Edwards. The authoress tells us that nearly all the ballads were written for music, and we can well believe it, for they are as tuneful as bells. No essay is made to stir the grand organ notes of poetry, but the light guitar of love and the passions is deliberately and gracefully thrummed.

In choosing Nothing but Money as the name of his book, T. S. Arthur has chosen the only title which in these days could prove attractive. For we strive for nothing but money, we live for little else but money, and naturally enough all will desire to read about nothing but money. We cannot confess to a very exaggerated admiration for Arthur—or at least for his writings—as he always brings to us a mild flavor of the pump, not at all conducive to the exhilaration of depressed spirits. We would scarcely look to Philadelphia, however, for anything very novel or striking in literature. This book of Arthur's seems much of a piece with his previous efforts.

Another series of The Old Merchants of New York—the third one—is published by Carleton. As we have two or three times before remarked, these sketches originally appeared in the New York Leader, to which journal they were contributed by "Walter Barrett, clerk," under which nom de plume the late Joseph Scoville—better known as "Manhattan"—correspondent of an English paper and author of a novel which had better been suppressed—will be recognized. The work is of more interest to New Yorkers than to Californians; but as old merchants have their connections and correspondents everywhere, a few copies may find circulation here.

A blue and gold edition of Poe's Poems is published by Middleton. It contains what purports to be an "original memoir" of the poet's life, but in reality reveals nothing that was not already known concerning his erratic career. For Poe lived in a glass house, notwithstanding all the stones he was accustomed to throw, and the world knew all about him. In losing him America lost one of her few poets, and it may be years before the niche which he left vacant will be filled.

The Snoblace Ball is one of the pamphlet poems which Carleton has a special license for publishing, and it is much of a pattern with the others that have preceded it from that press. As the name would indicate, it is a fling at the shoddy in society, but there is a shoddy of literature as well, and of this the poem itself furnishes an admirable illustration.

FROM A YOUNG BARRISTER.

[We have received the following note from a young barrister, who evidently wants practice. He is sharp enough to get it, in time, without our assistance, if the way that he swings a pen in this instance may be taken as a criterion. It will be observed that the style of one of the most eminent ornaments of our bar is imitated so closely that we would almost swear it was him were he in town—and a contributor to these columns. We consent to the proposed arrangement, and shall be happy to learn the young barrister's address.]

SAN FRANCISCO, March 21st, 1865.

EDITOR OF CALIFORNIAN.—Dear Sir: There are several quaint old proverbs which inculcate the idea that one good turn deserves another, that one hand must wash the other; and the divine injunction, "Cast your bread upon the waters and you shall find it after many days" (soaked bread?) looks to the same idea—all of which, being rendered into plain, every-day English (plague on the English!) means, if you will send me lawsuits I will send you subscribers, and reports to print. Or, suppose we form a limited partnership; get into a suit yourself, (I would just now suggest something in the libel line,) give me a good retainer; I will draw up a long brief and give you the printing of it. This would give you employment as long as you have a dime.

Or you might give me a puff in your valuable journal, say, a column on the first page, in which you speak of our "talented fellow-townsmen," after the manner of Nones; or the "eloquent and talented," after the style of George Barstow; "brilliant," as is said of Winans; "the splendid burst of eloquence," patented for Nathan Porter; "most masterly effort," kept standing in all decent newspaper offices for Edward Tompkins; "sparkling wit," found in Lake; "soggy old boy"—that's for Crockett; "chaste, ornate, and free from the slang which vitiates the language," like Pixley. Just say I take heavy cases (with money in them) as a favor. You can call me anything except a fool, or funny or honest—above all things do not call me honest. I tell you we can do a thriving business. Newspapers make great men; so you just take up your humble servant and make a man of him. I will continue to reciprocate until I get high enough upon the ladder to require no further aid; then, of course, you will stand from under. I am yours, very truly,

A YOUNG BARRISTER.

Our New York correspondent writes us that "Edward Gould Buffum, a person known in California, has been playing farces before Mrs. Biglow, the wife of the Parisian Consul from this country. Buffum writes the New York Herald's letter, and is noisy enough to have a newspaper printed upon him."

A COMPANY, with a cash capital of a "lac" of rupees, has started a daily paper at Allahabad, India. Here they start them with a lack of sense and they are all quite bad, with an exception or two.

The first member of Signor Bianchi's new troupe has arrived, after a prolonged and somewhat tedious passage of many months. It is a boy.

It is stated that the pay of an American private soldier exceeds that of a captain in the French army.

A SMART REPARTEE.—In repartee they (American children) are wonderful. I remember a lady telling me of a little girl, the child of a very grand people, who had a French nurse, and who, at the age of four, had picked up a very fair smattering of colloquial Parisian. Now this little girl's papa, who had been much in Europe, had acquired some notions as to domestic discipline differing very widely from those ordinarily entertained by American parents. He was not harsh; but he would be obeyed. One day when the little thing had been outrageously naughty, he went so far as to administer a moderate amount of personal correction to her. He took her on his knee unobsequiously, and strove to explain to her how sorry he had been to be obliged to punish her, and that the chastisement had not been inflicted for his own pleasure. "Pour le plaisir de qui, alors?" asked little Miss, still sobbing, in her nursery French.—Sala's Diary.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CALIFORNIAN.]

NEW YORK, February 2, 1865.

THIS week I shall speak about Philadelphia and its æsthetic character. Fifteen or twenty years ago it was the leading literary city. Graham's, the oldest of the magazines, was located there; Felix O. C. Darley was hawking his designs about town—Joe Neal was writing charcoal sketches to them; Edgar A. Poe was drinking with George Lippard and Enoch Greene; John Sartain was getting up the best engravings on the continent. Dr. Bird, Robert T. Conrad and Richard Penn Smith were writing plays, with Boker just commencing: the North American, McMakin's Courier, and Scott's Weekly were circulated from it broadcast; among its publishers were such men as Carey & Hart and Blanchard & Lea; in every department of design and literature Philadelphia rivalled where she did not lead. Now it is quite different. She has no serial publications of any rank. Peterson, Arthur and Godey are the best she can do—whining or womanish collections of nothing. Her daily press is either the baseless sensational like the Inquirer, the high and dry moral like the Bulletin and North American, or the nattering and negatively clever Press. The best journal she publishes is a Sunday one. Her book trade is engrossed by semi-reputabilities like T. B. Peterson, or jobbers like George W. Childs, or "manufacturers" like the Lippincotts. Leyboldt, her foreign importer, comes this week to New York, tired of a town where the people patronize poets like Sallie Bridges, Montclair and George H. Boker; philosophers as voluminously incomprehensible as Henry C. Carey; essayists like Shelton Mackenzie, and novelists no more sufferable than T. S. Arthur.

In a word, Philadelphia has sold out art to shoddy, and with oil on the brain has nothing else to show. In reporting the war she has been beaten by Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis journals, and since Charles G. Leland contemplates going back to her, I don't see how she can ever recover status.

Let me take up some of her litterati in order:

George H. Boker is a wealthy man, the son of a banker, whose right to his fortune is now being disputed in court; the old man left George about $300,000, which he is said to have made to the prejudice of the Girard Bank. As Boker is a "club" man and moves in the upper strata, he is necessarily extravagant. Probably he is worth at present not half his original legacy. He has had within two weeks his small scandal as well, to the annoyance of his handsome but not beautiful wife—as being a poet, though an indifferent one, he fell in love with somebody else for a spell, and got the case in the Sunday papers. He lives on Walnut street, where the fossil but not the Quaker aristocracy are most populous. As a poet he used to rank very well, his Calymos and other dramas being excellent; but, since he became the poet of the Loyal League, has written altogether the trashiest and most unpardonable stanzas of any war. I think his lyric of "Cavalry Sheridan," beneath ballad-mongrely. Personally, Boker is good-looking; his flaxen hair is worn in ringlets like a Teuton Hyperion; he has a clear, kind eye, and, excepting his disposition to wed the Muses and put on airs at the same time, would make either a courteous gentleman or a newspaper poet. Morton McMichael used to be the ablest journalist in Pennsylvania, but more caustic and less scrupulous men like John W. Forney have superseded him. Forney is held in jealous esteem by these older folks, who cannot see why the sceptre is gliding from their hands. McMichael's newspaper pays nothing; his sons are in the United States service; he lives respectably, but not as he would wish, and between the anxiety of himself and Forney to go to the United States Senate, neither of them will probably ever go. At the same time, McMichael has much grave ability, and is one of the pleasantest gentlemen whom I have ever met. The real editor of the North American is John D. Watson, a brother of Henry Watson of your Sacramento Union. John is not so spirited a writer as Henry but equally industrious, and had he more of the discontentedness of journalism, would have been very far on the way to high influence ere this. Jones, surnamed William, is the local and sketchy genius of the North American, a man of all the perverseness of genius, the only dashing reporter outside of New York, but entirely too metropolitan to suit a city where the people hold business bustle to be bad for their heads.

Forney, of whom I have spoken, has bought for ninety-odd thousand dollars a new Chestnut street office for his Press newspaper. The Press is the most extravagantly conducted journal in the country. Its editor, John Young, is enterprising and adroit, but mistaken in the supposition that he can get up a London Times in a city without commerce. A great newspaper in the Quaker town would be like a Pyramid in a desert. Forney himself is an unweariedly erratic journalist, with a marvellously nervous constitution, and a splendid didactic style; but his ambition is that of Prometheus, fluctuating between the altar of heaven and the buzzard. For his political tombstone they ought to set up an angle worm, which both twists and wriggles. John D. Stockton is the managing editor of the Press, a coldly-accomplished man, brother to a former famous clergyman. He is a poet, wit, musician, essayist, linguist, critic, ad omnium, but never enthusiastic. He is brilliant as an icicle; some of his articles in the Atlantic and Vanity Fair have been markedly magnificent, which is as big an epithet as I can reach without my Thesaurus. Among Stockton's friends—and he is beloved though so undemonstrative—are Kaue O'Donnel and John A. Dorgan, the two most creditable poets of Philadelphia. Dorgan's poems have been said by Ralph Waldo Emerson to be the best of any young writer extant. They have a mysticism of longing about them which makes them seem profound, dim yearnings without any regret, a sort of æsthetic struggle for what the poet does not himself see, with now and then a rhapsody over some ideal being of equal intangibility. If this criticism has not quite tangled you up, you will know what I mean without a latch key.

But for the present I must stop on Philadelphia, and give it a large slice next week.

Among the art and literary news I get from my Paris correspondent, are these: The Misses Bertolecci are engraving Turner's Rivers of England. Turner's pictures, by the way, are rapidly fading, losing their wonderful atmospheric inexplicabilities. He like other folks experimented in pigments, and he hanged to him! The Irish are to have an international Exhibition at Dublin; Munich, Dusseldorf, Vienna and Paris contribute. The Irish have now no national painter. Architecture is looking up; a Mr. Burges has been measuring the various proportions of continental cathedrals in order to help current builders; probably his calculations will aid somebody to build a bank like the Florentine Duomo, or an arcade and eating saloon like the Pisan Campo Santo. Voltaire's heart, in a casket, has been deposited, by the Emperor's order, in the Bibliotheque Imperiale. They put it in a casket to keep it from exhaling poison and so upsetting the Empire. Prussia, also, is to have a great exhibition at Stettin. They ought to show the Prince of Augustenberg and the empty skull of the great Frederick; the present King's cranium is equally empty, but Bismarck can supply enough superfluous spleen to fill it. Capt. Marryatt's daughter has written a novel called Love's Conflict, which Bentley of London is publishing. Bentley is a great Pagoda hen among publishers, devouring everything from grain to gravel. The Pall Mall Gazette, named after a pseudo serial in Thackeray, is soon to be issued in the Flunkey capital, devoted, some say, to high pressure Toryism. Richard Thompson, a librarian and antiquarian of note in London, is dead. The "Ceramic Art Union" of London is carrying fine designing into the realm of flower-pots and cigar-ash vases. A little earthenware candlestick has been bought for the Kensington Museum for $37,000. There is appreciation for you! Where are Robinson Crusoe and his baked jars and frying pans? The British National Gallery is to be extended for a half square mile, to the detriment of a poor-house and a barrack, behind Trafalgar square. The present National Gallery looks like a lunatic asylum. Pictures by Tschaygany (how do you pronounce it?) and Landseer, ("The Maid and the Magpie") have been given to England. Landseer is worth £300,000. The Longmans are to publish a new book on the British Constitution by Earl Russell. Vincent Wallace, the composer, is very sick in Paris. "Balzac's Folly," as the novelist's chateau is called, has just been sold to a patent medicine maker named Jared; B. at one time lived for twelve cents a day. He bought the big chateau when rich and consequential. Talleyrand's descendant and heir, the Duke de Montmorency, has just had a sword duel with the Duke de la Rochefoucauld; both were badly wounded. Gibson, the British sculptor, and the patron of Miss Hattie Hosmer, has given £32,000 and casts of his bad marbles to England. Bolton Corney (a name for a comedy) has written a book with a title for a comedy, "Argument on the Assumed Birthday of Shakspeare." Jenny Lind Goldschmidt's husband has written a novel called The Heir. Albert Cohn, a High Dutchman, has written an essay on Shakspeare. He won't beat Schlegel. Shirley Brooks has written most of the eulogies upon John Leech. The Mayor of Wexford, Ireland, at a suggestion from Mrs. S. C. Hall, has put up a marble slab in front of the house where Tom Moore's mother was born. S. C. Hall writes the grotesque recollections—neither fish nor flesh—in the Atlantic Monthly; his wife lectures. Both of them are very old and Spiritualists; they were communicants with D. D. Home, the medium. I saw Home in London in 1863, a short, chatty, imperturbable Scotchman, who lived in Hanover Square in fine apartments, and was a confirmed sensualist. He married a Russian General's daughter and got much money with her. The Pope turned him out of Rome for his licentiousness. He has a splendid head of flaxen hair, and a bad eye. Cornelius the great German painter is very ill. He is eighty years old, and had received, at the date of my advices, Extreme Unction. The King probably wants him to die on his bosom, to make a tableau like that of Leonardi de Vinci and Francis I. The Imperial Bibliotheque in Paris contains five million books, MSS. and maps. Two millions of these are printed books. The libretto of Meyerbeer's Africane, of which Madame Scribe has charge, is being issued by two of Scribe's pupils. Louis Kramer, playing King Lear at Geneva, swallowed some of his artificial beard, choked and expired. It would take an entire hair pillow to choke Mr. Forrest. The lost books of the annals of Tacitus have been found at Catania. A pedlar, at Lille, France, bought a picture for a song, which proved to be a genuine Greuze, and made him rich. A Christmas pantomime at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, lately cost $45,000; the masks for it, one hundred in number, cost $20 each; they were made of wax; probably the original faces which they covered, were not worth so much by the year. A leg in a pantomime is of more consequence than a face, as I understand it. Gersterbergh, a Bavarian swindler, has been forging Schiller manuscripts, some of which were bought by Schiller's daughter. One Professor Dielitz exposed him and he went to jail. All this shows that genius is very mistakable; the title-page is half of success. A hundred and fifty-seven thousand of Renan's Life of Christ has been sold up to the last of December, 1864, making a return of $92,000; in this country Renan would have obtained upon so great a sum only nine thousand dollars; there his profits were about $40,000. A Jewish paper at Mayence, Germany, has prosecuted a Catholic bishop for inciting the people to persecute the race of Israel. As Auguste Belmont has gone to the other side he may back up the journalist. Auguste was in company with General McClellan—steel and gold in partnership! Auguste's picture gallery in New York remains open in his absence. The Count de Lanture, a Frenchman, has issued an exciting narrative of captivity in China. The humanitarian lawyer Beccaria, of Milan, has had a statue erected to his memory in that city. Tennyson's poems in sixpenny selections are being issued in England; advertisers in it get their "ads" in the first thirty thousand only. William E. Fowle, a clerk in Little and Brown's Boston book-house, has realized fourteen thousand dollars upon an investment of nine thousand in antique and other books. He has them bound in costly leathers with wide margins to suit the fever, and then stimulates the know-nothings to take them off his hands; he reminds me of Grolier the London binder, who got $156 for a worthless volume in fine vellum. John Turner, of Chester, England, formerly a journeyman printer, has left a great many legacies to Methodist publishing concerns. There are two Methodist papers in New York, always at outs, the Advocate and Journal and the Methodist; the latter is the ablest; the former sells the best, as it is backed up by the revenues of the church.

Now for a crop of p's: M. Silvestre, a Parisian journalist, has pulled a pistol upon M. Pic—in other words, picked a quarrel with him; he is to be prosecuted for carrying arms. Pic is a writer, probably for the Picayune.

I will close up this budget of many facts by quoting a poem of John A. Dorgan's, to whom I have referred elsewhere. It is not remarkable; but a little poem is a good thing to stop with. It is easier than turning a nice sentence, which I may be troubled to do, as I have a pipe waiting for me. It is an imitation of Heine, inscribed to the imitators of Tennyson, and is quite new:

I know not why it should vex me
That all the fools are not dead;
But their pitiful fate reminds me
Of a legend that all have read.

But none of them understood it,
Though its meaning methinks is plain;
And I turn its verse to prose for them,
Though my labor may prove in vain.

A great and glorious poet
In England lives to-day,
Worthy to rank with the shining ones
Of ages far away.

To all their lore he has added
A secret which none may guess;
And his song has a wilder sweetness,
A mystical loveliness.

The poet, when once he listens
That weird and tender lay,
Forgets himself and his purpose,
And is carried far away.

No more shall he his his spirit,
Quenched in the light of that sun;
And this, with his wild, sweet singing,
The Laureate has done.

And so endeth, when you have had my signature.

DESULTORY.

MANY fashionable women who pretend to belong to the unadulterated-ton have just claims; they represent the simple-ton.

WITH what disease are railers at life troubled? Complaint of the liver.

TU QUOQUE.

I THOUGHT that we twain together
In one night have blent our days;
If under no light of passion,
Yet in safer, shadier ways:
Or never, be sure, that evening,
Yourself had I dared to claim;
So I thought: some day, proud maiden,
You may wish you had thought the same.

'Tis true, I am grave and silent,
You, light as a bird on wing;
But there's strength in the latter summer,
And only a promise in spring;
And I thought that our differing natures
Would have linked in the wedded name;
So I thought: some day, proud maiden,
You may wish you had thought the same.

There are gales that change in an instant
Still seem to foaming snow;
And I thought I would be your pilot
If ever those gales should blow;
I'd have guarded you, oh! so safely,
Against all ill that came;
So I thought: some day, proud maiden,
You may wish you had thought the same.

THE BELLS OF LARA.

THE old square tower in the market-place of Lara contains a very remarkable peal of bells, three in number, and of immense size. They were cast about two hundred years ago, in the great old foundry of Lara, and they are never rung except on the occasion of the death of a Warden of Lara, when they are tolled in changes that make a very melancholy dirge. It is a common circumstance at Lara for some venerable narrator in the little circles that close round the firesides on a winter's night, to recount his memories of how awfully the bells in the old square tower spoke when the father of some present Warden died. He will tell how their tones have something in them resembling the human voice and how the affrighted sleepers used to wake up at the supernatural sound, and light their lamps to scare away any stray demons that might well be lurking in the air upon which such unearthly music was borne.

These bells of Lara have a legend of their own. Some say that an old grave-digger of the place, now long since passed away, recognized the voice that spoke in their sonorous chimes, and this brought to the fireside circles strong evidence of the truth of the legend, which I will recount.

The Wardens of Lara were for centuries the hereditary lords of the soil. Their wealth was derived from the mineral regions of the valley in which the old place nestles. Nearly everybody in Lara was connected with the huge foundries there, the works turned out from were famous for their excellence of manufacture and design.

About the year 1560, one Miguel Brontez was a superintendent of certain mines belonging to the Wardens of Lara. He was a man of active business habits and unimpeachable integrity, faithful in a stewardship of some years to an aged Warden, who died in the year mentioned, and was succeeded by a graceless and profligate son.

A well-to-do artisan belonging to the workshops had a daughter named Urna, who was accounted the fairest among the fair girls for whom Lara was rather celebrated. For some time the profligate young Warden had been laying siege to this plebeian beauty, with views that were the reverse of honorable, and his feelings of rage and malignity knew no bounds when he heard, one day, that Urna Castillo had just been united in the holy bonds of matrimony to Miguel Brontez.

But the sleuth-hound never leaves his quarry until he runs it down, and of such tenacity in his amours was the Warden of Lara. His efforts to gain the favor of Urna were now greater than ever. He sought, but in vain, to pave his way with gold. He deprived the young wife, at times, of her strong-armed protector, by sending Brontez away on shallow pretexts to the mountain mines. The Warden of Lara was a handsome man, and his vanity was stung to the quick by his want of success with one who, after all, was nothing more than a workman's wife!

Once, when Brontez returned to his home after an absence of some days at the mines, he found his fair young wife in tears. Reluctantly she confessed to him the cause of her grief. The persecution to which she had long been subjected was now, for the first time, divulged to him—for Urna knew that he was a man of quick temper and violent action when aroused by injury, and she feared some terrible result. Nor was that result long in coming. Next day Brontez met the Warden face to face in the iron yards, and, leaping upon him like a panther, felled him to the earth with a powerful blow.

Heaps of iron lay around the spot where this affair took place, so that the assault was not witnessed by any of the workmen. This gave Brontez a brief time for reflection as to what course he had best pursue. Terrible retribution, as he well knew, would be certain to fall upon him, whether the Warden recovered from the blow or died of it; and so, making his way from the yard, unobserved, he went by a circuitous route to his home, which he reached just as the shades of evening were deepening into night. Here he at once confided the whole situation of affairs to his wife, and, long before morning dawned, they were both on their way to a distant iron district, where Brontez, under an assumed name, hoped to obtain employment from the principal proprietor.

For about a year they lived here in comparative safety—a happy state of affairs which was destined soon to be brought to a close, however. The Warden of Lara had long since recovered from the blow inflicted upon him by the injured husband—pursuit after whom he, with hypocritical show of leniency, forbade—the reality of the case being that he feared provoking certain disclosures which would not have been creditable to himself. In course of time a matrimonial alliance was arranged between him and a daughter of the wealthy proprietor with whom Brontez and his wife had found refuge. Certain business affairs rendered it necessary for him to make a visit to the father of his intended bride, and, while inspecting the works in company with his host, he recognized Brontez among the overseers who were going to and fro there, and resolved to work his ruin.

It is unnecessary to recount the process by which the Warden ousted the unfortunate overseer from his employer's confidence. Suffice it to say that Brontez was dismissed, and, thrown once more upon the world, wavered away with his wife to a distant town, where, for a while, he managed to make a poor subsistence by such precarious employment as he could obtain. But an evil spell appeared to pursue him even here. Broken down by hardship and poverty, his wife died, and Brontez, now a reckless and broken-hearted man, disappeared from the place, and it was rumored that he had committed suicide. Later reports went that he had joined a band of robbers in the mountains that tower over Lara, but soon the matter was forgotten, altogether, and his name was heard no more.

Meanwhile, certain family affairs rendered necessary a postponement of the Warden's marriage with the wealthy young heiress of the iron-works. A year had elapsed since his visit to her father, and the time was now at hand when the long-talked-of alliance was to take place. To give proper eclat to the occasion, the Warden ordered the casting of three great bells, the amalgam of which was to be of a quality capable of producing chimes of musical tone. These bells were to be hung in the old tower, and their voices were to be heard, for the first time, on the occasion of the Warden's marriage.

The day for casting the bells had arrived. A mighty tank for containing the molten metal had been constructed in the iron-yard, and by a curious coincidence, on the very spot where, long before, the Warden had fallen to the ground, stunned and bleeding, from the blow administered to him by the infuriated overseer. The tank was full of the seething metal, which worked and bubbled angrily, like some lake of molten silver about to burst its banks. The moment for filling the moulds had come, but was delayed for the arrival of the Warden, who was to have witnessed the process. Just then, a difficulty with some machinery in a distant part of the yard summoned away all the workmen except one, who was left to watch the boiling metal.

On the return of the workmen, Jaquez, the watcher, was found lying upon some blocks of iron, in a fit. Restoratives were at once applied, but it was some time before he recovered consciousness, and then it was perceived that the power of speech had departed from him. His hair was blanched to a silvery whiteness, and the vacant wandering of his eyes denoted that reason had lost her sway. Some of the workmen said that Jaquez had long been subject to epileptic fits. Others shook their heads, and whispered, in hushed accents, of spells of witchcraft and Satanic influences. The poor imbecile was taken care of, and the work went on.

The Warden failed to make his appearance. No further time could be allowed, for the metal was at boiling pitch. The chief overseer gave the signal, and the bells were cast.

The Warden never made his appearance. High and low they searched for him, far and near, but he never was seen again by mortal eye, and many were the occult influences adverted to by the superstitious workmen to account for his disappearance.

The succession to the Wardenship fell upon a brother of the one who had so unaccountably vanished, and who was believed, by his relatives, to have committed suicide in one of his moody fits by precipitating himself down the shaft of some forgotten mine. One of the first acts of the new Warden was to have the great bells hung in the tower for which they were originally destined, but strict orders were issued that no test should be made of their tone, the first trial of which the new proprietor chose to have deferred until fate should throw in his way some fair damsel, his alliance with whom would be appropriately celebrated with joyful chimes on the wedding-bells.

Nevertheless, it so happened that the new Warden was never married. He died, though, about ten years after his succession to the estate, and it was at his funeral that the bells were tolled for the first time. This was done by order of the next successor, who ordained that the bells should be rung henceforth at the funerals of the Wardens of Lara, and on no other occasions whatever.

And, on the day of the funeral, a strange circumstance took place in the little asylum for decayed workmen belonging to the foundries of Lara. An old imbecile, named Jaquez, who had been an inmate of the place for many years, became suddenly restored to reason as the sad tolling of the bells vibrated upon his ears. He was on his death-bed then, but, feeble though he was, he spoke for the first time since his admission to the asylum, and, alluding to things of ten years past as though they had happened but yesterday, made in substance the following statement to the listeners who now crowded eagerly around him.

Jaquez, as I have stated, was left alone to watch the tank of boiling metal on the occasion of the casting of the bells. A minute or two after the departure of the other workmen the Warden made his appearance, having entered the yard by a postern-gate that communicated with the grounds of the castle. He was in high glee, and in the act of addressing some condescending banter to Jaquez, when the latter saw approaching from among the heaps of iron a wild, unearthly figure, clad in the skins of beasts, and his long, matted locks tangled with weeds and briars; so paralyzed with terror was Jaquez that his tongue lost all power, and he was unable to give the alarm. In a moment the maniac—for such he appeared to be—confronted the Warden, and with the words, "Miguel Brontez greets you!" struck him to the earth with a crushing blow, and then, raising him in his arms, plunged him bodily into the seething bell metal, in which he was dissolved to instant annihilation. Then the maniac fled with the speed of a beast of prey, and of him there is no further record on earth.

Jaquez, as I have said, was a speechless idiot from that hour to the moment of his death. At the casting of the Bells of Lara, therefore, none were aware of the terrible amalgam fused in their metal; but is it a wonder that their chimes in the night should startle the sleepers, wakening them to a dim horror of demon-voices in the air?—Charles Dawson Shanty, in the New York Leader.

CALCRAFT THE HANGMAN.

THE name of Calcrafft has become famous the world over as that of the great English hangman. As a professional "Jack Ketch," by long practice he has acquired such a delicacy of touch—a refinement of manipulation in stringing up and stragulating the victims of justice that the criminals ought to, if they are not, be grateful that their mortal coil can be shuffled off so scientifically.

Some English wit once asserted in a London journal that if all the malefactors that has been elongated by the application of Calcrafft is one which may not be uninteresting:

"Society owes to Calcrafft its pity, not its contempt, for the awful situation it places him in among his fellow men by its barbarous institution of public executions. It punishes not him alone, but a fine family, of which he is the parent. As an illustration of this fact, it has been related to us on good authority that a young mechanic who courted one of his daughters, ignorant of her family at the time, had an invitation to meet her and partake of supper at a friend's house. The appointed night came, and the young woman with a goodly number of friends of both sexes, were assembled, anxiously waiting the arrival of her lover. At length he was announced, and on entering the room was joyfully saluted by his sweetheart and the rest of the company, who welcomed him to the seat of honor at the supper table. All round were smiling, happy faces; and now love-jokes were bandied from one to the other, as the smoking viands were set before them. The young lover made himself at home, and vowed he was the happiest of the happy. Each guest showed the politest attention to his neighbor, and the host bid the stranger help himself to the best of the feast. Every one was served, and about to eat and drink right merrily, when hark! footsteps are heard on the stairs, the door, already half open, shows approaching from the dark landing the figure of a stout man of middle height, with remarkably determined-looking features, rather pock-marked, fair hair, and peering, bluish grey eyes, who, on approaching the light, is announced by his name, and saluted 'Father' by the young woman sitting beside the invited stranger, whose features now assume a corpse-like paleness as the startling fact suddenly flashed across his dizzy brain that he had been courting the hangman's daughter!—that he was going to sit at the table with him, eat of the same joint, drink out of the same glass, and perhaps be asked to shake hands with him! It was horror to him. He trembled in every limb, was speechless, became seized with sickness and bowel complaint. At last, summoning all his rapidly-failing strength into one superhuman effort ere he fell, with one sudden bound he ineffectually tried to jump over the table towards the door, and, overturning in all directions the dainty repast, escaped down stairs. The force of prejudice had made the sight of the hangman to this young man like a frightful apparition."

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens in California accompany every bottle.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere

ja25-1f

GRIDLEY'S CELEBRATED

Salt Rheum Ointment!

POSITIVELY

A SAFE, CERTAIN AND FINAL CURE

—FOR—

Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Scrofulous Ulcers, Ring Worms,

OBSTINATE OLD SORES,

Of long standing, and almost every variety of Cutaneous Disease.

PRICE, FIFTY CENTS.

Directions and Certificates within.

Prepared by

MRS. A. GRIDLEY,

Sole Successor to the Original Inventor and Proprietor, AUBURN, N. Y.

CURE GUARANTEED IN ALL CASES. TRY IT, AND BE CONVINCED.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO.,

Agents, 416 and 418 Front street,

SAN FRANCISCO

ja25-1f

MIRACULOUS, INDEED!

DE GRATH'S GENUINE

ELECTRIC OIL!

CURES DEAFNESS AND PAIN IN TWENTY MINUTES

Price, Fifty Cents per Bottle.

This Oil is the only sure Remedy in the world, for the cure of Rheumatism, Deafness, Pain in the Back, Breast or Side, Palpitation of the Heart, Paralysis, Toothache, Headache, Cramps, Scrofula, Frosted Hands and Feet, Sore Eyes, Piles, Sprains, Bruises, Burns, Stiffness in the Joints, Tetters, Salt Rheum, Neuralgia, and all diseases sore and painful. It is used by thousands daily. Cures perfectly in twenty minutes.

For sale by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,

ja25 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL!

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roseate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

Sold by all Druggists.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,

416 and 418 Front street,

San Francisco.

a25-1f

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the mucus or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

au27

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

au27

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT UNEQUALLED PREPARATION

FOR RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING AND DRESSING

THE Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicate dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,

Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,

Corner of Clay San Francisco.

A BAD BREATH!

The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted! The subject is so delicate, that your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF A THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Sold by all Druggists.

CAUTION—None genuine unless signed "Petridge & Co."

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,

Agents, San Francisco.

ja25-1f

BREWSTER & CO'S

Carriage Manufactory,

372 Broome street, New York.

We desire to announce to our California friends that we have made extensive arrangements by increasing our works for the coming season, and with a view to

SUPPLYING THE

WANTS OF CALIFORNIA,

will manufacture a style of work particularly adapted to city and country use, and in view of the destructive effects of city railroads on all light work, will give

PARTICULAR ATTENTION

to remedying the evil, and guard against it in work shipped to California.

We will continue to manufacture

THE BEST WORK THAT CAN BE MADE, and solicit the continued patronage of our California friends, which branch of trade

WILL BE MADE A SPECIALITY.

CARRIAGES, BUGGIES, PHAETONS, COUPES, and Vehicles of every description, of our own manufacture, on hand and made to order.

Orders or communications should be addressed to

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of Broome street,

The firm of Brewster & Baldwin not being in any way connected with

BREWSTER & CO.,

Of No. 372, Broome street,

del7-5m

NEW YORK.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE Reduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent,

Southeast corner of Montgomery and California street, San Francisco. del7-5m

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

Now No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 17

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers

Fine Clothing

GENTLEMEN'S

FURNISHING GOODS,

TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,

200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush, SAN FRANCISCO.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

CREATE A HEALTHY APPETITE!

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure Dyspepsia, Diarrhoea and Constipation.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Invigorate the System and enliven the mind.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Overcome the effects of Drunkenness and Late Hours.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Cure all Diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels.

ROSENBAUM'S BITTERS

Are Palatable to the Taste.

They are the

BEST BITTERS IN THE MARKET,

And when once used will always be called for again.

They are made in the most careful manner

From Pure Old Wheat Whisky, Medicated from Roots and Herbs

Especially adapted for the cure of all Stomachic Diseases and Liver Complaints.

Try Them and You will be Satisfied.

For sale everywhere by Druggists and Liquor Dealers or by

N. B. JACOBS & CO.,

423 Front street,

San Francisco.

fel1-6m

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constantly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES,

adapted to private use, from the celebrated manufacturers of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of

SUPERIOR CARRIAGES,

ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

ja15 316 California street, San Francisco.

I. D. THOMPSON'S

WINE ROOMS,

ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING,

No. 321 MONTGOMERY STREET, (a few doors below California.)

Dealer in the choicest Brands of WINES and LIQUORS, and Importer of PURE OLD BOURBON WHISKEY.

Families, Passenger Clubs and Parties supplied promptly, and all Goods delivered free of charge.

fel4-3m

I. D. THOMPSON, Proprietor

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

WE have been without news nearly all the week, the wires having been down since Sunday last. Thursday afternoon the signal-flag was hoisted over the telegraph office, but, after a few private despatches had been transmitted, the line ceased working. The appended private telegram published by the Alta is all that thus far has reached the public through the press, but the streets were full of rumors last evening: Richmond had been evacuated; there was a cessation of hostilities prior to arrangements for peace, etc., etc. As we go to press the wires again commence to work:

March 14.—The Herald's Washington special states that a letter from Schofield's headquarters, dated Newbern, 11th, says:

"This morning Hoke attempted to break our lines, but was repulsed with terrible slaughter. Our own loss is not more than 300 or 400 killed and wounded. The rebel loss in killed, wounded and prisoners is eight times greater. We have possession of the field and the rebel dead and wounded are in our hands."

It is definitely settled that Sherman reached Fayetteville, N. C., and was at last dates preparing for a further march. It is said that Schofield will immediately join him.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Herald, writing from Newbern under date of March 12th, says:

"Yesterday the enemy fell back across the Neuse river, after burning the bridge over that stream. It is reported they also destroyed the rebel ram at the same, which was guarding the bridge. Timber is now going forward to rebuild this bridge. The road is completed to within a short distance of the railroad opposite Kinston. The enemy will not be able to remain in Kinston long, even should they decide to make another stand, of which there is much doubt. Deserters and refugees continue to come into our lines. Our troops are in high spirits over the prospects of meeting Sherman soon. General Sherman has opened communication with Wilmington from Fayetteville, and sends word that he is all right, and marching on. We expect to hear gratifying news from him in a few days."

Sheridan has been making some extraordinary raids around Richmond. The last rumors from him were that he had passed Burke's Station, the junction of the Petersburg and Lynchburg and Richmond and Danville roads, and had gone either to Sherman or Grant.

March 15.—A despatch dated Newbern the 11th, says that the prisoners taken by the rebels in front of Kinston, had been recaptured, that General Terry has formed a junction with our forces there, and that Sherman was expected in the rear of the rebels at Goldsboro on the 11th or 12th. A despatch from Fortress Monroe to the Navy Department merely announced that Kinston is in our possession, but gives no particulars.

Jerome Clarke, alias Sue Mundy, was hanged on the afternoon of the 15th, in pursuance of the sentence of a military commission at Louisville.

Letters from the Department of the Gulf indicate that the expedition against Mobile has already commenced operations.

The Alta of the 24th publishes the following "private" despatch:

St. Louis, March 23d.

During telegraphic interruption, a very important message of Jeff. Davis was transmitted to the rebel Congress. He admits Richmond to be more in danger now than ever; urges the seizure of all the coin in the Confederacy, the suspension of the habeas corpus, and a sweeping impressment law. He says the negro-arming bill came too late, as the negroes are beyond reach, and reprimands the rebel Congress for neglect to comply with his recommendations. The whole tone is exceedingly lugubrious and despairing, and all the journals in the North regard it as a remarkable admission of weakness and a preparation for averting charges that Davis is responsible for the failure of the Confederacy.

Charles Bewer, a German, aged thirty years, died suddenly on Monday of heart disease. He had been employed at a saloon on Davis street, and opened the place at an early hour that morning; about eight o'clock he went to breakfast; he complained of faintness soon after reaching home, and laid down; in a few minutes he was dead. A large number of deaths have occurred in this city and State from disease of the heart during the past two years; there is something in the frequency of these sudden deaths worthy the attention of our learned doctors. What are the causes? what the preventives? is the climate of California at fault, or are the people especially imprudent? A plain treatise—one that could be read and understood by men of ordinary education without the aid of more than four dictionaries—on this subject, by one of our many competent physicians, would be very welcome at this time, and we respectfully call attention to its importance.

The judgment of the Twelfth District Court in the case of David T. Batchelder, (convicted of manslaughter in the Farallone egg war,) has been reversed by the Supreme Court. Pending this order, Batchelder has been pardoned by the Governor; the new trial granted, therefore, will not be had.

LOCAL MATTERS.

Kenny & Stevens have been awarded a contract for the construction of fire cisterns at the intersection of California and Davis and Fremont and Mission streets, at $1,150 each.

The jury in the case of Supervisor Alfred H. Cummings, indicted for bribery, returned a verdict, after a very brief absence from the Court, of acquittal.

Jemmy Kennovnn "walked his great feat" sixty hours successively and successfully; they were found to be greater at the conclusion of the exercises, (12 o'clock Sunday night last,) than at the commencement, but probably as he pocketed his reward, the wager for which he had been travelling, he felt well recompensed for the pain of his enlarged pedals. Jimmy is fifty-two years old, and with a constitution impaired by exposure and toil, his achievement is worthy of note.

The Oakland Railroad Company has purchased the ferry boats Oakland and San Antonio, formerly called the "Larne Line." These boats will leave hourly; they will land at their old place in Oakland, but will run from the Company's wharf (Broadway) in this city. The fare has been raised to twenty-five cents, the same price charged on the Washoe and Louise, which run to the railroad wharf. The San Francisco and Alameda Railroad and Ferry line also charges twenty-five cents; so there is no longer any difference in the expense of reaching the various points of attraction across the Bay.

The ship Derby arrived from Hongkong, Tuesday, with two hundred Chinamen and a few white passengers. Sixteen persons on board were sick with small-pox. For a time there was considerable alarm felt that the disease would extend itself to the city, but the prompt action of the authorities soon gave a guarantee of safety. The patients were taken from the vessel in lighters and landed above Hunter's Point, from whence they were taken to the Pest House on the Potrero, a mile and a half beyond the first toll-gate on the San Bruno road. A police officer has been placed on the vessel, and the passengers not yet infected are compelled to remain until it becomes certain that they cannot spread the contagion. The Derby is now anchored off Hunter's Point.

The Court of Inquiry convened by Maj.-Gen. McDowell to investigate the charges made by various persons against Lieut. Felix O'Byrne, and to inquire into his fitness for the position of Regimental Quartermaster, held its first session on Monday last, and has adjourned from day to day since. The Court is constituted as follows: Col. A. S. Allen, President; Lieut.-Col. Robert Pollock, Maj. Alfred Morton, Capt. Eugene B. Gibbs and Capt. Jas. Ulio, the last named acting as Recorder. W. Hays, Esq., counsel for O'Byrne, objected to the receipt of testimony relative to transactions prior to the appointment as Quartermaster; the President ruled that such testimony must be heard, as the object was simply to frame an opinion (not to pass sentence) as to the officer's merits and fitness for the position, to be transmitted to the War Department. Since this point was settled, business has progressed more rapidly. We have not space for a report in detail; the most important evidence yet given is that of A. S. Evans, on Wednesday. He testifies that he was a fellow-laborer with O'Byrne in the editorial department of the Alta from December, 1863, to March, 1864; that O'Byrne on many occasions and in a manner highly offensive expressed unfriendliness to the American Government, and declared himself a British subject, and that he would never become a citizen; that we had shown the worthlessness of our claim to Republican Government by denying to the South the right of free government which she claimed; the witness narrates the annoyances to which the "staff" of the Alta were subjected in consequence of the visits of O'Byrne's creditors, the inference being that the delay in adjusting their demands was not excusable on the score of inability to pay; finally he (the witness) made complaint to Mr. MacCrellish, their employer, in regard to the anti-American language used by O'Byrne, and received the assurance that, having become convinced that O'B. was disloyal, his services would be dispensed with. The investigation will probably occupy several days more. It is intimated that Lieut. O'Byrne suggested the inquiry; if so, he doubtless has testimony to introduce which will vindicate his character for loyalty and establish his worthiness to occupy a post of trust and honor.

The officers of the Mechanics' Institute are making praiseworthy efforts to improve the library of the society by the addition of such books as the tastes and wants of its members call for. An order was recently sent East for one thousand volumes of standard and miscellaneous works. The list was made up from sub-lists furnished by members generally.

Trout are abundant in the creeks and branches flowing into Clear Lake, and the citizens of the valley are having plenty of sport as well as the choicest repasts.

A man named Smith was killed, a few days since, on Scott river, by the caving of the roof of a tunnel.

OUR INTERIOR CORRESPONDENCE.

NEVADA, March 21st, 1865.

EDITOR CALIFORNIAN.—The climate of Marysville not having a very beneficial effect on my somewhat delicate constitution, I took the advice of a medical friend and came to the mountains to recuperate. Having settled with my landlady to her entire satisfaction, (I wish that point clearly understood,) I embarked on board one of the California Company's stages, booked for Grass Valley. Travelling by stage is not my favorite mode, but in this case I had no choice, other than to foot it; and not yet being imbued with that love of pedestrianism which my trans-Atlantic friend, Wilkie Collins, so highly lauds, I concluded to risk my life, limbs and carpet-bag in one of the aforesaid stages.

The roads, owing to the recent rains, were in a terrible condition. But, nevertheless, we managed to get along pretty fairly as we had good teams and vigilant drivers, for which, as one of the humblest of the travelling public, I tender my most sincere thanks to Mr. J. Haworth, the president of the line.

The first six miles of the road winds through a part of the country not at all remarkable for scenic attractions, but after that it decidedly improves, and there are some spots that would employ the pencil of an artist to advantage. Very soon, however, the traveller's attention is directed to the mines, in the working of which great activity is shown in this section. If the accounts that I have heard are at all to be relied upon, this is one of the richest mining sections in the country, and many of those who contemplate going to Idaho, or British America in search of "metal," would do well to pay a visit to Nevada county. There are a couple of claims about which I took particular pains to enquire, that are returning the owners almost princely fortunes. One of these is the Blue Gravel, situated in the neighborhood of Smartsville; it has only been in operation I understand, since July last, but from it the owners are already reaping a handsome income. They clean up every five or six weeks and the results give from 60,000 to 90,000 dollars. About 30 men are employed, and their tunnel, about 1,500 feet long, was built at a cost of $75,000. They get their water from the Trionian canal, which is fed by the South Yuba and conveys the water a distance of 35 miles. A Mr. Pearce, who is now in San Francisco, is the principal owner of this rich lead.

The "Union" and the "Blue Point" claims are also said to be very rich, the former using a flume a mile and a half long. In fact, throughout this region, where they have scarcely commenced to prospect for quartz mining, the claims are of the most profitable kind. Prospecting parties are constantly going out from Grass Valley and the adjoining towns, and almost every day some new lead is struck which promises healthy workings. I believe that it would be vastly to the advantage of a great many of those idlers who abound in San Francisco to take a trip to this part of the State, where they would stand a chance to "strike" something.

In consequence of this activity among the mines, business in all the towns in the neighborhood is looking up, with the exception, perhaps, of Rough and Ready, which place apparently has not recovered from the effects of the fire that almost totally destroyed it a few years ago. Grass Valley is considerable of a town and is quite lively. Business men anticipate a better season this summer than they have had for the last five years, and there is every prospect of their hopes being realized.

I must not omit to mention the grand ball that was given at Grass Valley, on St. Patrick's day, for the benefit of the Catholic Orphan Asylum, to be erected in this county. It was quite an event, and was largely attended by the inhabitants of that town, Nevada and other adjacent places. A fair sum was realized for the benevolent object, and the work of erection is to be commenced early next summer. This seems to be a healthy climate for newspapers; two flourish in Grass Valley, and two here in Nevada. I understand they are all doing tolerably well, especially those of Grass Valley, where an extreme diversity in politics adds considerably to their interest. But the National has a little the advantage of the Union, the political complexion of Grass Valley being decidedly Democratic.

The town of Nevada is by no means behind her rival in matters of mining interest and business. Besides, it is the county seat, and the new court house is decidedly a fine building, being pleasantly situated, well built and having all the "modern improvements." They are also erecting a theatre here, which will probably be finished in the early part of June next.

ROBIN HOOD.

THREE CONUNDRUMS.—Why should Africa be considered to rank first of the continents? Because it bears the palm.

What is dough like the sun? Because when it rises it is light.

Where did Noah preserve honey bees during the flood? In the ark hives of the old world, of course.

USEFUL INFORMATION.

DISTANCES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

To various points:

To Fort Point, 4 miles, by omnibus, four trips a day.
 Lone Mountain, 3, street railwav.
 Seal Rock, 6, cars and omnibus, two trips a day.
 Mission Dolores, street railways; Ocean House, 8.
 San Mateo, 20, railroad.
 Crystal Springs, 23, railroad and stage.
 Half-Moon Bay, 29, do. do.
 Redwood city, 30, do. do.
 Mountain View, 38, do. do.
 Santa Clara, 47, do. do.
 San Jose, 50, do., or steamer and stage, 54.
 Alviso, 46, steamer, daily.
 Almaden mines, 67, steamer and stage; or by railroad and stage, 64.
 Santa Cruz, 78, railroad and stage.
 Oakland, 8, steamer and railroad, six trips a day.
 Alameda, 11, steamer, three trips a day.
 San Leandro, 15, steamer and railroad.
 Mission San Jose, 34, steamer, railroad and stage.
 Warm Springs, 37, do. do.
 Beuicia, 30, steamer leaves at 4 P. M. daily.
 Sacramento, 117, do. do.
 Stockton, 117, do. do.
 Martinez, 33, do. do.
 Pacheco, 38, steamer and stage.
 Diablo Coal Mines, 44, steamer and stage.
 Suisun, 50, steamer, or 54 by steamer and stage.
 Vallejo, 28; Mare Island, 37; Napa city, 50.
 White Sulphur Springs, 67, stage from Napa.
 Geyser Springs, 118, do. do.
 Sonoma, 52, steamer, tri-weekly.
 Petaluma, 48, steamer, daily.
 Healdsburg, 80, stage daily from Petaluma.
 San Quentin, 12, steamer; Farallone Islands, 21.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Letters to any part of the United States, 3 cents for each 1 ounce or part thereof.
 Drop Letters, 2 cents.
 Advertised letters, 1 cent in addition to the regular rates.

Vuluable letters may be registered on application at the office of mailing, and the payment of 20 cents registration fee.

Transient newspapers, periodicals, blanks, proof-sheets, book manuscripts, pamphlets, and all mailable printed matter, except circulars and books, 2 cents for each and every 4 ounces. Double these rates are charged for books.

Unsealed circulars, to one address, not exceeding three in number, 2 cents, and in the same proportion for a greater number.

Seeds, cuttings, roots, etc., 2 cents for each 4 ounces or less quantity.

All packages of mail matter not charged with letter postage must be so arranged that the same can be conveniently examined by Postmasters; if not, letter postage will be charged.

No package will be forwarded by mail which weighs over 4 pounds.

All postage matter, for delivery within the United States, must be prepaid by stamps (except duly certified letters of soldiers and sailors); otherwise, double the above rates will be charged on delivery.

Weekly newspapers (one copy only) sent to actual subscribers within the county where printed and published, free.

Letters to Canada and other British North American Provinces, when not over 3,000 miles, 10 cents for each 1 ounce. When over 3,000 miles, 15 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to Great Britain or Ireland, 24 cents. Prepayment optional.

Letters to France, 15 cents for each 1 ounce. Prepayment optional.

Letters to other foreign countries vary in rate according to the route by which they are sent.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
 Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
 645 Washington st., San Francisco.

BOOK-KEEPING.

All branches necessary to a complete BUSINESS EDUCATION, taught PRACTICALLY and THOROUGHLY, by J. S. LUTY, Professor of Book-keeping and Penmanship, 305 Montgomery street, San Francisco. Rooms open day and evening. fe4-3m

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupees, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jovian's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHERS HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
 'y30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupils of Charrriere of Paris, Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical Instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

WILD CHERRY,

A CURE FOR EVERY FORM OF

Pulmonary Complaint!

COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CROUP,
 WHOOPING COUGH, SPITTING OF BLOOD,
 LIVER COMPLAINT, etc., etc.

Consumption,

Which carries off more victims than any other disease, and which baffles the skill of the Physician to a greater extent than any other malady, often

YIELDS TO THIS REMEDY,
 when all others prove ineffectual.

AS A MEDICINE,

Rapid in relief, soothing in effect, safe in its operation, it is

UNSURPASSED!

while as a preparation, free from noxious ingredients, poisons or minerals; uniting skill, science and medical knowledge, combining all that is valuable in the vegetable kingdom for this class of disease, it is

INCOMPARABLE!

and is entitled, merits and receives the enviable appellation of the

INVALID'S FRIEND.

Sold by all druggists and by

REDINGTON & CO.,

No. 416 and 418 Front street,
 mh4-tf San Francisco.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE!

FORTY YEARS' EXPERIENCE

Has fully established the superiority of

Redding's Russia Salve

Over all other preparations

FOR THE CURE OF

Scalds,
 Burns, Cuts,
 Flesh Wounds, Boils,
 Chilblains, Blisters, Bruises,
 Felons, Piles, Erysipelas, Ulcers,
 Salt Rheum, Injuries by Splinters, Warts,
 Old Sores, Ring Worm, Frost-Bitten Parts,
 AND ALL CUTANEOUS DISEASES AND ERUPTIONS
 GENERALLY.

REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE

is prompt in action, removes pain at once, and reduces the most angry-looking swellings and inflammations, as if by magic—thus affording relief and a complete cure.

FOR SALE EVERYWHERE.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,

416 and 418 Front street,
 mh4-tf SAN FRANCISCO.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET,

BY

P. J. THOMAS, A. A. STICKNEY, AND JOHN COLLNER

C. H. WEBB, Editor.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"
 Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,
 SAN FRANCISCO.

VANDALL, CARR & CO.,

BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,

NO. 410 CLAY STREET,

(North side, between Sansome and Battery.

Particular attention paid to the printing of Briefs and Records. fe11-tf

PRINTING! PRINTING!!

DALY, GEORGE & CO.,

NO. 522 CLAY STREET,

Between Sansome and Montgomery, - - San Francisco

All Descriptions of JOB PRINTING done cheaper and as good as anywhere else in the city.
 fe4-tf

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING

HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates. BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STEEL COLLARS

LIGHT AS LINEN, and white as snow, readily cleaned with a damp towel; have been worn both in Europe and the Eastern States in preference to any Collars for the last three years.

For sale by S. W. H. WARD & SON,
 NEW YORK, 323 Montgomery street,
 387 Broadway, } San Francisco, Cal
 de31-3m

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison: HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.
 HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
 401 Battery, cor. Clay,
 ja25-tf San Francisco.

THE GREATEST OF VICTORIES.

THE

MOST DANGEROUS FOE ANNIHILATED

A PERFECT CURE FOR CATARRH!

DR. R. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

IS THE ACME OF PERFECTION!

For centuries Catarrh has defied the skill of Physicians and Surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. It is pronounced incurable by the Medical World, and people at large.

For over thirty years Dr. Goodale has battled with this fell disease. His TRIUMPH is complete. His Remedy and mode of treatment cures this terrible malady in all its types, forms and stages, with the same uniform certainty that water quenches fire. It is irresistible.

No Violent Syringing of the Head or other mal-practices resorted to.

The Disease cured by a Harmless Fluid inhaled from the Palm of the Hand.

No Exorbitant Fees for Advice. Instruction Free.

Price One Dollar per Bottle. Send a stamp for DR. GOODALE'S NEW PAMPHLET ON CATARRH, its perfect mode of treatment, and rapid cure. Information of priceless value. Send or call at once.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
 ja25-tf 401 Battery, corner Clay,
 San Francisco.

CONSTITUTION WATER!

THE ONLY REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSICAL SWELLINGS, ETC.

The astonishing success which has attended this INVALUABLE Medicine, renders it the most valuable one ever discovered. No language can convey an adequate idea of the immediate and almost miraculous change which it occasions in the system. In fact, it stands unrivalled as a remedy for the permanent cure of the maladies above mentioned, and also for

DIABETES, INDIGESTION, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, STRANGUARY CALCULUS, GRAVEL, CATARRH AND OTHER AFFECTIONS OF THE BLADDER.

For these diseases it is truly a sovereign remedy, and too much cannot be said in its praise. A single dose has been known to relieve the most urgent symptoms. TRY IT in these cases, and you will give praise to CONSTITUTION WATER!

DR. W. H. GREGG, Proprietor.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
 Agents for the Pacific Coast,
 401 and 403 Battery street, corner of Clay,
 San Francisco.
 Price, $1 per bottle; six for $5. Packed and sent by Express. ja25-tf

RECOLLECTIONS OF A DANCER—SITTING ON A ROUT SEAT.

BY imperceptible stages I have now arrived at that age when a lady is considered to be verging on "elderly," and, excepting a sober quadrille now and then, have quite given up dancing. But as I have by no means given up looking on, and it is not so very long since I was as indefatigable a dancer as any young damsel in her first season, I may be allowed to give my experiences and opinions, without being suspected of having imbibed them in the days when young ladies wore their waists under their armpits and cultivated a perpetual stoop in imitation of the Venus de Medici. In the first place, I cannot help wondering whether all the young folks I see whirling round like enraptured teetotums, went through as much as I did in acquiring the art. At a tender age I was placed in the hands of one Mr. Wright. Owing to the magnificence of this gentleman's deportment, and the shortness of his stature and legs, he gave the impression of a large chest, moving about without any apparent means of locomotion. This phenomenon, added to a jetty mass of hair and a huge moustache (at that time an uncommon appendage), invested him with a ferocity fatal to the peace of an infant. I was very tall of my age, and my parents and guardians, much to my distress, were perpetually calling attention to the fact. Never had the custom been so offensive as now, when, Mr. Wright having called me up before him, where I stood very conscious of my new shoes, my governess blandly said, "You must excuse any little shyness at first, Mr. Wright. She has been growing very fast, and is, I fear, a little awkward. Is she not a great girl for seven?" Mr. Wright opened his mouth, and, instead of the ogre-like tones I tremblingly expected, kept it open in amazement, and said finally, in a breathless voice, "Lor, what a monster!"

This relieved, but, at the same time, embarrassed me, which Mr. Wright perceiving, he hastened to say, kindly, "Oh! as to awkward, some of the exercises for grace, and perhaps a little cachouca dance, or something-of-that, will soon set everything right. I think, my dear, we'll begin the positions now directly."

We were great friends from that hour; but I am sorry to say my performances were not at all to his taste. He never got over the length of my strides, frequently implored me to let him "see no angles," and always regarded me nervously, after one day seeing me conduct a youth, aged nine, whom he had found refractory, through a quadrille in a style which, to say the least, was muscular. I did not stay long under him, and as we lived for some time in a lonely country place, I soon forgot my dancing.

When I was twelve years old, I was sent to a school kept by a lady whose hobby was gymnastics. She conducted me to a room apparently fitted up with every instrument of torture. This was the gymnasium, and here my sound health and long limbs served me in good stead. I soon rose to the top of the class, and could have stood my ground against most boys of my age.

"Coming out" time at length approached, and it was thought advisable that I should be brought to town and enrolled among the pupils of Monsieur Filbert, an eminent teacher of dancing. One morning, my governess and I arrived at one of his class rooms; I, perfectly comfortable, proud of my muscles, and strong in the belief that I was as upright as any girl in England. I thought Mr. Filbert an ordinary-looking man enough, thin and grave, with a naturally ugly figure. He told me to stand up with the rest of the pupils, and took no more notice of me till the lesson was half over. I planted myself in a fine square position and began to dance with much energy and inward satisfaction. I soon found that M. Filbert was not at all slow to criticize; and as he passed me over in silence, I felt that he was satisfied. Hearing him say to a pale little girl near me, "Dear child, is your back made of jelly? straighten it," I immediately stiffened my own back with military precision and looked up complacently. M. Filbert's sharp eye saw this directly, and suddenly darting across the room, he said sharply, "Do you want to knock me down, Miss Julia! your shoulders are in your ears, young lady. Bend your knees. Bend, bend. Lower still. Yield. Relax. Mon Dieu, are you made of iron?" It was all over. My confidence was wrecked and my self-possession vanished. A desolating sense that I was a rough country girl, who had been making a spectacle of herself, came over me; and, had it not been for shame, I should have cried. But I swallowed my mortification, and my wounded pride took a lucky direction, for I determined, cost what it might, that I would make M. Filbert retract before he had done with me. I forced my shoulders down until they seemed on the point of falling off. I nearly fell on my face in my anxiety to bend, and I twisted my unfortunate arms in every possible direction. Seeing I was really trying, the tyrant left me; still, however, repeating that I was made of iron. The next victims he visited were two little girls, who were also there for the first time. They had been wriggling about in a very mysterious manner, and now M. Filbert asked if they had ever learned before. "Yes," the elder said, "Mr. Down, at Lincoln, taught us for a little while."

"And did Brown at Lincoln teach you to do all that?" asked the tormentor.

"Ye—e—es," said the little girl, uneasily blushing.

"Then don't do it again, dear children; but do try to keep your chins out of your necks, and don't walk on your insteps." With this advice he turned away and cried out to a child who was "poking"—

"Miss Isabel, I'll cut that chin off in a minute." No one escaped. Presently we were told we might sit down a little while, and we ran joyfully to the benches, little knowing this was a trap set to betray our awkwardness. Our backs were no sooner turned than he looked after us like a lynx, and called us all back ignominiously, saying: "Now go to your seats like ladies instead of racing like boys (looking at me,) or waddling like ducks." This last was for the Lincoln young ladies, who were round and short. We spent three or four minutes very uneasily, while he inspected us and made uncomplimentary remarks on the way we took our seats. Next he ordered us to stand up for a quadrille, and began to arrange us in pairs. Here his active spirit came in with great effect. Sisters were wrenched asunder and sent into different sets, and one little girl, who was very pretty and coquettish, having declined the advances of the only little boy there, who was timid and devoted to her, M. Filbert declared she should be his own partner, which was with reason the most dreaded of all positions. Very soon my masterly style of action drew M. Filbert's attention to me again.

My arms were the offending members in the present instance. It seemed they would not bend. M. Filbert, however, was determined they should, and he led me forth to the very middle of the room. After looking at me until I felt exquisitely uneasy, he elaborately explained the carriage it was proper for a lady habitually to maintain, and, in a few moments, my own efforts and some arrangement on his part, bent me into a position not much removed from that of a Chinese mandarin, including the bobbing to and fro. Forbidding me to stir, M. Filbert called the attention of the whole room to the improvement he had worked, and practically illustrated my usual appearance, which certainly did appear somewhat devoid of grace. He then led me back to my place, but I was not allowed to relax, and I passed the rest of the time moving about like a stately Cochon China fowl.

There was in the class an unlucky boy of fourteen, whose appearance was quite an irregularity, and who never came again. He has probably not forgotten his experiences.

The narrowness of his chest and the width of his back gave great offence, and at the first opportunity M. Filbert attacked him on the subject.

"Come here, my boy," said he; "I want to see whether you've got a chest. Why you have, I declare. I must see that, please; throw it out; that's the way; more, more still!" (giving him a sound blow in the back.)

"Oh-h-h, I can't!" gasped the victim.

"Oh! yes, you can. But what is this? Why I do believe it's the waistcoat. Do you think it is the waistcoat?" he asked in a confidential tone.

Then turning to the room, with a concerned expression:

"He's got such a waistcoat, poor fellow, and such a back, so long; oh dear, dear, what a length it is!"

The poor boy, overcome with confusion, put his hand on his back deprecatingly, whereat M. Filbert said with sympathy:

"Yes, feel it. Isn't it long?"

There was no going to sleep under M. Filbert. He never rested himself, and he did not allow any one else to do so. Very rarely he would praise. If a girl did well, he seldom did more than leave her alone; but a fault was never passed over. And yet, with all this severity, he had the tact to make us feel he was in the right, and there was no being angry with him. He was specially merciless to the eldest girls, and so I was often rebuked; but still I felt that he appreciated any effort I made to please him, and he inspired us all with a determination never to give in. In due course I won my long-desired triumph. One day, quite suddenly, he announced that I was one of his best pupils, and was to be promoted so a small class specially advanced. There the lessons were pure enjoyment, and I grieved much when I was taken from his care.

At length the all-important "first ball" came off and gave me much to reflect upon. The difference between dancing in an orderly manner, with a number of well-schooled young ladies, under the eye of M. Filbert, who would have stopped us had a finger been out of position, and dancing in a crowded room with a succession of strange youths, was indeed striking.

At first I was dismayed at their utter independence of Filbertian rules, but soon grew amused at the curious varieties they presented. My first partner was peculiarly trying. An athletic partner. He held me with a grasp of iron, plunged headlong into the dance, used me as a missile of wrath with which he cleared away all obstacles, and by falling down involved me and some others in a disgraced heap. Never shall I forget my sensations on rising. I scarcely heard the breathless apologies of this fatal man, and hurrying to a seat in a deserted corner, I bowed a dismissal to him, and I felt I could never again appear in the dance.

Scarcely had he left me when the hostess came in with a particularly bright and dapper-looking stranger, whom she presented, and with whom I presently found myself dancing. What a contrast! This was perfect delight, and, by some marvellous contrivance, although the ball was crowded, we never seemed to come near any one, and always had plenty of room. With the zeal of a young dancer, I did not often want to rest, yet, whenever we did stop, I always found myself securely sheltered behind a very broad pair of shoulders. That was my first experience of true dancing; a never-to-be-forgotten sensation.

My next partner was of a different order. He was pale, and bald, with spectacles, and very red hony wrists, and, after a few turns, he asked me if I had seen that week's — Revue, which contained an able article on the late outbreak of cholera, giving the statistics for the last ten years; and whether I was disposed or not to accept the author's views. This was severe matter for a ball-room, and my excited spirits were quite unable to cope with it. From this he passed to the last census returns, and we soon became so scientific, and danced so dreadfully out of time, that I was forced to plead fatigue. He was succeeded by a very timid young man, who held me at arm's length, lost me several times, and who had nothing further to say after he had asked me if I walked much in the Park or whether I preferred driving. Later, I danced with a nautical gentleman, who was very good-natured and amusing, told me some wonderful tales, which I implicitly believed, and whose company I thoroughly enjoyed, in spite of feeling so much as if on board ship while dancing with him. His movements were charmingly light and smooth; but it was surprising how often we were nearly off our balance and recovered again, what unlooked-for lurches occurred, and how frequently one of his legs intruded into other couples! I liked him better than my next partner, who was an "elderly young man," about forty years of age, thoroughly determined to be no more than twenty-five. He presented a weedy appearance and a general stiffness of joint, had a disappointing way of continually twisting round on the same ground, and whenever we were knocked against by passing couples seemed dreadfully jarred. I thought him very silent, and after one turn round the room he looked so extremely pale that I proposed a rest, and on his suggesting an ice, in a faint voice, eagerly assented in the hope of finding him a seat. What a mysterious fact it is, making us suspect some malice on the part of hosts and hostesses, that the tallest men in the room invariably get paired with the shortest women, and vice versa! It is grievous to see a poor fellow over six feet, either carrying round a little creature of four feet nothing, or bending his spine to a heart-breaking degree! What reverses that valorous little man is doomed to suffer who will lead forth a voluminous lady! How he appears to be hiding behind her skirts, and, after vainly endeavoring to pioneer her through the dance, is fain to come out of it battered and humiliated!

I often figured personally in such adventures, for my entrance seemed a signal for all the little men in the room to start up. When fairly launched in a dance with one of these pigmies I was oppressed with a sense of responsibility, and found myself wondering whether or no I should deliver him up at the end, safe in limb.

These are recollections of my own dancing days; but as I sit on a rout seat next to the cornet, I notice with sorrow that its dear old familiar snorts do not seem to inspire the present generation, or rather the male portion of it, with the old ardor.

How is it that in these days of gymnastics and volunteer corps, there are so many inert young gentlemen, while there are so many young damsels longing for action?

As a most interested and loving looker-on, I petition them not to give up the old-fashioned way of dancing, and humbly submit to them, that it may possibly be as worthy a grace as many they are at more pains to cultivate.

GOLDEN SHOT.—A friend of mine, lately returned from a gold-digging expedition to California, tells me that when returning one day from the diggings they lost their way and were nearly starving; at last they saw an old carrion crow who, I suppose, had come on the chance of one of their party dropping down dead and his thereby getting a sly meal. However, my friends thought they would rather eat the crow than the crow eat them. They therefore agreed to shoot him. Somehow or other there was no small shot among the whole party, and they were afraid to risk missing the bird with a bullet. The difficulty was at last solved by a proposition that each of the party should contribute a certain number of nuggets of gold; thus from the party were collected nuggets enough to be about equal to a charge of shot. The gun was loaded, and the old carrion crow killed with a charge of pure gold. Anything more bitter or nauseating than the flesh of this old crow, I understand, could not be conceived.—Frank Buckland.

THE only solution for the problem of life—dis-solution.

GUNS, RIFLES, PISTOLS, Etc.

WILSON & EVANS, have constantly on hand a full assortment of Double and Single Guns, Rifles and Pistols of every description, and all necessary equipments. Our Guns, etc., are of direct importation, and we would invite country merchants to examine our stock before purchasing elsewhere, feeling confident of giving satisfaction to the wholesale and retail trade.

Only authorized Agents of the celebrated Greener Guns, London. A certificate given with each Gun.

A full assortment of Henry's, Spencer's, Sharp's, Wesson's and Ballard's Repeating Rifles always on hand.

New work made to order, and repairing executed in the best style.

WILSON & EVANS,
No. 513 Clay street, San Francisco,
And 122 J street, Sacramento.

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,
SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,
Sporting Emporium.

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office.)
SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,
AND
Importers of all Classes
OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Cartridges on the Pacific Coast, viz.: Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballards, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle.

HOMESTEAD FOR SALE!

ANY PERSON DESIROUS OF PURCHASING a valuable HOUSE AND LOT at a bargain, for CASH, can hear of a chance, by applying immediately at the office of THE CALIFORNIAN. The property is within 10 minutes' walk of the corner of Clay and Montgomery streets, is in the southern part of the city, and in a neat private street and pleasant neighborhood. The House contains two parlors (with sliding doors, gas chandeliers and marble mantels), a dining room and kitchen on the first floor, and four bed rooms on the second. Planked yard, flowering vines, out-houses, etc. Water in three different places on the premises and gas fixtures all through the house. It is built in a thorough and substantial manner, and is now under a monthly rent of $50. Size of Lot, 24 feet, by 80 feet in depth. Title, PERFECT. Price, $3,500.

Satisfactory reasons for selling will be given to a purchaser by applying as above.

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

Terms easy.
fe18 tf FRANK JOHNSON.

RUPTURE.

RADICAL CURE OF
Rupture by the application of the Anatomical Truss of Elastic and uncompressing pressure, by A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charrière of Paris Anatomical, Orthopedical and Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society.

Orthopedic Instruments for Physical Deformities made to order.

Spinal Apparatus; Shoes for Club feet; Bow Legs, etc. Trusses of all kinds. Artificial Legs and Arms, Crutches, etc. Surgical Instruments.

A. FOLLEAU, 624 Washington street, Between Montgomery and Kearny. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street.

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFFERED by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRETIEN PFISTER,
No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S

PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. McInturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit.

Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of hailing winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Caduc, Esq.

Manufactured by J. E. JORGENSEN,
No. 28 Third street, San Francisco, de17-3m

CALIFORNIA

Home Insurance Company,

Capital $300,000

Insure against Loss or Damage by Fire, Brick and Frame Buildings, Merchandise, Dwellings, Furniture, and other insurable property in the State of California, as low as any other solvent Company.

All Losses paid in United States Gold Coin.

DIRECTORS:

John Parrott, Leopold Cahn, T. E. Baugh, Thomas H. Selby, A. J. Coghill, A. Block, E. H. Parker, J. H. Redington, C. J. Deering, A. B. McCreery, C. Dunsen, C. J. Jansou, Charles Hosmer, J. G. Parker, Jr., H. Heyuenann, R. G. Sneath, C. F. MacDermot, J. C. Wilmerding, Levi Stevens, Elias H. Jones, Hall McAllister, Albert Miller, B. F. Lowe, A. H. Titcomb, J. B. Roberts, F. J. Tibbault, S. Hemenway, G. H. Eggers, D. Callahan, James Michael.

OFFICE—Nos. 224 and 226 CALIFORNIA STREET.
B. F. LOWE, President.
JOHN G. PARKER, Jr., Secretary. no5-3m

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on Single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co.

WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE

COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $750,000

Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,

OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus $600,000

Deposit in San Francisco $75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,

MERCHANDISE,

FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
206 Front street, corner of California.

THE REASON WHY

EVERYBODY USES

THE STANDARD SOAP COMPANY'S

CONCENTRATED

ERASIVE SOFT SOAP,

OR, WASHING POWDER!

Is: First—It is cheaper.
Second—It is more effectual.
Third—It saves labor.

Fourth—Clothes washed with it are beautifully white and clear.

No prudent housekeeper would be without it after having once used it.

For sale by Groceries and Drug Stores generally. Manufactory, No. 207 Commercial street, below Front, San Francisco. ja7-3m

PISCO!

G. & F. MARTELL'S COGNAC;

JAMES HENNESSY'S Cognac;

STEAMBOAT GIN;

OLD TOM GIN;

IRISH WHISKY,

from Bond direct.

For sale by V. SQRZA,
44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

Principal office.

BRANDRETH BUILDING, New York.

W. F. BRANDRETH,

Office at CRANE & BRIGHAM'S

no26 San Francisco.

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of

DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the "profession," but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession.

Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platinum, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anæsthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door. dc10-3m

REMOVAL! REMOVAL

E. F. BUNNELL,

SURGEON DENTIST,

Has removed from No. 51 Second street, to No. 611 CLAY STREET, two doors above Montgomery. Persons desiring the best Dental Work at reasonable prices, can secure the same at this office.

The specialty of curing aching teeth without extracting still continued. dc3-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW

style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only required to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. ju18

PHINEAS BANNING,

FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. so24

M. HARKINS,

MANUFACTURER OF

LADIES', MISSES', AND CHILDRENS

Boots and Shoes.

Also, GENTLEMEN'S BOOTS, SHOES and SLIPPERS
MADE TO ORDER.

No. 151 FOURTH STREET,

Second door above Howard, east side,
SAN FRANCISCO

Repairing of all kinds neatly and promptly done.

ALTA MILLS,

STEVENSON STREET,

Near First street, SAN FRANCISCO.

WHEELAN & CO., Proprietors.

Have for sale: Family Flour, Farina, Rice Flour, Rye Flour, Rye Meal, Indian Meal, Cracked Wheat, Buckwheat Flour, Buckwheat Groats, Graham Flour, Hominy, Large, Hominy, Small; Oatmeal, Oat Groats, Pearl Barley, Nos. 1, 2 & 3, Split Peas, Ground Barley.

All kinds of SPICES and FEED ground to order. de17-3m

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

no5-tf J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms. ju25

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every description, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewellery, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, FIVE PER CENT.

Address: CARRINGTON & CO.,
40 Broadway, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—If served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—on judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. By G. C. LITCHER, Deputy Clerk.
Chas. McC. Delany, Plaintiff's Attorney. de24-3m

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON TREASURER.

Engagement of the Celebrated Actor,

Mr. Charles Wheatleigh,

Supported by the

POPULAR DRAMATIC COMPANY.

This Saturday Evening, March 25th, 1886,

Reproduction of

The Octoroon!

Mr. WHEATLEIGH in his original character of SALEM SCUDDER.

Pete Harry Courtaine
Jacob McClusky Louis Aldrich
George Peyton W. T. Hill
Zoe Miss Sophie Edwin
Dora Sunnyside Mrs H. A. Perry

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

SATURDAY, March 25th,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

AT HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

NINE POINTS OF THE LAW,

and the Farce of

HIS LAST LEGS.

MONDAY EVENING,

THE OCTOON.

INSURANCE COMPANY,
S. W. COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS.
INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY.
LOSSES PAID IN UNITED STATES GOLD COIN.
THIS COMPANY will insure against loss by fire on any Dwelling House, Buildings, Merchandise or other property, situated in the State of California. The largest sum they will take on any one risk is thirty thousand dollars.
HENRY B. PLATT, President.
J. GREENBAUM, Vice President.
R. N. VAN BUREN, Secretary.
S. J. HARRIS, Actuary.
mh25 3m

OVERSTOCKED!

Goodwin & Co.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS

Furniture.

BEDDING AND MIRRORS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

Nos. 510 and 528 Washington street,

GUARANTEE

PERFECT SATISFACTION AS TO GOODS!

Prices without reference to

NEW YORK COST!

TWELVE THOUSAND CASES ASSORTED GOODS

Will be SOLD CHEAP during this Year.

mh25 3m

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of APRIL, 1886:

APRIL 31, GOLDEN AGE.
APRIL 13th SACRAMENTO

From Folsom street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually.

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

OLIVER ELDRIDGE, Agent,

Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL.

Montgomery street between Pine and California.

THOMAS MAGUIRE Proprietor.
